The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £13. 10., and in the patronage of Charles Palmer, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LADOCK, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Grampound, containing 806 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £18. Lord and Lady Grenville were patrons in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. Ladoca. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The small village of Pessick, in this parish, is remarkable for the picturesque beauty of its situation. The Rev. John Elliott, in 1763, left £5 a year for teaching children.

LAINDON, a parish in the hundred of BARSTABLE, county of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Billericay, containing, with the chapelry of Basildon, 544 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £35. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

LAINSON, a parish in the hundred of MANSBRIDGE, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (N. W.) from Winchester. The population is returned with the parish of Sparsholt. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £2. 13. 4., and endowed with £600 royal bounty. The Rt. Hon. W. H. Freemantle and his Lady were patrons in 1826.

LAITH-KIRK, a chapelry in the parish of ROMALD-KIRK, western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 9 miles (N. W.) from Barnard-Castle. The population is returned with the parish.

LAKE, a tything in the parish of WILSFORD, hundred of UNDERDITCH, county of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Amesbury. The population is returned with the parish.

LAKENHAM, county of NORFOLK.—See NORWICH.

LAKENHEATH, a parish in the hundred of LACKFORD, county of SUFFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Mildenhall, containing 1042 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Undley, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Ely. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Huntingdonians and Wesleyan Methodists. The navigable Little Ouse runs on the north of the parish.

LALEHAM, a parish in the hundred of SPELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Staines, containing 499 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Staines, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LAMARSH, a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Halstead, containing 331 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £12. 0. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$.. Henry Sperling, Esq. was patron in 1803. The church is dedicated to the Holy Innocents. The navigable river Stour runs on the eastern side of the parish.

LAMBCROFT, a hamlet in the parish of KELSTERN, Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, containing 31 inhabitants.

LAMBERHURST, a parish partly in the hundred of BRENCHLEY and HORSEMONDEN, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, but chiefly in the hundred of LOXFELD-PELHAM, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, 15 miles (S. W. by S.) from Maidstone, containing 1325 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £12. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Rochester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Here is a place of worship for Baptists. There were formerly very extensive iron-works in this parish, the ore having been obtained in the neighbourhood: the balustrades of St. Paul's cathedral were cast at these works. Dame Elizabeth Hanby, in 1712, bequeathed a rent-charge of £6, for the instruction of children.

LAMBETH, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of BRIXTON, county of SURREY, separated from Westminster by the river Thames, comprising the hamlets of Brixton, Kennington, Stockwell, Vauxhall, a part of Norwood, and the extra-parochial liberty of Lambeth palace, and containing 57,638 inhabitants, according to the census of 1821, since which period the population has nearly doubled. The name of this place, in the earliest records written Lambehith, and in Domesday-book Lanchei, is variously written by the ancient historians, and, according to Camden, denotes a muddy station, or harbour; by other antiquaries it is supposed to have been originally Lamb's Hithe, and to have denoted a haven belonging to some ancient proprietor of that name. Canute, on his invasion of London, in 1026, is said to have cut a trench through this parish, in order to convey his fleet to the west of London bridge, of which Maitland, in his History of London, affirms that he discovered evident traces; but the origin of these trenches is by other historians attributed, with greater probability, to a temporary diversion of the course of the river, for the erection of London bridge. At the end of Kennington-lane there were, till very lately, the remains of a horn-work, forming part of the lines of communication made, by order of parliament, round the metropolis, for its greater security during the parliamentary war. The manor of Lambeth was given by Goda, sister of Edward the Confessor, to the see of Rochester, one of whose bishops, Gilbert de Glanville, finding the buildings of his see greatly dilapidated, erected at Lambeth, in 1197, a mansion for himself and his successors, which, being afterwards exchanged for other lands with Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, became the archiepiscopal residence. Archbishop Boniface having obtained from Pope Urban IV. the grant of a fourth part of the offerings at Becket's shrine, and permission to rebuild his house at Lambeth, laid the foundation of the present palace, which has been at various times enlarged and improved by his successors. Many of the metropolitan councils were held in the chapel of the palace while it belonged to the see of Rochester; in 1100, Archbishop Anselm convened an assembly to take into consideration the propriety of the marriage of Henry I. with Maud, daughter of the King of Scotland, who had taken the veil, though not the vows, as a nun. After the exchange, a council was held here by Archbishop Peckham, at which a subsidy of one-fifteenth was granted by the clergy for three years; and, in 1282, the same prelate convoked a synod, at which all the bishops of the realm assisted, to deliberate upon the state of the church of England, of which complaints had been made at Rome by the Bishop of Hereford. In 1381, the followers of Wat Tyler, after having barbarously put Archbishop Sudbury to death, attacked the palace, burnt the furniture and books, and destroyed all the registers and public papers. Henry VII. was, for some days previous to his coronation, sumptuously entertained in the palace by Archbishop Bouchier; and Catherine of Arragon, on her first arrival in England, remained there with her attendants for some days prior to her marriage. The palace was completely furnished by Queen Mary, for the reception of Cardinal Pole, whom she occasionally visited during his primacy; and Queen Elizabeth, during the time of Archbishops Parker and Whitgift, was a frequent guest at Lambeth, where she sometimes remained for several days. Prior to the Reformation, the archbishops had a prison in the palace, for the confinement of offenders against the ecclesiastical laws, and Elizabeth frequently made it a place of liberal confinement for persons who had fallen under her displeasure; to this place she committed the Catholic bishops, Tunstall and Thirlby; the Earl of Essex, previously to his being sent to the Tower; the Earl of Southampton, Lord Stourton, Henry Howard, brother of the Duke of Norfolk, and various other persons. In 1641, Archbishop Laud was attacked by a puritanical mob of five hundred persons, who assailed the palace at midnight; but having received intimation of their design, he had so fortified it as to preclude their doing further injury than breaking the windows.

After the impeachment of Archbishop Laud, an ordinance was issued by the House of Commons, for removing the arms from Lambeth palace, which was carried into effect by Captain Royden, at the head of two hundred infantry and a troop of horse; and in the November following, Captain Brown entered to take possession of the palace for the parliament. It was afterwards converted into a prison by the House of Commons, and among the prisoners confined there, were the Earls of Chesterfield and Derby; Sir Thomas Armstrong, who was afterwards executed at Kennington for having taken part in Monmouth's rebellion; Sir George Bunkley, and some others. The palace being afterwards put up for sale, was purchased by Thomas Scot and Matthew Hardy, the former of whom, secretary to Cromwell, sat in judgment at the trial of Charles I., and was afterwards hanged as a regicide at Charing-Cross. After the Restoration, Lambeth palace again reverted to its rightful owners, and became the residence of the archbishops. During the riots occasioned by the assembling of the Protestant Association in 1780, under an impression that Archbishop Cornwallis was a favourer of the Roman Catholics, several hundreds of the mob, which had collected in St. George's Fields, proceeded to Lambeth, and raising the cry of No Popery, knocked loudly at the gate of the palace, but failing to obtain admission, withdrew, threatening to return in the evening; in the mean time the archbishop, with his family, retired to the house of Lord Hillsborough, in the county of Kent, and a detachment of the military being sent for the defence of the palace, it escaped further violence. The palace has at various times afforded an asylum to learned foreigners, whom the intolerant spirit of their own countrymen had compelled to abandon their native land; among these were the early reformers, Martyr and Bucer, the learned Anthonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalatro, and numerous others.

This venerable pile of building, now undergoing a very extensive repair, and to which considerable additions are being made, is situated on the southern bank of the river Thames, and exhibits in its architecture the styles of various ages. The principal entrance, through an arched gateway, flanked by two square embattled towers of brick, leads into the outer court, on the right hand of which is the great hall, rebuilt after the civil war by Archbishop Juxon, and since converted into a library: it is a lofty structure of brick, strengthened with buttresses, and ornamented with cornices and quoins of stone; the interior is lighted by ranges of lofty windows, and by a double lantern turret rising from the roof, which is finely arched, and richly ornamented with carved oak; in the windows are some heraldic devices in stained glass, and over the fire-places, at each end, are the arms, richly emblazoned, of Archbishop Bancroft, the founder of the library, and of Archbishop Secker, by whom it was augmented. Beyond the library is the chapel, which is by far the most ancient part of the building: it is in the earliest style of English architecture, lighted on the sides by triple lancet-shaped windows, and by an east window of five lights. The ancient painted glass, containing a series of subjects from the Old and the New Testament, the repairing of which was, on his trial, imputed as a crime to Archbishop Laud, was afterwards destroyed by the parliamentary commissioners: the roof, which is flat and divided into compartments, is embellished with the arms of that prelate. A massive oak screen, richly carved, separates a portion of the western extremity from that part of the chapel which is fitted up for divine service. Underneath the chapel is a spacious crypt, the roof of which is finely groined; and to the west of it is the Lollards' tower, a lofty square embattled structure of stone, similar to that of the chapel, and formerly used as a prison. The guard-room has been taken down, and is at present being rebuilt for a banquet hall; it is of Portland-stone, and in the later style of English architecture: the original oak roof, of similar character to that of the library, has been carefully preserved, and will form a prominent and interesting feature in the new edifice. From the first court, a handsome archway on the right leads into the area in which the additional buildings are being erected; these form a fine range, also in the later style of English architecture, decorated with turrets, and containing the state apartments, lodging-rooms, and the various offices requisite for the household establishment; in this part of the building are several windows of fine proportion, and some oriel windows of elegant design. The gardens and park, comprising thirteen acres, are tastefully laid out, and through the latter is a pleasant carriage road to the palace. Carlisle house, formerly the residence of the Bishops of Rochester, and at that time called "La Place," was given by Henry VIII. to Aldridge, Bishop of Carlisle, and, after having been for many years occupied as a private academy, it has almost disappeared in the recent improvements of the parish, and only some portions of the outer walls are remaining.

Lambeth, originally a detached village, is now in fact united with Southwark, and may be considered as forming a suburb of the metropolis. The great road from London to Portsmouth leads through the parish, by Vauxhall, and a new road, leading from Waterloo bridge to Newington, communicates with the preceding, and with other roads diverging into the counties of Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire. There are two establishments for supplying Thames water to this district; the Lambeth water works, situated in Belvidere road; and the South London water-works, at Vauxhall bridge. Lambeth was formerly celebrated for its medicinal well, of which the memorial is preserved in the name of a public house called the Fountain; and for its numerous places of public amusement, the principal of which were Cuper's gardens, and Spring gardens, now Vauxhall; the former, belonging to the Earl of Arundel, and constituting part of the gardens of Arundel house, were, by Mr. Cuper, the earl's gardener, converted into a place of entertainment, consisting of music and fire-works; and upon the demolition of that mansion, in order to form a new street, became the depository of many of the Arundelian marbles brought from Italy by that nobleman, and, from their mutilated and imperfect state, deemed unworthy of a place in that splendid collection. Among them were several beautiful, though imperfect, specimens of sculpture, of which, the best were purchased for the decoration of their seats, by several persons of distinction. The latter, as a fashionable place of public entertainment, has continued, under the highest patronage, to flourish with increasing splendour and additional attractions; the beauty of the scenery, the brilliancy of the illuminations, the rich and varied display of fire-works, the efficiency and talent of the orchestra, the gay assemblage of fashionable company, and the excellence of the numerous arrangements provided for their accommodation, have given to this scene of splendid gaiety an irresistible claim to the public patronage. In this parish are also Astley's amphitheatre, near Westminster Bridge, and the Coburg theatre, in the Waterloo-road. Lambeth, extending for a considerable way on the banks of the river, and connected with the opposite shore by Waterloo, Westminster, and Vauxhall bridges, is admirably situated for the carrying on of extensive works of every kind; and, in addition to what may be considered as the general trade of the place, there are, on the largest scale, lime, coal, and timber wharfs; iron and other foundries; saw-mills; manufactories for axle-trees, carriages, patent buoys, floor-cloth, Morocco and Spanish leather, pins, varnish, saltpetre, soap, whiting, and patent shot (of which the lofty towers form conspicuous objects on the bank of the river); potteries of stone and earthenware; glass works; distilleries; ale and beer breweries; vitriol and other chemical works; vinegar works, and various others: there is also a very extensive establishment for making steam-engines and almost every other kind of machinery, on the largest scale, conducted by Mr. Maudesley; besides artificial stone works, and numerous other establishments of various kinds. A weekly market, and a fair for fifteen days, granted in the reign of John, have long been discontinued. The parish is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests held in the borough of Southwark, for the recovery of debts under £5, and within the limits of the New Police establishment.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £32. 15. 7½, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, adjoining the palace, and rebuilt in the latter part of the fourteenth century, is a spacious structure in the early and decorated styles of English architecture, with some later insertions, and having a square embattled tower of freestone, with an octagonal turret at one of the angles. The interior comprises the chapels of the Howard and Leigh families, subsequently erected, and contains numerous ancient and interesting records: in one of the windows of the nave is the figure of a pedlar with his dog, painted in glass, supposed to be the rebus of a person named Chapman, who is thought to have given a piece of land to the parish, which is called Pedlar's Acre, formerly producing two shillings and sixpence per annum, now more than £200. Among the interments are those of Archbishops Bancroft, Secker, Tenison, Hutton, and Cornwallis; of Tunstall, Bishop of Durham; Thirlby, Bishop of Ely; and other distinguished prelates; several of the Howards, and other illustrious families, together with a curious monument of Col. Robert Scot, and one of Elias Ashmole, who presented to the University of Oxford the museum which is distinguished by his name. Among the numerous tombs in the church-yard are those of William Faden, the original printer of the Public Ledger; and John Tradescant, the original collector of the Ashmolean Museum. The burial-ground in High-street was consecrated in 1705. Four new district churches have been erected in this parish by aid of the parliamentary commissioners, who granted one moiety of the cost, and a loan of the other moiety to be repaid by a rate on the inhabitants; all of them were completed in 1824. St. John's, in the Waterloo-road, containing two thousand and thirty-two sittings, of which eight hundred and fifty-one are free, and built at an expense of £15,911. 16. 7., is a handsome structure in the Grecian style of architecture, with a tower of two stages, of which the upper is surmounted by a neat spire, terminating in a ball and cross, and having a fine portico of six columns of the Doric order supporting an entablature and triangular pediment. St. Mark's at Kennington, St. Matthew's at Brixton-Causeway, and St. Luke's at Norwood, are described in the accounts of these places: the livings are all district incumbencies, in the patronage of the Rector of Lambeth. St. Mary's chapel, at Lambeth Butts, erected in 1828, also by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £7634. 10. 4., and containing one thousand nine hundred and sixty sittings, of which one thousand three hundred and forty-seven are free, is a neat edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a campanile turret surmounted by a spire: it is a chapel of ease to the rectory, as is also the chapel at Stockwell. St. Mark's, Kennington lane, St. Matthew's, Denmark Hill, and the chapel at South Lambeth, are proprietary Episcopal chapels. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyan and Welch Methodists, and Swedenborgians.

A parochial school for boys was established by subscription, in the early part of the last century, and is supported by the same means, together with a fund of nearly £1200 in the three per cents.: the school-room has been neatly rebuilt, on ground belonging to the see of Canterbury, and let by the archbishop, at a peppercorn rent: there are about four hundred scholars in this institution, of whom, from thirty to forty are clothed annually, and several apprenticed. A parochial school for girls was established in 1780: it is supported by subscriptions, from the savings of which, and some donations, it has realised a fund of £400 in the three per cents.: there are two hundred girls in the school, of whom, forty are clothed. Archbishop Tenison, in 1715, founded a school which he endowed with a house and land, for the clothing and instruction of twelve girls; the endowment, augmented with subsequent benefactions, produces about £350 per annum: the school-room has been rebuilt upon an extensive scale, and the number of girls (each of whom, on producing a certificate of good conduct during a service of three years, receives a small gratuity,) has been increased. Richard Lawrence, in 1661, gave two houses, with ground attached to them, in trust, for the clothing and instruction of twenty children of Lambeth Marsh, in one of which the school was formerly held, but becoming dilapidated, it was removed to a neat and commodious building, erected, in 1808, in the York road, by subscription; in which the children, for whose benefit the original endowment, producing £100 per annum, is appropriated, are instructed, in common with the children of the parish. St. John's school, in the Waterloo road, was rebuilt by subscription, at an expense of £2200, to which his late Majesty George IV. gave £100. The Eldon school, on the road to Wandsworth, was instituted, in 1830, for the instruction of the children of the parishes of Lambeth, Battersea, and Clapham, in the National religion, and for the training of young men to act as teachers on the National system; the children, on leaving school, are placed out apprentices: the building, which is in the later style of English architecture, was erected in commemoration of Lord Chancellor Eldon, at the sole expense of Charles Francis, Esq., by whom the school is supported. The Licensed Victuallers' school, in Kennington-lane in this parish, was established for the maintenance, clothing, and education, of children of deceased and indigent members of that society: the buildings are neat and commodious, and the regulations, both of the house and the school, in which there are at present eighty-nine boys, and eighty-nine girls, are well adapted to secure the important objects for which it was established. The asylum for female orphans, and for the reception of deserted females, the settlement of whose parents cannot be found, was first instituted in 1758, and incorporated in 1800: it is under the patronage of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, and the direction of a general committee (of which His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge is president), and of a ladies' committee: there are one hundred and forty children in the school, who are maintained, clothed, and taught reading, writing, and arithmetic; they are also instructed in plain needle-work, and in household business of every kind requisite to qualify them for being useful servants: at fourteen years of age they are apprenticed for seven years, as servants in respectable families; and, on the completion of that term, receive from the institution a gratuity of £5. 5., and a testimonial of good conduct. The buildings occupy three sides of a quadrangle; in the central range is a handsome chapel, with a portico of Corinthian columns supporting an entablature and triangular pediment, surmounted by a cupola, in which divine service is performed every Sunday, in the morning and evening; two morning preachers and one evening preacher are appointed by the general court, and also a chaplain, who reads the prayers, and instructs the children in their religious duties. The general lying-in hospital, for the reception of patients from all parts of the kingdom, and for the delivery of out-patients at their own habitations in the metropolis and its environs, was instituted in 1765, and incorporated in 1830: it was formerly in the Westminster bridge road, near Marsh-gate, from which situation it has been recently removed to York road, where a neat square building of white brick, ornamented with stone, with a handsome receding portico of the Ionic order, has been erected: the institution is under the patronage of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the direction of a committee, of which Earl Grosvenor is president. The Royal Universal Infirmary for children, in the Waterloo road, was originally established at St. Andrew's hill, Doctors' Commons, in 1816, and is supported by donations and subscriptions: it administers relief in all diseases of children, from the time of the birth till fourteen years of age, being open in cases of emergency to all first applications for admission, without recommendation, and is under the patronage of His Majesty. The Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, instituted in 1784, for the relief of the distressed Irish families in London and its environs, and for the education of their children, is under the patronage of His Majesty: a handsome and capacious building was erected for this purpose in Upper Stamford-street, in 1820, at an expense of £8000, comprising two school-rooms, with a house for the master and the mistress, committee rooms, and other offices. The society has a fund of £25,000, and is liberally supported by annual subscription: there are four hundred and forty children in the schools, who are clothed and instructed, and, on their leaving the institution, are placed out apprentices, or to service in respectable families. Sir Noel Caron, in 1623, gave a rent-charge of £28 on his mansion at South Lambeth, for the maintenance of an almshouse which he had erected in the parish, for the support of seven aged widows, to each of whom he allowed £4 per annum, which has been augmented by an appropriation of a part of large sums of money bequeathed by Thomas, Earl Thanet, for charitable uses, by his administratrix, the Dowager Countess Gower. Almshouses have also been erected in Coldharbour-lane, by the Company of Parish Clerks, for eight widows of members of that fraternity; and there are numerous and extensive charitable bequests for distribution among the poor.

LAMBLEY, a parish in the western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, comprising the townships of Ash-Holm and Lambley, and containing 261 inhabitants, of which number, 139 are in the township of Lambley, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Haltwhistle. The living is a donative, in the patronage of R. L. Allgood, Esq. The church has been recently repaired by subscription. The South Tyne runs through the parish. Here are very productive mines of fine coal. An abbey of Benedictine nuns, in honour of St. Patrick, was founded here, in the reign of John, by the king, or by Adam de Tindale, which, at the dissolution, had a revenue of £5. 15. 8.: in 1296 this monastery was burned, and the neighbourhood laid waste, by the Scots. On Castle hill, the site of an old fortress, are vestiges of a deep moat, and lower down the river have been discovered some large coffins of oak, black as jet.

LAMBLEY, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Nottingham, containing 690 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Rev. A. D. Flamstead. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

LAMBOURN, a parish in the hundred of LAMBOURN, county of BERKS, comprising the market town of Chipping-Lambourn, and the tythings of Blagrove with Hadley, Eastbury with Bockhampton, and Upper Lambourn, and containing 2299 inhabitants, of which number, 1096 are in the town of Chipping-Lambourn, 5 miles (N.) from Hungerford, and 68 (W.) from London. This place formed part of the dower of Ealswitha, Queen of Alfred the Great, and continued in royal demesne under Edward the Confessor; after the Conquest it was given to the baronial family of Fitzwarren, at whose instance a market and three fairs were granted to it by Henry III. The town is pleasantly situated in a hilly district, near the source of a small rivulet of the same name, and which has the peculiar property that, during the summer months it has a full stream, which, decreasing about October, for a few of the winter months, sometimes leaves the channel perfectly dry. The streets are neither paved nor lighted; the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells: in the centre of the town is an ancient cross, consisting of a tall pillar, approached by a circular ascent of steps, and surmounted by an ornamented capital, supposed to have been originally the figure of a sphynx, but now nearly obliterated. The market is on Friday; fairs are held on May 12th, October 14th, and December 4th, chiefly for cattle.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 11. 10½., and in the patronage of the Dean of St. Paul's. The church, which is dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient and handsome cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower rising from the intersection, and containing a peal of eight bells; in the interior are two chantry chapels, in one of which the inmates of the adjoining almshouses assemble every morning for prayers, kneeling around the tomb of the founder, Mr. John Isbury, who died in 1372. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Here are two free schools, one erected in 1735, by Organ Hippisley, Esq., and endowed with a small rent-charge for teaching eight boys to read and write: a Sunday school has been united to this institution, in which from sixty to one hundred children are taught to read, and for this an additional stipend is raised by subscription. Another school was founded, in 1792, by John Serjent, and endowed with a messuage and rent-charge of £11, for the education of twenty-five children; the master and children to be appointed by the vicar and churchwardens of the parish. On the north side of the church is an hospital, founded, in 1502, by the son of the above-mentioned John Isbury, for ten poor men, who are nominated by the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford.

LAMBOURN (UPPER), a tything in the parish and hundred of LAMBOURN, county of BERKS, 1½ mile (N.W.) from Lambourn, containing 354 inhabitants.

LAMBOURNE, a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 5 miles (S. by E.) from Epping, containing 729 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Mary and All Saints, contains a monument to the memory of Thomas Winniffe, Bishop of Lincoln in the seventeenth century. Spencer, the warlike Bishop of Norwich, who put down Ket's rebellion, lived here; the square intrenchment called Bishop's Moat, each side of which extends two hundred yards, encompassed his residence, and still remains.

LAMBRIGG, a township in that part of the parish of KENDAL which is in KENDAL ward, county of WEST-MORLAND, 6¾ miles (E. N. E.) from Kendal, containing 164 inhabitants. A vein of copper-ore was formerly worked here, but proving unproductive, from the great quantity of water in the mine, it has long since been abandoned.

LAMBROOK (EAST), a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, county of SOMERSET, 6¼ miles (S. by E.) from Langport. The population is returned with the parish of Kingsbury-Episcopi. The living is a discharged rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Chancellor in the Cathedral Church of Wells, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Wells.

The church is dedicated to St. James. There is a place of worship for Independents.

LAMBROOK (WEST), a tything in the parish of KINGSBURY-EPISCOPI, eastern division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, county of SOMERSET, 6¼ miles (S.) from Langport. The population is returned with the parish.

LAMBTON, a township in that part of the parish of CHESTER le STREET which is in the northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Durham, containing 293 inhabitants. Harraton hall, the ancient seat of the D'Arcys, stood on the side of Lambton castle, which is situated in a beautiful park five miles in circuit, and intersected by the river Wear. Just within the entrance is the site of an ancient chapel; and near it Worm hill, of which tradition says that it was anciently occupied by a formidable serpent, which was cut to pieces by some hero of the Lambton family, cased in armour set with razors for the purpose. Two brine springs, from which salt is made, issue from the bottoms of two coal pits in the neighbourhood.

LAMERTON, a parish forming, with the parish of Sydenham-Damerel, a distinct portion of the hundred of LIFTON, being surrounded by that of Tavistock, county of DEVON, 2½ miles (N. W.) from Tavistock, containing 1069 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter rated in the king's books at £13. 2. 1. The Rev. H. H. Tremayne was patron in 1816. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, formerly belonged to Tavistock abbey: it contains an interesting monument to Thomas Tremayne and his wife, with their eight sons and eight daughters. Collacombe, an old mansion built in the reign of Elizabeth, and since converted into a farm-house, has a large transome window containing three thousand two hundred panes of glass. Here is a charity school supported by subscription.

LAMESLEY, a chapelry in that part of the parish of CHESTER le STREET which is in the middle division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 3½ miles (S.) from Gateshead, containing 1720 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, endowed with £600 private benefaction, and £2100 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Ravensworth. The chapel, which is of ancient foundation, was rebuilt in 1759. There are extensive mines of coal, several quarries of stone for grindstones, and some beds of iron-stone, in the parish. A free school was built in 1814, and is supported by Lord Ravensworth, for the instruction of twenty-five boys: Lady Ravensworth allows an annual stipend for the education of girls.

LAMMAS, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Coltishall, containing, with the parish of Little Hautboys, 284 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Little Hautboys, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, contains, in the north window, some specimens of ancient stained glass.

LAMONBY, a township in the parish of SKELTON, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 8½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Penrith, containing 274 inhabitants. Here is a quarry of firestone.

LAMORRAN, a parish in the western division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Tregoney, containing 93 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. The Earl of Falmouth was patron in 1803. The church is dedicated to St. Moren. The parish is bounded on the south by the navigable river Fal.

LAMPLUGH, a parish in ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 8 miles (E. N. E.) from Whitehaven, comprising the townships of Ketton-Quarter, Lamplugh, Murton, or Moor Town, and Winder, and containing 661 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £10. 4. 7. The Trustees of E. Copeley, Esq. were patrons in 1817. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The parish is bounded on the east by Loweswater and Crummockwater; and two branches of the river Marron have their source here. There are extensive quarries of limestone, and some of freestone; and near the ancient hall is a mineral spring, the water of which is powerfully astringent. Richard Briscoe, Esq., in 1747, gave a rent-charge of £12, partly to the poor, and partly for the instruction of twelve children.

LAMPORT, a parish in the hundred of ORLINGBURY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Northampton, containing, with the hamlet of Hanging-Houghton, 233 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £48. 2. 6., and in the patronage of Sir J. Isham, Bart. The church is dedicated to All Saints. At Faxton, in this parish, is a chapel of ease. There is a school endowed by Sir Edmund Isham, Bart., who, in 1762, gave £1500 for this purpose and for the benefit of the poor.

LAMYATT, a parish in the hundred of WHITESTONE, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Bruton, containing 243 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £12. 4. 2. The Rev. George Ridout was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and St. John.

LANCASHIRE, a maritime county, and a county palatine, situated on the western coast, and bounded on the north by the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland, on the east by that of York, on the south by that of Chester, and on the west by the Irish sea: it extends from $53^{\circ} 23'$ to $54^{\circ} 24'$ (N. Lat.), and from $2^{\circ} 18'$ to $3^{\circ} 7'$ (W. Lon.); and contains one million one hundred and seventy-one thousand eight hundred and forty statute acres, or one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one square miles. The population, in 1821, amounted to 1,052,859, being an increase, during the ten preceding years, of 224,549. The name of this county is a contraction of Lancaster-shire. Its early British inhabitants were the Setantii, a tribe of the Brigantes. Under the Roman dominion it was included in the province called Maxima Caesariensis, and contained eight stations belonging to that people, besides being traversed by four great military roads, which severally led through this county, from Carlisle to Kinderton in Cheshire; from Overborough to Slack, or Almondbury, in Yorkshire; from the Neb of the Nese, on the right bank of the Ribble, eastward, and across Fulwood-moor, to Ribchester; and from the ford of the Mersey, near Warrington, through Barton, Eccles, and Manchester, to Ilkley. The Britons, under their renowned King Arthur, fought several great battles with the Saxons on the banks of the river Douglas, in this county, which was, however, at last conquered, about the year 559, by the Saxon chieftain, Ella, and formed part of the kingdom of Deira, over which that prince reigned. From this period until the fifteenth century, we find little remarkable on record relative to Lancashire. It shared in the general devastation of the northern part of England committed by the Conqueror; and, in 1323, it suffered from an invasion of the Scots, under Robert Bruce, who partly burned the town of Preston. The year 1363, also, is remarkable in the Lancashire annals, as that in which the county was erected into a palatinate by Edward III., in favour of his fourth son, John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster. In the wars between the rival houses of York and Lancaster this county was not the scene of any important event, except that, after the defeat of the Lancastrian party in the battle of Hexham, Henry VI. was concealed for a year at Waddington hall, where he was at length discovered and taken, and was conveyed to London. In the reign of Henry VII., the impostor, Lambert Simnel, with a body of Irish partisans, and two thousand Germans, who had been sent to his assistance by Margaret, widow of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, landed at the Pile of Foudrey, in the bay of Morecambe, in this county, and thence proceeded to Coventry. In the reign of Henry VIII., when the "Pilgrims of Grace," as the rebels of the north were called, were making their way southward, the malcontents of Lancashire took up arms, but were speedily subdued by the Earl of Shrewsbury, aided by the Earl of Derby. During the great civil war in the reign of Charles I., no county was more frequently the scene of action than this. In the commission of array issued by the king, James, Lord Strange, was appointed lord-lieutenant of the counties of Lancashire and Cheshire: that nobleman soon after had a severe skirmish with the inhabitants of Manchester, for a magazine which they had formed; and shortly after another skirmish ensued at the same town, with some partisans of the parliament. His lordship then mustered the county in three different places,—on the heaths by Bury; on the moor at Ormskirk; and on the moor at Preston; at each of which not less than twenty thousand men were assembled. Lord Molyneux also raised a regiment in the royal cause in this county; but many of the other most influential men were actively engaged in the parliamentary interest. The forces thus raised soon dispersed, but Lord Strange, who immediately after, by the decease of his father, became Earl of Derby, having been commanded by the king to secure the town of Manchester, raised some troops at his own expense, and commenced the siege of that town on the 26th of September, 1642, at the head of four thousand three hundred men, but raised it at the end of the week following, in obedience to the commands of the king, whom he proceeded to join without delay. Early in 1643, Sir Thomas Fairfax repaired from Yorkshire to Manchester, and there established his head-quarters. On the 10th of February, Sir John Seaton, Major-General of the parliamentary forces, marched at the head of a body of troops from Manchester to Preston, which was then garrisoned by the king's troops, and attacked that town with such vigour, that it was taken after a combat of two hours; and soon after Lancaster was secured by the parliamentary forces, with but little resistance. Sir John Seaton then marched to Wigan, where the Earl of Derby was strongly intrenched, and taking that place after a gallant resistance, compelled the earl to retreat to Blackburn. From Wigan the victorious forces proceeded to Warrington, which they obtained possession of after a short but resolutely-sustained siege. The united forces of the Earl of Derby and Lord Molyneux retook the town of Lancaster on the 10th of March; and three days after, their lordships advanced to Preston, which they carried by assault; but Lord Molyneux being obliged to join the king at Oxford, the Earl of Derby, with his forces, was compelled immediately to retreat to his own mansion of Latham house, which he had fortified. Early in the year 1644 commenced the memorable siege of that mansion, which was attacked by the parliamentary forces under Sir Thomas Fairfax, and defended for three months by a strong garrison, inspired by the heroic conduct of Charlotte Tremouille, Countess of Derby, until relieved by Prince Rupert, who pursued the parliamentary army to Bolton. Here, the prince being joined by the Earl of Derby from the Isle of Man, Bolton was taken in a second furious assault, led by the earl at the head of two hundred chosen Lancashire men; when Colonel Rigby, the commander, and a number of his troops, succeeded in escaping from the town, and crossed the Yorkshire hills to Bradford. The prince forthwith advanced to Liverpool, which surrendered after a vigorous siege of about three weeks. He then hastened to York; but having been totally defeated, with the other generals of the royal party, at the decisive battle of Marston moor, he drew off the wreck of his army into Lancashire, where the strong holds he had so recently captured were speedily re-taken. In the summer of 1645, Latham house was again besieged by the parliamentary forces, under the command of General Egerton, and, after a gallant defence by Colonel Rawsthorn, the garrison was at length compelled to yield to superior numbers. In the year 1648, the north of England being invaded by the Scottish army, under the Duke of Hamilton, and by another body of men which had been raised on the borders, under General Langdale, acting in concert and on behalf of the royal cause, Cromwell was ordered by the parliament to march into Lancashire to resist their further progress. These orders were promptly obeyed, and having joined the Lancashire forces which had been assembled under the command of Colonel Ashton, he advanced to Preston, where, on the evening of the 17th of July, he was met by the opposing army, which had in the mean time been joined by an Irish force under General Monroe. An action immediately ensued, in which, after a sanguinary conflict of four hours' duration in the fields, the Duke of Hamilton's troops began to give way, and were charged through the streets of Preston at the point of the bayonet, but beyond the town they made a stand for the night: in this battle, Cromwell himself states that the enemy lost one thousand men killed, and four thousand prisoners. In the night of the 18th the duke retreated with the remainder of his army to Wigan, and the next day to Warrington, but, being still pursued, his troops made a resolute stand at a pass near Wenwick, which they maintained for many hours, being at last overcome by the courage and discipline of the troops under Cromwell, when about one thousand men were killed, and two thousand made prisoners: the remainder were pursued to the town of Warrington, where they passed the bridge, and where General Bailey, to whom the Duke of Hamilton had confided the command of this division of his army, was compelled to surrender himself and all his officers and soldiers prisoners of war: by this capitulation, four thousand prisoners, with their arms, fell into the hands of the victors, and the infantry of the Scottish army was totally ruined: the remainder ultimately dispersed. The issue of this campaign compelled Sir Thomas Tyldesley, a zealous supporter of the royal cause, to abandon the siege of Lancaster castle, in which he was at that time engaged. King Charles II., with his Scottish forces, marched through this county, in 1651, on his route to Worcester; and the Earl of Derby, having collected at Preston all the strength he was able, consisting of about six hundred men, was proceeding to Worcester by way of Wigan, when he was opposed in Wigan lane by a considerable force under Colonel Lilburne, and his troops were totally routed: the earl himself escaped with numerous wounds, but shortly afterwards fell into the hands of the enemy, and was beheaded at Bolton. In this year also Lancashire suffered much from pestilence. William III., on his way to Ireland, prior to the celebrated battle of the Boyne, passed through the southern part of Lancashire, and embarked at Liverpool, June 14th, 1690. In 1715, a body of the Scottish insurgents on behalf of the Pretender entered this county from the north, and having passed through Kirkby-Lonsdale and Lancaster, arrived at Preston on the 9th of November, their whole force amounting to one thousand six hundred men; and here, after some skirmishes of minor importance, they finally surrendered to the king's forces. In 1745, the army of the Young Pretender passed through Lancashire, in its progress southward, being joined in its route by small numbers of Lancashire men, and again, in its precipitate retreat, it traversed the county in the contrary direction.

Lancashire lies within the diocese of Chester, and province of York, being included partly in the archdeaconry of Chester, and partly in that of Richmond, and contains the deaneries of Blackburn, Leyland, Manchester, and Warrington, comprised in the archdeaconry of Chester; and those of Amounderness, Furness, Kendal, and Lonsdale, in the archdeaconry of Richmond: in these are sixty-six parishes, of which twenty-six are rectories, twenty-seven vicarages, and the remainder, with the exception of the three rectorial churches in the parish of Manchester, perpetual curacies: there is also a very great number of chapels of ease throughout the county, particularly in the densely-inhabited manufacturing district. For civil purposes it is divided into the six hundreds of Amounderness, Blackburn (Higher and Lower), Leyland, Lonsdale (North and South of the Sands), Salford, and West Derby. It contains the borough, market, and sea-port towns of Lancaster and Liverpool; the borough and market towns of Clitheroe, Preston, and Wigan; the borough of Newton, the market of which has been discontinued; the market and sea-port towns of Poulton in the Fylde and Ulverstone; and the market towns of Ashton under Line, Blackburn, Bolton, Burnley, Bury, Cartmel, Chorley, Colne, Dalton, Garstang, Hawkeshead, Haslingden, Hornby, Kirkham, Manchester, Middleton, Oldham, Ormskirk, Prescott, Rochdale, Todmorden, and Warrington. Two knights are returned for the shire, and two representatives for each of the boroughs. This county is included in the northern circuit: the assizes are held at Lancaster, where are also held the quarter sessions for the hundred of Lonsdale, on the Tuesdays in the first whole week after Epiphany, Easter Sunday, the festival of St. Thomas à Becket, and October 11th; at Preston, for the hundreds of Amounderness, Blackburn, and Leyland, on the Thursdays following the days above named; at Salford, for the hundred of Salford, on the Mondays following; and at Kirkdale near Liverpool, for the hundred of West Derby, on the Monday fortnight after they commence at Salford. The court of Annual General Sessions is holden at Preston, on the Thursday next after the feast of St. John the Baptist, and afterwards by various adjournments until the multifarious causes within the peculiar cognizance of this court are determined. The county gaol is at Lancaster; and there is a county house of correction at Manchester, another at Kirkdale, and a third at Preston: there are one hundred acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £545,737. 3., the expenditure to £539,388. 6., of which £347,911. 18. was applied to the relief of the poor.

Prior to and under the Norman dynasty, Lancashire was probably distinguished as an Honour, and was of the superior order of seigniories. The Honour of Lancaster was given by William the Conqueror to Roger de Poitou, who in turn bestowed various parts of it upon his followers. In the interval between the first division of property among the Normans and the general survey, the lands between the Ribble and the Mersey were forfeited to the crown by the defection of that nobleman, and are consequently mentioned in that record as the property of the king. The Honour of Lancaster was, however, restored to Roger de Poitou by William Rufus, in whose reign he again forfeited it by rebellion; and this princely inheritance was given to Stephen, Count of Blois, and afterwards King of England. Stephen, on ascending the throne, bestowed it on his son, William de Blois, Earl of Mortaigne and Boulogne; and, on the death of this nobleman, Richard I. gave it to his brother John, afterwards King of England. At a subsequent period, Ranulph, fourth earl of Chester, possessed all the land between the Ribble and the Mersey, together with all the other territories which had been held by Roger de Poitou. Henry III. made his youngest son, Edmund Crouchback, Earl of Lancaster, and gave him the Honour and estates. His son Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, was beheaded at Pontefract, March 22nd, 1322, for his distinguished share in the insurrection to displace the De Spensers, the favourites of Edward III.; but this sentence was afterwards reversed by parliament, and his title and estates devolved upon his brother Henry, who left an only son, on whom Edward III. conferred the title of Duke of Lancaster. These possessions afterwards descended to John of Gaunt, who married Blanche, daughter and co-heiress of the Duke of Lancaster just mentioned, and the title was revived in his favour. Edward III. also advanced the county of Lancaster to the dignity of a palatinate by a royal patent expressed in these terms: "We have granted for ourselves and our heirs to our son (John) that he shall have, during life, within the county of Lancaster, his court of Chancery, and writs to be issued out under his seal belonging to the office of Chancellor; his justices both for holding the pleas of the crown, and for all other pleas relating to common law, and the cognizance thereof, and all executions by his writs and officers within the same; and all other liberties and royalties relating to the county palatine as freely and fully as the Earl of Chester is known to enjoy them within the county of Chester," &c. This prince was succeeded in his estates by the celebrated Henry of Bolingbroke, afterwards King Henry IV. of England, from whom the duchy of Lancaster descended to his son Henry V., and from that monarch to his son Henry VI. But when the latter was attainted, in the first year of Edward IV., this duchy was declared by parliament to be forfeited to the crown, and an act was passed vesting the whole in Edward IV. and his heirs for ever. In the reign of Henry VII., however, another act was passed, vesting it in that monarch and his heirs for ever, since which time, the kings of England have always been Dukes of Lancaster. The estates of the duchy were greatly increased by Henry VIII., at the time of the dissolution of religious houses, as well as by the act of Edward VI. for the dissolution of colleges and chantries, and by a charter of Philip and Mary, granted in pursuance of an act of parliament; but the necessities of various succeeding monarchs compelled them to raise money on these estates, by means of long leases, grants in fee, &c., and the revenue arising from them is still much curtailed by the leases with which they are encumbered. In the first year of the Commonwealth, a commission was appointed for the sale of the crown and duchy lands, the transaction of which was cancelled at the Restoration.

The county palatine and the duchy of Lancaster, with regard to extent, are quite distinct; for there are various estates forming part of the duchy in twenty-five other counties in England. Belonging to the duchy also is a considerable share of ecclesiastical patronage, as also the appointment of sheriffs for the county palatine. The peculiar jurisdiction and proceedings of the courts of law in the county palatine of Lancaster are the result of those privileges granted to its former dukes, who had, in fact, sovereign authority within the limits of their dominion; for, besides the privileges already mentioned, they had power to pardon treasons, murders, and felonies, and all offences were said to be committed against their peace, sword, and dignity, and not, as now, "against the peace of our Lord the King, his crown and dignity." By the 27th of Henry VIII., however, which abridged the privileges of the counties palatine, it was enacted that all writs and processes should be made in the name of the king, but should be tested, or witnessed, in the name of the owner of the franchise. All writs, therefore, must be under the seal of the respective franchises; and the judges who sit in this county palatine have a special commission from the duchy of Lancaster, and not the ordinary commission under the Great Seal of England. The court of Chancery of the duchy has cognizance of matters of an equitable nature, whether they relate to the county palatine, or to the duchy, and of all questions of revenue and council affecting the ducal possessions. It is also a court of appeal from the Chancery of the county palatine; and, being held at the duchy office in Westminster, all its proceedings are dated before His Majesty "at his palace at Westminster," and not, as other royal acts, at the residence of the monarch for the time being. The principal officers of the duchy court are, the chancellor, the attorney general, the king's serjeant, the king's counsel, the receiver general, the two auditors, the clerk of the council and registrar, the deputy registrar and secretary, and two clerks in court. The court of Chancery of the county palatine is an original and independent court, as ancient as the 50th of Edward III.: the office is at Preston, and the court sits at least four times in the year, namely, once at each assize at Lancaster, and once at Preston in the interval of each assize. The general practice of the court is similar to that of the High Court of Chancery, with which and the court of Exchequer it has concurrent jurisdiction in all matters of equity, its cognizance of which depends on the person or lands of the defendant being amenable to the process of this court; but its jurisdiction is exclusive of all other courts of equity when both the subject of the suit and the residences of the parties litigant are within the county. An appeal from the chancery of Lancashire lies to the duchy chamber at Westminster, and from that to the king in parliament. Although the bills are addressed to the chancellor of the duchy, the vice-chancellor of the county palatine is the judge of the court: the chancellor of the duchy, assisted by two judges in commission for the county palatine, sits to hear causes at Westminster. All original writs within the county palatine issue from the Chancery of Lancashire, and writs from the courts of Westminster are directed to the chancellor of the duchy, who makes out his mandate to the sheriff of the county to execute and return them into the chancery; and the chancellor and vice-chancellor are authorised by act of parliament to appoint commissioners for the purpose of taking special bail, or affidavits, in any of the courts within the county palatine. The officers of this court are, the chancellor of the duchy, the vice-chancellor, the registrar, examiner, and first clerk; the five cursitors and clerks in court, who are the attornies; the seal-keeper; and the messenger. The court of Common Pleas for the county palatine is an original superior court of record at common law, having jurisdiction over all real actions for lands, and in all actions against corporations within the county, as well as over all personal actions where the defendant resides in Lancashire, although the cause of action may have arisen elsewhere: its returns are on the first Wednesday in every month. The court is held at Lancaster every assize, before two judges of the courts at Westminster who have chosen the northern circuit, and who are commissioned half-yearly, one as the "Chief Justice," the other as "one of the justices of the Common Pleas at Lancaster." The patent of the judges for the Common Pleas also appoints one of the judges "Chief Justice," and the other "one of the justices of all manner of pleas within the county palatine;" and under this, the causes sent by mittimus from the courts at Westminster are tried at bar, as well as all pleas of the crown. This court is of great advantage to the commercial county of Lancaster, as well because its process for arrests extends to all parts of the county, and may be had without the delay of sending to London, as on account of the celerity and excellence of its practice: a great majority of the cases now tried at Lancaster are brought in this court. The general official business of the court of Common Pleas is transacted by the prothonotary's deputy: the office of prothonotary is a patent office in the gift of the crown, in right of the duchy of Lancaster. The court of King's Bench and the court of Common Pleas at Westminster have concurrent jurisdiction with the court of Common Pleas for the county palatine of Lancaster in almost all cases. The cases in which the jurisdiction of these courts is excluded, and that of the Common Pleas of Lancaster must be adopted, are chiefly pleas of lands within the county, actions against corporations existing in Lancashire, or suits in which a defendant residing there is to be arrested for less than £20. All writs out of the courts at Westminster, except those of Habeas Corpus and Mittimus, are directed to the chancellor, and not to the sheriff in the first instance; and, where execution of them must be done by the sheriff, the chancellor issues his mandate to that officer, and, on receiving his return, certifies in his own name to the court above, that the writ has been duly executed; and if the chancellor return that he commanded the sheriff and has received from him no answer, the court above will rule the sheriff to return the mandate. There is only one franchise in the county having the execution of writs by its own officer, viz., the liberty of Furness, to the bailiff of which the sheriff directs his precepts, and receives from him the requisite returns. There are an attorney-general and two king's counsel for the palatine. The duchy of Lancaster had its star chamber, until that court was dissolved in the 16th of Charles I.

The form of this county is very irregular; for, besides the deviousness of its boundaries on the land side, its coast is indented by numerous bays and æstuaries; the principal of which are, the æstuary of the river Mersey to the south of the county; that of the Ribble; the expanse of the bay of Morecambe, into which open the æstuaries of the Ken and the Leven; and the æstuary of the Dudden, lying west of the northernmost part of the county. On the north-west portion of Lancashire is the island of Walney, a long strip of land separated from the tract called Low Furness by a narrow channel of the sea. Various other small islands lie scattered within the vicinity of this, and eastward of the southern part of it, the largest being that of Old Barrow, near which are Ramsey island and the island of Dova Haw; and at the entrance of Pile harbour is that on which Foudrey castle stands, and which forms a triangle with Roe island, Sheep island, and Foulney island. Lancashire is naturally divided into two grand districts,—the high, mountainous, heathy tract of the northern and eastern parts, and the low, level tract which spreads out to the south and west; the line of division between which may be drawn in a sinuous course, below the first rising grounds of the high heathy tracts, from the south-eastern limit of the county, by the towns of Oldham, Rochdale, Bury, Bolton, Chorley, Preston, Garstang, Lancaster, and Kellet, nearly to Burton, on the northern boundary. The two portions of high craggy land situated in that part of the county which lies furthest to the north-west may also be separated from the more level tracts, by a line passing from the boundary of the county just below Yealand, by Warton, Lindreth, Silverdale, and Allithwaite, to Newland, Ulverstone, and the line that forms the division between High and Low Furness, passing above Dalton, by Kirkby-Ireleth, to Dudden Sands. For the clearer description of the surface and of the various soils of these two districts, it will be necessary to make the following subdivisions, viz.: the hilly and high heathy division; the steep fell, or High Furness, division; the elevated craggy limestone division; the valley-land division; the Mersey, or southern, division; the Ribble and Fylde division; the Lune and flat limestone division; the Low Furness division; and the moss, or peaty, division. The first of these comprises different mountainous ridges which rise in succession from the south-eastern boundary of the county towards the town of Rochdale, and terminate in the high rocky tract above Leek, extending in breadth from the great line of division already marked out to the confines of Yorkshire. Throughout the whole of this extent the land is almost invariably of the high moory freestone kind, and generally produces a coarse black heath, excepting only where the vales intervene. The second division comprises the whole of those high rocky tracts called fells, situated north of the sands (the extensive flat tracts of the bay of Morecambe, which are always dry at low water, and separate the northern division of the hundred of Lonsdale from the rest of the county), extending, in one direction, from the towns of Ulverstone and Dalton to the river Brathay; and in the other, from the river Dudden to the river Winster at Bowland bridge. This tract is moory in different places, but the heath where it occurs is weak in its growth: the rock is in general of the blue, or whinstone kind. The third, or craggy limestone division, is of much smaller extent, the principal part of it lying chiefly in the north-western part of the county, and extending from a little above Warton and Yealand to the point where it joins the sea-coast at Silverdale: there are small tracts in the Furness districts, and at the two Kellets, as well as at Chipping and Clitheroe towards the eastern limits of the county. The fourth division includes the various vallies formed by the hills that constitute the two first divisions: some of these are of very considerable extent, others very narrow, the more extensive vallies being those which border on the larger and less impetuous rivers: the aggregate quantity of this kind of land is very considerable, and generally of excellent quality. The Mersey division comprises a fertile and level tract of land, and extends from the northern bank of the Mersey to the southern border of the Ribble, in one direction; and from the sea-coast to considerably above the town of Oldham, in the other. The sixth division is of less extent than the preceding, but little inferior in fertility; and stretches from the northern bank of the Ribble to the southern border of the Lune, and from Lytham and Bispham to near Inglewhite. The seventh division is of small size, commencing at Sunderland point, at the mouth of the Lune, and running northward, in a narrow tract along the sea-coast, as far as the before-mentioned high, craggy, limestone ridge, by Warton and Yealand: to the east of this rises the ridge of high moory ground above Kellet. The eighth division comprises a small portion of land on the northern side of the sands, generally called Low Furness: it extends from a little above Ulverstone and Dalton to the extreme southern point at Rampside, being bounded on both sides by the sea, and includes the several small islands that lie to the south. The ninth and last division includes the different peaty and boggy tracts called mosses: they are found in both of the grand natural divisions of the county, but they are by much the most extensive in the flat district; the two largest being Chat-moss near Worsley, in the southern part of the county, and Pilling-moss, much farther north: in some situations these mossy tracts have undergone great improvement, but in others they remain nearly in their original state. The lands of the first four of these divisions are chiefly in pasture, the more high and mountainous parts being for sheep, the declivities and vales for cattle and sheep. The next four divisions are under various systems of cultivation, but grass land mostly prevails, especially in the vicinities of the towns and villages. The improved boggy tracts generally become excellent land for either grass or grain. Besides the districts above described, there are various tracts of sandy marsh land, lying on the borders of the sea-coast, which are liable to occasional inundations by the tide, and the principal of which are situated towards the northern extremity of the county, being those near Lancaster, the tract below Warton, the æstuaries of the Leven and Dudden, and the marsh lands about Walney island.

The air of Lancashire, though everywhere pure and salubrious, is much more cold and piercing in the elevated mountainous tracts of the north and east, than in the vallies formed by them, and in the lower districts which shelve to the south and west, where it is generally mild and genial. Great vicissitudes of heat and cold are felt in the vicinity of the large mosses, in consequence of the evaporation of the moisture which is there so long retained. In the most northern part of Lancashire, the breezes that come directly from the Irish sea, and those that have crossed the mountains of Cumberland, in the spring and summer months, are frequently cold and chilling. A greater quantity of rain falls in this county than in most others of the kingdom. The seed time and harvest in the districts contiguous to the mountains of the north and east are later than in the southern and south-western tracts.

The principal soils are loams of various kinds, clay, sand, and peat-earth: the substrata on which these rest are chiefly freestone, whin-stone, or limestone rocks, fossil coal, marl, gravel, and sand. The greater part of the high ranges of hills in the eastern and northern parts of the county, their declivities more especially, are overrun with the heath plant, which rarely exists, except where there is a soil of peaty matter, which in these tracts is sometimes of considerable depth: where these peaty materials are mixed with earthy particles they form a good friable mould, which constitutes the higher parts of the high ridges and of the lower elevations. In some situations this peat-earth is mixed with a sort of blue clay, having a marly substratum: the depth of these soils is from six or seven inches to several feet. Lancaster and Scotforth moors have most of the stiff clayey substance in the composition of their soils, which are generally of smaller depth. The soils of the moors north of the sands are generally much thinner than those to the south, but of a better quality. Compared with the tracts just mentioned, the deep moss and peat lands are of very small extent: they are met with both in the hollows of the high mountain ridges and on the declivities of the hills, as well as in the extended plains below, but those in the latter situation are the deepest and of the greatest extent: they consist of two beds, the upper of which is generally in thin lamina of a brownish colour, and very open and spongy in its texture; the lower bed is a kind of hard, compact, black, vegetable earth, generally having below it clay or marl, occasionally mixed with fine white sand: rocky strata are also sometimes found below the peaty matter. On the banks of the numerous streams is much rich valley land, provincially called holme, the quality of which varies much according to situation and other circumstances. The largest and most fertile of these vales are those of the Ribble, the Lune, and the Wyer, the soil being a rich loam, varying in depth from one foot to upwards of four, the ordinary depth being about two feet. The soil of such valley tracts as have hardly any stream through them is inferior in quality to those just mentioned, always bearing affinity to the soils of the adjacent rising grounds: these vallies form the richest pastures and meadows of the county. A tract of rich loam occupies the whole space between the Mersey and the Ribble, and between the sea-coast and the eastern hilly tract: the prevailing colours of the loam are yellow, red, brown, and black; some of them have almost the tenacity of clay, while others are light and sandy; and all of them are fertile, excepting only the peaty loams. The greater part of this district is under grass, and the remainder devoted to tillage. Clayey loam of different qualities forms the soil of the tract which stretches from the northern bank of the Ribble to the southern border of the Lune, and extends in breadth from the sea-coast to the foot of the mountainous range on the eastern side of the county: the lower part of this constitutes the rich tract of corn land commonly called the Fylde. Almost the whole extent of land from below Stalmine, by Pree-sall, to Pilling hall, having Pilling-moss on one side and the sea on the other, has an alluvial soil intermixed in different parts with white sand and peat-earth. About one-third of this whole tract is under tillage; the rest is chiefly appropriated to the dairy. In the northern part of the county are tracts of dry loam and limestone soils, which are separated from each other by the æstuaries of the Ken and the Leven, and by the bay of Morecambe: one extent reaches from the northern bank of the Lune and its æstuary to that part of the boundary of the county which runs from Herring Syke, by the crag at Dalton and Leighton Beck, to beyond Yealand, spreading between the sea-coast and the hilly moors: another tract extends from the point of sea-coast near Rampside to above the towns of Dalton and Ulverstone, being bounded by the sea on both sides; this latter tract is called Low Furness, and includes the islands of Walney, Old Barrow, &c., at its southern extremity. A small portion of this kind of land extends from Allithwaite to beyond Flookborough, and is bounded on one side by the sea, and on the other by the high craggy ground: there is also a small tract on the eastern side of the county, stretching from below the town of Clitheroe, in a northerly direction, to the boundary of the county, and from the banks of the Ribble to Pendle hill. The surface of these limestone soils is throughout very uneven, the rocks frequently projecting above it; but they nevertheless comprise many fertile tracts of land: the soil in higher situations is frequently thin, but very friable; in the flatter districts it is of considerable depth. The island of Walney contains some good land of a strong quality, resting on a clay or on a sandy bottom: in the central part of the island the soil is a clayey loam, sometimes blended with sand: towards the north it is at some places mixed with peat-earth: at each end of the island the land is sandy. The soil of Old Barrow island is a fine turnip loam, of tolerable depth. The small island of Foulney is chiefly marshy alluvial land, under grass.

It has been computed that a little more than one-fourth of the land of this county is under tillage: the principal tracts of arable land lie towards its western border, including those of the Fylde, the banks of the Lune, and Low Furness: most of these are excellent wheat lands; but on the eastern side of the county the grain chiefly cultivated is oats, great quantities being also grown in all the corn districts. The principal object with most of the farmers in the western part of the county is to obtain crops of potatoes and wheat, with the intervention of as few other crops as possible. The crops most cultivated are wheat, barley, oats, beans, and potatoes. The general average produce of wheat is estimated at about twenty-five bushels per statute acre; that of barley at about thirty-five bushels. There is a greater proportion of oats than of any other grain grown in this county, a great quantity of oaten bread being consumed by the population of the northern and eastern parts of it: the produce is about forty-five bushels per acre. The produce of beans varies much, according to the quality and fitness of the soils. Great attention is paid to the cultivation of potatoes, which are extensively grown in all parts of the county, the crop succeeding extremely well on the various kinds of loam, and on the drier peaty soils: the usual produce is from three hundred to three hundred and fifty bushels per acre. Onions are grown to a considerable extent in the neighbourhood of Middleton, Stretford, and other places near Warrington. Very fine crops of clover are cultivated in this county, the seed being generally sown with wheat. Rye, peas, tares, common turnips, Swedish turnips, cabbages, carrots, and lucerne, are also cultivated, but none of them to such an extent as the crops above-mentioned. By far the greater part of the county is under grass, immense quantities of hay being requisite for the supply of the horses and cows belonging to the inhabitants of the towns: a great extent of grass land is also occupied as bleaching-grounds. This kind of land may be distinguished into the rich hay meadows, the fine feeding and dairy grounds, and the coarse pastures and elevated sheep tracts. The meadow lands are chiefly the valley tracts on the banks of the numerous streams of the county; the richest being those which lie low and are frequently flooded. The richer pastures are usually employed in feeding, or for the dairy, generally the latter when near large towns: the best feeding pastures are considered to be those on the borders of the Lune and the Ribble. There are also rich pastures on the banks of different streams in various parts of the county, as well as some near Liverpool. There are some small tracts of excellent marsh land at different places on the sea-coast. In the greater part of the county, and more especially in the eastern and northern parts of it, are large tracts of pasture land of inferior quality and unimproved condition: upon these much young stock is reared and kept. In the vicinity of the large towns and villages numerous and extensive dairies are kept, for supplying them with milk. In the eastern parts of the county are many small dairy farms; but the most extensive dairy pastures are those on the strong soil north of the Ribble, the produce of which is principally cheese, and those in different parts of the Fylde. To the north of the Lune are some small dairy pastures, which produce excellent butter and a small quantity of cheese. North of Lancaster sands are large dairy pastures furnishing both cheese and butter of excellent quality: these are found in different parts of Low Furness, and also around Hawkeshead, and at different places in the northernmost portion of the county. There are many extensive, mountainous, and moory tracts of land in the northern and eastern parts, provincially called fells, which support vast numbers of sheep through most of the year. These sheep are frequently thus pastured in common, being brought down into the enclosed pastures only for a short time in the depth of winter. Besides the common manures, the lands derive considerable benefit from the use of marl as a manure: this substance is very generally met with, and is more valuable in proportion to the quantity of calcareous matter it may contain. Sea-sand and muscles are also esteemed of great value in some situations, as well as peat-earth, and a particularly fat, unctuous kind of clay, which is dug close to the sea-shore in some places. The breed of cattle, commonly called "Lancashire long-horns," though in much request in the midland counties, is not very frequently met with in Lancashire: the cows do not afford so much milk as some other breeds, but the cream is generally richer, and in greater quantity. Where feeding is the object in view, this and the small Scotch breed are kept; but where much milk is wanted, the short-horned or Holderness cows, the Suffolk poll cows, the Yorkshire red sort, and sometimes the improved Derbyshire breed, are kept: the long-horned breed are, however, found on the best dairy farms of the middle and northern parts of the county. In Lancashire cattle are seldom worked; but when they are, the long-horned breed is mostly employed. In most parts of the county the farmers rear the greater part of their stock. The larger grass farms near populous towns supply them with milk, the smaller farms with butter, cheese being made in the more remote parts of the county. In several places cheese of excellent quality is made, equal in many respects to that of Cheshire: the cows commonly kept for this purpose are of the long-horned or native breed; each cow produces from two to three hundred weight of cheese annually. Several long-horned and Scotch cattle are fattened in the pastures, though but few cattle of any sort are fed in stalls during the winter. The only breed of sheep peculiar to the county are those on the crags near Warton and Silverdale, of which tract they are natives: they are of good size, have small horns, and white spotted faces, and are much esteemed for the flavour of their flesh, their proneness to fatten, and the fineness of their wool. Few sheep are found in the southern part of the county; but in the northern many are bred and kept upon the mountains and the moors: these sheep are an inferior sort, being of the heath and of the Welch breed, with coarse wool. They are turned on the hills early in the spring, and remain there until November, when they are brought down into the enclosed pastures: at three or four years old they are usually sorted, and sold off for fattening in the pastures of the lowlands. In this manner are also managed numerous large flocks, which are kept on the mountainous tracts of the eastern parts of the county, as well as others on the mountainous lands north of Lancaster sands: upon Furness fells it is reckoned that not less than fifty thousand sheep are kept during the summer months; some becoming quite fat, and affording meat of the finest quality. In this county sheep are never folded with the view of improving the land. The new Leicester, and the South-Down breed of sheep, have been introduced into Lancashire, and found to succeed in most parts of it. Of hogs there is a middle-sized white sort, with slouched ears, which is peculiar to this county, and is frequently met with in the district north of Lancaster; but there is no prevailing breed, the main supply being obtained from dealers, who bring them from Berkshire, Shropshire, Cheshire, and Yorkshire, as also from Wales and Ireland. In almost every part of Lancashire are bred good horses of various kinds: those in most request are strong team horses; stout, compact saddle horses; and a light middle-sized breed for mail-coach and post horses. Near all the towns of magnitude are lands of considerable extent applied to the raising of vegetables and fruit: the horticultural fields in the neighbourhood of Liverpool more especially, are very extensive; for, besides the supply of the town, great quantities of vegetables are required for the shipping; quantities of dried herbs are carried out to Africa, and onions also are exported. There are pretty good orchards in different parts of the county; the chief difficulty in raising the trees is that of protecting them from the violence of the western and south-western winds. The soil of the older orchards is often under grass, but that of the younger plantations is generally cultivated with either the spade or the plough. Various agricultural societies have been established in different parts of the county. The Manchester Agricultural Society was instituted in the year 1767, its views being at first confined to the hundred of Salford, but they have since been extended to a district of about thirty miles round it, comprehending the northern and central parts of the county of Chester: its meetings are held twice in each year, one time at Manchester, the other at Altrincham in Cheshire. Some time after this, another society of the same kind was established in the south-western part of the county, and, from the name of the hundred in which it is situated, it is denominated the West Derby Agricultural Society. A similar institution has been formed in the eastern part of the county, which holds its half-yearly meetings at Whalley, and is called the Whalley Agricultural Society. Northward of all these, Lancaster has for some time had its agricultural society; and one was established at Ulverstone, in the year 1805, called the North Lonsdale Agricultural Society.

The waste lands consist either of moors and mountain land, or of the boggy tracts called mosses, and of marshes; they are of considerable extent, though of late years different commons have been enclosed, and some of the mosses have long been under tillage. The quantity of waste mountain land is computed at about sixty-two thousand acres; and that of the mosses and marshes at about thirty-six thousand acres, of which twenty thousand are contained in the mosses, and the remainder in the marshes, which latter are chiefly found on the western coast. The two most extensive tracts of improved moss-land are Trafford-moss, which is now for the most part converted into grass land; and Chat-moss, the draining of which is of later date. The tracts which formerly constituted the Forest of Myerscough, Fulwood, Bleasdale, Wyersdale, and Quernmoor, situated in the more northern parts of the county, in the hundreds of Amounderness and Lonsdale, are the property of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The three first of these lie along the side of the great road from Preston to Lancaster: Myerscough Forest is wholly enclosed; but those of Fulwood and Bleasdale still have large tracts of unenclosed ground, more especially where they approach the high ridges of the eastern part of the county. The Forest of Wyersdale now forms the township of that name, which lies along the elevated tract on the Yorkshire boundary: it is divided into twelve different portions, which still retain the ancient name of vaccaries, or cow-pastures; four of these divisions are wholly enclosed, but the rest have all of them out-pastures, which are high mountainous commons and fells, frequently of great extent. The Quernmoor Forest tract is situated further north, and is much smaller than that of Wyersdale, but contains several vaccaries: the whole of it is now enclosed. These two last-mentioned forests have separate courts, which are held half-yearly by the master forester.

In this county there are many stone fences: dry stone walls are frequently found in the north and north-eastern parts; dashed walls, and walls built with mortar, are most commonly seen in the northernmost part only; sod walls are met with in several places on the borders of the sea. The woods of the county are chiefly in the more central parts, about Garstang, on the banks of the Wyer, the Ribble, the Lune, and some other rivers, and in the parks of several of the nobility and gentry. The principal coppice woods are in the northern parts of the county, the land on which they grow being chiefly steep and rocky, and unfit for any other purpose: their main produce is hoop-wood, charcoal, props for the coal mines, and oak-bark. Various plantations have been made in different parts of the county, and, amongst other trees, of the alder, which is in great request in the manufacturing districts, where it is used to hang cotton yarn on to dry, the wood acquiring a fine polish by use, and not splintering from exposure to the weather: the bark of this is made use of in dyeing.

The freestone substrata are of three kinds, yellow, white, and red, and are found in almost every district of the county. The blue rocky substratum prevails most in the elevated tracts of the liberty of Furness, and the division of Cartmel, north of the sands. The limestone substrata, which are much dispersed, are mostly white in the north-western part of the county, but near the eastern boundary they are often of a dark brown or black colour. The limestone and freestone substrata are often intermingled in a remarkable manner. Coal is too deep from the surface to form the basis of soils, except in some places towards the eastern boundary of the county, where it approaches very near the surface. Clay and marl, both separate and mingled, frequently form the subsoils of the flat tracts, and are met with at the depth of from five or six inches to several feet. Gravel and sand in flat situations, and the latter on elevated ground also, are sometimes found to constitute the subsoil. The chief mineral productions are coal, copper, lead, and iron. The strata of coal seem to lie for the most part in three distinct parallel ranges, running across the county from south-west to north-east: the first begins near Worsley, and takes its course north of Manchester, by Bury and Rochdale, to the eastern boundary of the county above Todmorden; the next, which is the most extensive tract, commences below Prescott, and passes south of Blackburn, by Colne, to the Yorkshire boundary, which it crosses; and the third, which is by far the smallest, begins above Lancaster, in the township of Quernmoor, and extends by Caton, Farleton, Tatham, and Winnington, to the borders of Yorkshire. These strata lie in some places at a very great depth, while in others they approach very near the surface; their thickness and quality also vary greatly, even in the different shafts of the same colliery: coal of a black, compact, marbly appearance, called cannel coal, is found chiefly at Haigh, near Wigan. Numerous coal pits are sunk in various parts of the tracts above mentioned; most of the large collieries having steam-engines of great power. Though coal is the ordinary fuel, yet, in the vicinity of the mosses, peat and coal are burned together. The principal tract in which copper is found in any considerable quantity is among the rugged barren mountains in the northernmost part of the High Furness district, approaching the borders of Cumberland. Here are only two mines, Conistone and Muckle Gill; the former being the older. The ore obtained from both mines is of the yellow sort, and but poor in metal: after the ore obtained at Muckle Gill has been cleaned, sorted, and broken, it is forwarded to Cheadle in Staffordshire, there to be smelted and manufactured into wire, and sheets for coppering the bottoms of ships. Lead-ore is chiefly found in the northern and eastern parts of the county, but it is nowhere obtained in great quantities. The Anglezark mine has been worked for a long time: the ore is of the common blue lead kind. The only part of the county where iron is found in sufficient quantity to be worked is in the liberty of Furness, on the north side of Lancaster sands: the principal mines are Lindal Moor and Cross Gates. The ore raised at Lindal Moor is generally either sent to the furnace at Newland, or to Old Barrow, to be shipped for Wales, the Carron works, and other places; that obtained at Cross Gates mine is chiefly conveyed to the neighbourhood of Broughton, where are extensive smelting-works. The county produces abundance of slates, flag-stones, limestone, and freestone, for the purposes of building. The blue slate quarries are very numerous, but are chiefly in the rocky mountainous tracts of the northern parts of High Furness: slate of a lighter colour and very inferior quality is raised at different places in the county, south of the sands, and at the same places flag-stones are likewise obtained. Quarries of freestone are wrought in most parts of the county, south of the sands: the best sort of stones for sharpening scythes is found and prepared at Rainford. Tracts of limestone, generally of small extent, exist in different parts of the county, both north and south of the sands, in which numerous quarries are worked.

The pre-eminence of the manufactures of Lancashire over those of the other districts in England where the inhabitants are similarly engaged, has long been known and acknowledged. These manufactures are various; but that of cotton in its different branches is by far the most important, and is one of the most extensive in the world. Manchester is its grand centre, and from that town it has extended over the adjoining and more northern parts of Lancashire, as well as into the adjacent counties on the east and south. Soon after the year 1328, about which time the emigrant clothiers from Flanders were dispersed over England, Manchester became famous for the manufacture of a species of woollen goods, called "Manchester cottons." In the reign of Henry VIII. this county had made some further progress in manufactures and commerce: and at the period of the national disturbances, in the reign of Charles I., the manufactures of linen and cotton, as well as of woollen, were carried on here. Until the year 1760, the sale of cotton goods had been almost entirely for home consumption; but about that period, considerable markets for this species of goods were opened on the continents of Europe and America, and the consequent urgent demand encouraged great and valuable improvements in the machinery employed. These improvements, the successfully-attained object of which was to lessen the requisite quantity of manual labour, on their first introduction, gave rise to great tumults, the inhabitants of the manufacturing districts destroying the machines, in consequence of the groundless fear that they should otherwise be thrown out of employment. One of the most recent inventions of this kind is the power-loom. A factory of steam looms was first erected in this district at Manchester, in 1806, with two others at Stockport, and a fourth at West Houghton, since which period they have been erected throughout the manufacturing district generally. In each of these mills every process, from the picking of the raw cotton to its conversion into cloth, is performed; and on a scale of such magnitude that in a single factory is done as much work as would, in the last age, have engaged an entire district. The steam looms are chiefly employed in the production of printing cloth and shirting; but they also weave thick-sets, fancy cords, dimities, cambrics, and quiltings, besides silks, worsted, and woollen broad cloths. Inkles, tapes, and checks, with woollens, flannels, baizes, and linens, all rank among the manufactures of this county, and have each their proper seat. The silk trade, which had formerly flourished to a considerable extent, but fell into decay in consequence of the rapid growth of the cotton business, has of late revived, and is now carried on with increased activity. The spinning and manufacture of cotton prevail at Manchester, Oldham, Colne, Burnley, Haslingden, Preston, Accrington, Bury, Middleton, Ashton, Bolton, Chorley, Blackburn, Heap, Stayley, Wigan, Eccles, Bacup, Chowbent, Rochdale, &c.; calico-printing and bleaching at Manchester, Blackburn, Bolton, Bury, Accrington, and Chorley; muslins at Manchester, Bolton, Chorley, and Preston; and fustians at Manchester, Oldham, Bury, Bolton, Warrington, and Heap. The manufacture of woollen goods is extensively carried on at Manchester, Bury, Bacup, Newchurch, Rochdale, and Heap: flannels are made at Manchester, Rochdale, and Haslingden. There are several hat manufactories at Manchester, Oldham, Rochdale, Denton, Bolton, Audenshaw, Howley Hill, Colne, and Wigan. Paper is made at Manchester, Bolton, Blackburn, Farnworth, Ashton, and Warrington. Lancaster, the county town, possesses comparatively but little of the above manufactures, its chief trade being in the manufacture and exportation of mahogany furniture and upholstery. In the town of Warrington are large manufactories for pins, glass, and other articles; but the principal employment is in the making of sail-cloth. At Ulverstone, as well as at Caton, are manufactories for the working of flax, and at the former town some checks are manufactured. There are many iron works and nail manufactories in different parts of the county: the principal works of this kind are those for smelting iron-ore, in that portion of the county which lies north of Lancaster sands. In this part of the county also, on the banks of the Leven, are powder-mills. Glass and earthenware establishments are very numerous, the largest being at St. Helen's and Warrington; and in the south-western part of the county, watches, watch movements, and watch tools, are made to a considerable extent and in great perfection. In these various branches of manufacture is employed an immense number of persons: it is supposed that not less than one hundred and fifty thousand individuals are engaged in the cotton trade alone in Lancashire; the economy of labour produced by machinery at the same time being, in some of its branches, the spinning more especially, so great, that one man and four children will spin [as much yarn as was spun by six hundred women and girls fifty years ago. Immense quantities of cotton yarn are exported for the supply of the manufactures of France, Germany, and Switzerland.

The commerce of Lancashire, like its manufactures and in conjunction with them, has risen with unexampled rapidity, and attained an importance unequalled by that of any other county, Middlesex alone excepted. Besides the great port of Liverpool, there are the minor ones of Lancaster, Ulverstone, and Preston, which have each a coasting trade, though very little foreign commerce. Great part of the foreign commerce of Lancashire, of which Liverpool is the grand medium, consists in the exportation of the manufactures of the county, together with the woollens and cutlery of Yorkshire, the produce of the salt-mines of Cheshire, the earthenware of Staffordshire, and the hardware of Warwickshire, which are poured into this great western emporium, and thence forwarded to America and the West Indies, Africa and the East Indies, and to the continent of Europe, exclusively of the vast trade with Ireland. The imports consist of cotton, sugar, tobacco, rice, corn, timber, and a variety of other commodities, the productions of every civilized country and of all climates. The canal system of inland navigation, which in this county is peculiarly extensive, and to which may be added the important ranges of newly formed rail-roads, facilitate and expedite this immense traffic in an astonishing degree.

merous : the Mersey, the Ribble, and the Lune, or Loyne, are its largest rivers ; and next to these in magnitude are the Irwell, the Douglas, the Wyer, the Leven, the Crake, and the Dudden, all of which to some extent are navigable. The Mersey constitutes the southern boundary of this county, separating it from Cheshire, and is formed by the small rivers Tame, Etherow, and Goyt, which respectively rise in the counties of York, Chester, and Derby, and unite at Stockport, from which town the Mersey takes a winding south-westerly course, and below Warrington spreads into a channel of considerable breadth, the greater part of which is dry at low water ; but it is suddenly contracted by the projecting point of land opposite Runcorn, below which it again expands, and having been augmented by various streams, forms a large æstuary, which opens into the Irish sea, in a north-westerly direction a little below Liverpool, being much narrower opposite that town than it is some miles further inland. The tide flows up this river as far as the vicinity of Warrington, where it is stopped by a weir. In pursuance of an act of parliament obtained in the year 1720, for making navigable the rivers Mersey and Irwell, in that part of their course lying between Liverpool and Manchester, this river, by the aid of an artificial cut from the south of Warrington to some distance above that town, pursuant to an act obtained in 1720, is made navigable for barges of from sixty to seventy tons' burden, as far as the mouth of the Irwell, which latter river in like manner is rendered navigable up to Manchester : the Mersey yields salmon, smelts, and soles, besides a great variety of other fish. The Ribble rises in the moors above Craven in Yorkshire, and having formed the boundary between that county and Lancashire for a few miles in the vicinity of Clitheroe, it enters the county, and intersects it from east to west, passing by Ribchester and Preston, below which latter town it soon expands into a broad æstuary which joins the Irish sea. The tide flows up this river as high as Preston, near to which place it is navigable for vessels of small burden. Salmon of delicious flavour frequent this river, and the fishery extends as high as Brockholes. The Lune, or Loyne, has its rise in the mountainous tracts of Westmorland, and entering this county a little below the bridge at Kirkby-Lonsdale, pursues a south-westerly course to Lancaster, and some distance lower widens into a broad æstuary, and finally joins the Irish sea at Sunderland point. This river is navigable for small vessels to Lancaster, but ships of great burden can pass no higher than Glasson point : like the other navigable rivers of Lancashire, it affords a plentiful supply of salmon. The Irwell is formed by several small streams which rise in the hilly tracts to the south of Haslingden, and runs in an irregular southerly course by Bury to Manchester, where it becomes navigable : from this town it takes a south-westerly course, and falls into the Mersey a little below Flixton : flowing through the most populous districts of the county, this river affords great advantage to the different manufactories situated on its banks. The Douglas rises on the moors of Anglezark, to the north of Rivington Pike, and taking a southerly course to Wigan, runs from that town in a north-westerly direction, and falls into the æstuary of the Ribble at Hesketh Bank. In the year 1727 this river was made navigable from the Ribble as high as Wigan, under the provisions of an act passed in 1719 :

by means of this work the northern parts of Lancashire and Westmorland are supplied with coal from this district, which receives limestone and slate from those parts in return : the navigation has been improved at a later date by the substitution, in a part of its course, of an artificial cut for the natural channel of the river. The Wyer has its source in the hills on the eastern border of the county, and flows in a south-westerly direction to Lower Garstang, where it takes a more westerly course, by Garstang Church Town, to Poulton, in the neighbourhood of which town it fast increases in breadth, and, turning towards the north, expands into a spacious bason called Wyer Water, which is terminated by a narrow passage through which the river flows into the Irish sea. The Wyer is navigable for small vessels up to Poulton : upon its banks are various factories ; and the scenery of the valley through which it flows is in many places bold and romantic. The Leven is the rapid river which flows out of the lake of Winandermere, through the township of Haverthwaite, into a large æstuary opening into the bay of Morecambe. The Crake flows from the southern extremity of Conistone-lake into the æstuary of the Leven, near Penny-bridge. The Dudden, which, through almost the whole of its course, forms the boundary between this county and Cumberland, has its source among the small lakes, provincially called tarns, above Seathwaite, in the hilly tracts of High Furness, and, flowing southward, forms a large bay to the south-west of Broughton. The mouth of the Ken, from Westmorland, which opens into the bay of Morecambe, isolates the northern division of the hundred of Lonsdale from the rest of the county. The smaller streams are numberless ; those most worthy of mention are the Alt, the East Calder, the West Calder, the torrent of Leck-beck, which falls into the Lune, and the Winster, which for some miles forms the boundary between that portion of the county which lies north of the sands and Westmorland. In the northernmost portion of the county are different sheets of water : of these Conistone lake, sometimes called Thurston water, is situated in the northern part of the High Furness district, between two ranges of rocky mountainous land, and extends in length six or seven miles from north to south, the breadth varying from half a mile to three-quarters : its greatest depth is stated to be about forty fathoms : its principal fish are char, trout, and perch, and of all an abundance. Only a small contracted portion of the magnificent lake of Winandermere is contained in this county, but that piece of water bounds it on the east for the distance of eight or ten miles. Esthwaite water is situated to the east of Hawkeshead, and is about a mile and a half in length, and somewhat less than half a mile in breadth, being contracted in the middle by a projection from each side : its fish are pike, trout, eels, and perch. Hareswater, which is of no great extent, lies northward of Leighton-moss : its fish are pike and eels. During the winter, Marten mere, near Ormskirk, is a large sheet of water ; but in summer it becomes nearly dry. In the northern parts of the county are different smaller lakes, commonly called tarns. The springs which break forth from the more elevated grounds of the county are very numerous : some are medicinal, as at Cartmel, Flookborough, Wigan, and other places. The artificial inland navigation of this county is very extensive, and it was here that the canal navigation of modern times first took its rise. The first attempts of this kind were in rendering navigable the streams which run through these manufacturing and commercial districts; and after the deepening of the rivers before mentioned, an act was passed, in 1755, for making Sankey brook navigable, and in 1761 another act was obtained, which provided for the extension of the same line: the present navigation is called the Sankey canal, and runs entirely separate from the brook, except at one spot about two miles below Sankey bridge, where it crosses it on a level: at the distance of about nine miles and a quarter from its termination in the Mersey, it divides into three branches; and from the Mersey to the extremity of the longest of these the distance is eleven miles and three quarters, with a fall of about sixty feet: this canal is of great benefit to the collieries and the various manufactories near it, in the vicinity of the populous town of St. Helen's.

The magnificent plans which have rendered the name of the Duke of Bridgewater so celebrated in the history of canal navigation, began to unfold themselves in 1758 and 1759, an act having passed in the former year enabling that nobleman to form a canal from Worsley to Salford, and also to Hollin-ferry on the Irwell; and another in the latter year permitting him to deviate from that course, and carry his canal from Worsley across the river Irwell to Manchester. The formation of this canal was the work of that eminent self-taught engineer, James Brindley: at its upper extremity at Worsley it passes through a tunnel of almost half a mile in length, partly arched with brick, and partly formed by the solid rock, whence it has been extended in various directions to the distance of thirty miles. As it was a main object to keep this canal as much on the level as possible, the embankments and aqueducts in its course are numerous; but of the latter, that by far the most remarkable is at Barton, by which it passes over the navigable river Irwell, and which consists of three massive stone arches, of which the central arch is sixty-three feet wide, and thirty-eight feet high above the surface of the water, admitting the largest barges which navigate the Irwell to go through with masts and sails standing, and affording the curious and interesting spectacle of one vessel sailing over the top of another. But before this first design was completed, the Duke of Bridgewater conceived the plan of extending his canal, by a branch which, running through part of Cheshire, in a line parallel with the river Mersey, should at length terminate in that river, below the limits of its artificial navigation. An act of parliament was accordingly obtained for the formation of this canal, which was completed in the five years following, and extends from Longford bridge, in the township of Stretford, to the river Mersey at Runcorn-gap, a distance of more than twenty-nine miles: it is carried over the Mersey by an aqueduct similar to that over the Irwell, but lower, as the river is not there navigable. In consequence of the formation of this canal, the rates of carriage between Liverpool and Manchester were reduced, at least one-half. Under the sanction of an act passed in 1795, a branch has been cut from the Duke of Bridgewater's canal at Worsley to Leigh. The act for the formation of the Leeds and Liverpool canal, one of the greatest works of the kind in the kingdom, was obtained in 1770, and the work was commenced the same year. From its highest level in the basin of Foulridge, near Colne, the fall on the Lancashire side is four hundred and thirty-three feet four inches; and from this head it passes, in a south-westerly direction, by the towns of Burnley and Blackburn, and having crossed the river Douglas makes a large circuit round Ormskirk, at last reaching the Mersey, at the lower part of the town of Liverpool. A branch from this canal to Wigan is upwards of seven miles and a half in length, with a fall of thirty-six feet, and when first completed, which was with great expedition, afforded to Liverpool a new and plentiful supply of coal, and caused a considerable exportation of that commodity from the port. Under the authority of acts of parliament passed at various periods, different alterations and improvements have been made in this canal by the company to which it belongs; and one of these, passed in 1794, gave them the power of navigating a part of the then newly-formed Lancaster canal: in pursuance of an act obtained in 1819, a navigable cut, six miles in length, was made, from the canal near Wigan to the Duke of Bridgewater's canal at Leigh. The whole length of the Leeds and Liverpool canal (including the portion of the Lancaster canal navigated by the Leeds and Liverpool Company, the length of which is nearly eleven miles) is one hundred and twenty-seven miles and twelve chains: the distance from Liverpool to its junction with the Lancaster canal is seventy-nine miles and twenty-six chains.

In 1791, an act was passed for the formation of a canal which should connect the towns of Manchester, Bolton, and Bury: this commences at the Irwell, on the western side of Manchester, and passes in a northerly course nearly parallel with that river, which it crosses at Clifton, and again at Little Lever, at which latter place there is a branch to Bolton, and another to Bury: its total length is fifteen miles and one furlong, with a rise of one hundred and eighty-seven feet. The district through which this canal passes abounds in coal and other mineral productions, besides which, its inhabitants are engaged in manufactures, and consequently the traffic with Manchester and its vicinity, by means of it, is very great. A cut thirteen miles in length, called the Haslingden Extension, passing by Haslingden, unites this with the Leeds and Liverpool canal, between Blackburn and Burnley, about four miles from the former town: the act for the formation of this extension was obtained in 1793. In 1792 an act was passed, sanctioning the formation of a canal from Manchester to Ashton under Line and the vicinity of Oldham: it commences on the east side of Manchester, crosses the Medlock, passes Fairfield, and terminates at Ashton under Line, there being at Fairfield a branch to the New Mill, near Oldham, from which there is a cut to Park colliery. The whole length of this canal is eleven miles, with a rise of one hundred and fifty-two feet: coal, lime, limestone, and manure, are its chief objects of traffic: there is a branch from this canal to Stockport. An act was passed in 1794, authorising the opening of a line of navigation from the Duke of Bridgewater's canal at Manchester to the Calder navigation at Sowerby bridge, near Halifax, and this, being completed, is called the Rochdale canal. Commencing on the south-west side of Manchester, it leaves that town at its north-eastern extremity, and pursues its course to Failsworth, whence, turning directly north, it proceeds through the tract of coal country about Fox-Denton, Chadderton, Middleton, and Hopwood, at a short distance to the east of Rochdale, to which town a small branch diverges: having passed Littleborough, it gains its summit level about Deanhead, whence it proceeds to Todmorden, at which place it turns north-east to Hebden bridge, and then inclines somewhat to the south-east, until it reaches the Calder navigation at Sowerby bridge; its whole length, from one extremity to the other, being thirty-nine miles and a half, exclusively of two short collateral branches of about a mile and a quarter: from its summit level it falls two hundred and seventy-five feet on the Halifax side, and four hundred and thirty-eight feet seven inches on the Manchester side: great reservoirs have been made in the hilly country, near different parts of the course of this canal, sufficient to supply it abundantly with water. The Huddersfield canal, the act for cutting which passed in 1794, has its western extremity at the Ashton under Line canal, and its eastern at Sir John Ramsden's canal to the Calder: its general direction is north-east; and from Ashton it has its course parallel with the Tame (the windings of which river it frequently crosses), to Stayley-Bridge, and enters Yorkshire in the manufacturing district of Saddleworth: the extreme length of this canal is nineteen miles and three quarters; and its fall, from the head level on the Ashton side, is three hundred and thirty-four feet eight inches. The Kendal and Lancaster canal, for the formation of which an act of parliament was obtained in 1792, commences at Kendal, having a feeder from a rivulet about a mile beyond that town, and proceeding directly southward, enters Lancashire near Burton: at Berwick, a little farther south, it sinks to its mid-level, which it preserves for upwards of forty-two miles, making a very circuitous course, and in some places approaching within a very short distance of the sea-beach: a little above Lancaster it crosses the Lune by a magnificent aqueduct, and afterwards passes eastward and southward of that town: at Garstang it crosses the Wyre, and having made a bend westward, by which it is brought within two miles of Kirkham, it next passes the western side of Preston, and crosses the Ribble; then, ascending through a series of locks, it joins the Leeds and Liverpool canal, and reaches its highest level, on which it proceeds a little to the eastward of Chorley, across the Douglas, and through Haigh, and bending to the east of Wigan, arrives at its termination at West Houghton, after a course of upwards of seventy-five miles and a half: the fall from Kendal to the mid-level is sixty-five feet; and the rise thence on the southern side two hundred and twenty-two feet. A collateral cut in the neighbourhood of Chorley is nearly three miles long; another near Berwick, nearly two miles and a half; and a third, of about four miles in length, communicates with the dock at Glasson, near the mouth of the Lune. The principal objects of this canal are to make an interchange of produce between the coal and the limestone countries, and to form a communication between the port of Lancaster and the interior parts to the north and south. The Ulverstone canal is a short cut, about a mile and a half in length, from that town to the navigable channel of the river Leven.

The most remarkable of these is the Liverpool and Manchester railway, constructed pursuant to an act passed in 1826, and designed to be opened for passengers in August, and for the conveyance of goods, &c., in September, 1830. It commences at the Company's yard in Wapping, Liverpool, by means of a tunnel, which is accessible by an excavation twenty-two feet deep, and forty-six wide, affording space sufficient for four lines of railway, with intervening pillars supporting the beams and flooring of the warehouses built over the excavation, under which the wagons pass to be loaded or unloaded, by means of trap-doors communicating with the upper stories: wagons laden with coal or lime pass under the warehouses to the wharfs at the Wapping end of the station. Proceeding along the tunnel, this level line of railway curves to the right, till it reaches the bottom of the inclined plane, which is perfectly straight, and one thousand nine hundred and eighty yards long, with a uniform rise of three-quarters of an inch in a yard, making the whole rise, from Wapping to the mouth of the tunnel at Edge-hill, one hundred and twenty-three feet. The tunnel is twenty-two feet wide, and sixteen feet high, the sides rising perpendicularly to the height of five feet, and is surmounted by a semicircular arch of eleven feet radius: it is cut through various strata of red rock, blue shale, and clay, but principally through rock of almost every degree of hardness: the space, from its roof to the surface of the ground, varies from five feet to seventy: throughout its entire length, it is lighted with gas, and the sides and roof are white-washed. At the upper end is a spacious and noble area, forty feet below the surface of the ground, excavated in the solid rock, and surmounted on all sides by embattled walls, from which a small tunnel, two hundred and ninety yards in length, fifteen feet wide, and twelve feet high, lighted also with gas, returns parallel with the large one, but inclining upwards in the opposite direction, and terminating at the Company's premises in Crown-street, on the eastern side of the town; this being the principal station for the railway coaches, and the depôt for coal for supplying the upper part of the town. Advancing eastward from the two tunnels, the road passes under a Moorish archway, intended to connect the two engine-houses, and forming the grand entrance to the Liverpool stations, whence it emerges into the open air, and proceeds to a little beyond Wavertree-lane, where it passes through a deep excavation, and under several massive arches, thrown across to form the necessary communication between the roads and farms on each side. Beyond this, about half a mile north-west of the village of Wavertree, is the great rocky excavation through Olive Mount, seventy feet below the surface of the ground; and a little further is the great Raby embankment, formed of the materials dug out of the mount: this embankment extends across the valley for about two miles, varying in height from fifteen feet to forty-five, and in breadth at the base from sixty to one hundred and thirty-five feet. After leaving it, the line crosses the Hayton turnpike-road, and proceeds, in a slightly-curved direction, to the bottom of the inclined plane at Whiston: this plane forms a straight line a mile and a half long, with a rise only of one yard in ninety-six, which, however, causes a perceptible decrease in the velocity of the carriage; but at its termination there is a portion of the road, nearly two miles in length, exactly level. About half a mile from the summit of the inclined plane, the railway passes under a substantial stone bridge on the line of the Liverpool and Manchester turnpike-road, at an angle of 34° : this bridge is a curious and beautiful structure, on the diagonal principle; the span of the arch is fifty-four feet, while that of the railway, from wall to wall, is only thirty; each face of the arch extends diagonally forty-five feet beyond the square. It was in the vicinity of this bridge that the trial of the locomotive engines, which contended for a premium of £500, took place in October, 1829. Passing over the summit level at Rainhill, the road reaches the Sutton inclined plane, which, descending in an opposite direction, is equal, in extent and inclination, to the Whiston plane, the summit level being eighty-two feet above the base of each. It then crosses Par Moss, the foundation of the road along the principal part of it being composed of a deposit of clay and stone, twenty-five feet deep, dug out of the Sutton inclined plane. Continuing its course, the railway is carried over the valley of the Sankey, with its canal at the bottom, by a noble viaduct of nine arches, each fifty feet in the span, built principally of brick faced with stone, at an expense of upwards of £45,000: the height, from the top of the parapets to the water in the canal, is seventy feet, and the width of the railway twenty-five. The approach to this structure is along a stupendous embankment, formed chiefly of clay dug out of the high lands on the borders of the valley. Approaching the borough of Newton, the railway crosses a narrow valley, by a short but lofty embankment, and a bridge of four arches, each fifty feet span. A few miles beyond is the great Kenyon excavation, from which about eight hundred thousand cubic yards of clay were dug, part of which was applied in forming an embankment to the east and west of the excavation, the remainder being deposited in spoil banks on the adjacent lands. Having crossed Bury-lane, and the small river Glazebrook, the road enters upon Chat Moss, a barren waste, comprising an area of about twelve square miles, which it crosses by means of an embankment consisting of about two hundred and seventy-seven thousand cubic yards of moss earth, in the formation of which, about six hundred and seventy-seven thousand cubic yards of raw moss were used; the bottom is composed of clay and sand: the expense of carrying the railway over this moss was £27,719. 11. 10. Beyond Chat Moss it traverses the Barton embankment, crossing the low lands for about a mile, between the moss and the Worsley canal, over which it is carried by a neat stone bridge; thence it proceeds to Manchester, passing through the town of Salford. It is carried over the river Irwell, by a handsome stone bridge of two arches, each sixty-five feet in the span, and thirty feet high from the central summit to the surface of the water; and then over a series of arches to the Company's station, in Water-street, and the Liverpool-road. This railway is thirty-one miles in length, and the expense of its completion, including the cost of machinery and carriages, will amount to upwards of £800,000: there are sixty-three bridges, besides sundry culverts and foot-bridges, along the line. There is a railway from Bolton to Leigh, and thence to the Liverpool and Manchester railway, communicating with the latter at Kenyon, by two branches. A railway from Wigan to Newton, with an extended line from Newton to Warrington, crossing the great railway, is in progress; as is also a line of railway from St. Helen's to Runcorn Gap. There is an extent of iron-railway from West Houghton, by Bulmer bridge, to Preston, upon which coal and other articles are conveyed to the Lancaster canal, at the last-mentioned town. Nearly all the more extensive coal-works have similar roads on a smaller scale; and various manufacturing establishments are likewise provided with them.

The great road from London to Carlisle enters the county from Knutsford in Cheshire, and passing through Warrington, Newton, Wigan, Standish, Preston, Lancaster, and Bolton, quits it for Burton in Westmorland. The great road from London to Manchester and Preston enters the county from Stockport in Cheshire, and passes through Manchester, Bolton (in the Moors, and Chorley. The road from London to Halifax and Clitheroe enters Lancashire from Halifax in Yorkshire, and passes through Burnley. The road from London to Manchester and Clitheroe branches off from the Preston road at Manchester, and passes through Bury and Haslingden. The extent of public roads in Lancashire is very great: those in the coal-tracts about Manchester, Bolton, and Wigan, are all paved. Lancashire has, of late years, become celebrated for the many fine bathing stations along its coast; viz., Liverpool, Blackpool, Bootle, Lytham, South-port, &c., which are resorted to during summer by many thousands.

Eight Roman stations, according to Whitaker, were established within the limits of this county during the administration of Julius Agricola in Britain, viz., Ad Alaunam and Bremetonacæ, in the north, which are conjectured to have been at Lancaster and Overborough, respectively; Portus Sistuntiorum, in the west; Rerigonium and Coccium, about the centre, the latter supposed to have been at Blackrod, or Ribchester; Colonea, on the east, supposed to have been at Colne: and Veratinum and Mancunium on the south, the latter having been at Manchester. From this last station several Roman roads diverged, viz., one south-easterly, towards Stockport; another south-westerly, into Cheshire, by Stretford; a third north-westerly, to Blackrod, from which, near Pendleton, a vicinal way branched off to Warrington; a fourth ran to Coccium, or Ribchester, and thence to Bremetonacæ, or Overborough; a fifth was carried north-east, towards Halifax; and a sixth more easterly, towards Almondbury in Yorkshire. The principal Roman remains discovered in this county have been found at Lancaster, Overborough, Colne, Ribchester, Warrington, and Manchester, the sites of the Roman stations. Of ancient churches the most remarkable are the Collegiate Church of Manchester, and Cartmel church. The number of religious houses before the Reformation was twenty-one, including three hospitals in different places, and the college at Manchester: the principal remains of conventual buildings are those of the abbeys of Whalley, Cockersand, and Furness, especially the latter, which are very extensive. Of ancient castles the principal remains are those at Clitheroe, Dalton, Gleaston, Greenhalgh, Hornby, and Lancaster, of which the last is the most remarkable, and entire, being now used as the county gaol. Of ancient domestic architecture, there are numerous remains throughout the county, of which, Hulme hall, on the banks of the Ir-well, near Manchester, the ancient residence of the Prestwich family; and Speake hall, on the banks of the Mersey, near Liverpool, the ancient residence of the Norris family, are the most curious and perfect specimens, though now fast falling to decay; and among the more distinguished modern seats are, Knowsley hall, the seat of the Earl of Derby; Ashton hall, of the Duke of Hamilton; and Heaton house, of the Earl of Wilton. The most remarkable ancient earthworks are at Aldingham, Overborough, and Brierscliffe.

LANCASTER, a parish comprising the borough, port, and market town of Lancaster, having separate jurisdiction, the chapelries of Caton, Gressingham, Overton, Poulton, and Over Wyersdale, and the townships of Aldcliffe, Ashton with Stodday, Bare, Bulk, Heaton with Oxcliffe, Middleton, Quernmoor, Scotforth, Skerton, Thurnham, and Torrisholme, in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, and the chapelries of Bleasdale, and Stalmine with Stanall, and the townships of Fulwood, Myerscough, and Preesall with Hackersall, in the hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, and containing 19,372 inhabitants, of which number, 10,144 are in the borough of Lancaster, 240 miles (N. N. W.) from London. This place is supposed to have been the Ad Alaunam of the Romans; and the discovery of coins, urns, fragments of earthenware, calcined bones, votive altars, sepulchral lamps, and other Roman antiquities, confirms the probability of its having been occupied as a station by that people. After the departure of the Romans from Britain, it was destroyed by an incursion of the Picts and Scots, and continued in a state of desolation till the time of the Saxons, by whom it was restored, and, from its situation as a fortress near the river Lune, called Lun ceastre, from which its present name is deduced. In the seventh century, according to the same author, it had risen to such importance as to be made the capital of the county, an honour which it still retains; but it suffered so much injury during the Danish incursions, that in the Norman survey it is noticed only as a vill, or berewic, included in the manor of Halton. At the time of the Conquest it was given by William I. to Roger de Poitou, who is supposed to have enlarged and adapted for his baronial residence, the ancient castle, of which the western tower is erroneously said to have been built by Adrian, in 124, and that facing the town, by the father of Constantine the Great, in 305: the beautiful gateway tower was erected by John, Earl of Morton and Lancaster, who, after his accession to the throne, gave audience to the French ambassadors, and received the homage of Alexander, King of Scotland (whom he had subdued), in this castle. John of Gaunt, the fourth son of Edward III., having succeeded to the title of his father-in-law, Henry Plantagenet, Duke of Lancaster, erected that tower in the castle which has obtained the name of John of Gaunt's chair. On the accession of this prince to the dukedom, in 1376, the county was constituted a palatinate. Separate courts for this independent jurisdiction are still opened at Lancaster, but they adjourn to Preston, and business is chiefly transacted there and in the duchy court at Westminster. In 1322 and 1389, the town was burnt and plundered by the Scots; and in the wars of the houses of York and Lancaster it was nearly depopulated, in consequence of the resolute adherence of the inhabitants to the cause of the Lancastrians. During the parliamentary war it suffered severely, and, in 1698, an accidental fire destroyed a considerable portion of the town, which also, in the rebellion of 1745, participated in the agitations that disturbed the peace of the kingdom.

The town is pleasantly situated on the acclivities of an eminence crowned with the stately towers of the castle, and on the southern bank of the river Lune, over which a handsome stone bridge of five elliptical arches has been erected, at an expense of £12,000, connecting the town with the township of Skerton, about half a mile to the east of an ancient bridge now in ruins, which had been built over the narrower part of the river, near St. George's quay. With the exception of a few which are spacious, the streets are generally narrow; but considerable improvement in the general appearance of the town has been made, under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained, in 1784, for erecting the bridge; and more is still in progress, under an act obtained, in 1824, for cleansing, watching, lighting, and paving the town: the houses, built of freestone found in the neighbourhood, and covered with slate, are in general of handsome appearance; in various parts of the town are some noble mansions, and in the environs, which abound with varied and interesting scenery, are several elegant villas. The theatre is occasionally opened; and assemblies are held in a suite of rooms well adapted to the purpose: the public baths are conveniently arranged, and provided with every requisite accommodation: a book society, called the Amicable, which was instituted in 1769, has accumulated a library of four thousand volumes; and a mechanics' library was opened in 1824. A society for promoting the fine arts, by the purchase of paintings by the most eminent living artists, was established in 1820, and is well supported.

The port is subject to much inconvenience from the difficulty of the navigation of the Lune, arising from the accumulation of sand in its channel, and an elevation in its bed, called Scaleford, probably the remains of a Roman ford across the river, which renders it inaccessible to vessels of large burden; in consequence of which, a dock was constructed, in 1787, at Glasson, nearly five miles down the river, capable of sheltering twenty-five merchantmen, which discharge their cargoes by lighters at St. George's quay, on which a custom-house, a neat edifice with an Ionic portico, was erected, in 1764. The foreign trade is chiefly with America and the West Indies; the exports are mahogany furniture of every description, sadlery, shoes, woollen, linen, and cotton goods, soap, candles, and provisions; the imports are sugar, coffee, rum, cotton, mahogany and dye woods. Lancaster carries on also a very considerable coasting trade: twenty-eight British ships entered inwards from foreign ports, and twelve cleared outwards, in 1826; and the number of vessels belonging to the port, in 1828, was fifty-one, averaging a burden of one hundred and thirteen tons: there is a considerable salmon fishery on the river Lune, which also abounds with trout. The principal manufactures are mahogany furniture and upholstery, for exportation, cordage, sail-cloth, and cotton goods, for which last there are three factories in the town, in two of which two hundred power-loom are employed: cotton and worsted yarn are also spun to a considerable extent: there are two yards for boat-building; and formerly vessels of considerable burden were built here. The Lancaster canal, constructed in pursuance of an act of parliament passed in 1792, opens a communication with the mining district, and supplies the neighbourhood with coal and other necessities; but the want of a more extended line of internal navigation operates unfavourably to the increase of the trade, and the scarcity of fuel to the extension of the manufactures, of the town. About a mile to the north-east, the canal is carried over the river Lune, by an aqueduct of stone, consisting of five semicircular arches, each seventy feet in the span, erected, at an expense of £48,000, under the direction of Mr. Rennie. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday: the fairs, which are chiefly for cattle, cloth, cheese, and pedlary, and which continue for three days each, are, May 1st, July 5th, and October 10th, which last is the principal cheese fair in the county.

Lancaster was first incorporated by charter, in the 4th year of the reign of Richard I., of John, Earl of Morton, afterwards King John, who granted and confirmed to the burgesses all the liberties he had before granted to those of Bristol, and Edward III. confirmed and extended those privileges, allowing the mayor and bailiffs the privilege of having the pleas and sessions held here, to the exclusion of every other place in the county. The government, under the charter of George III., granted in 1819, is vested in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, seven aldermen, twelve capital burgesses, and twelve common council-men, assisted by a town clerk, two sergeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The mayor, who acts as coroner for the borough, and the bailiff of the brethren, are elected annually on the Thursday after October 18th, by the aldermen and capital burgesses, from their own bodies, and the bailiff of the commons, by the free burgesses, from the common council-men. The freedom is obtained by birth, or servitude, all the sons of freemen being entitled to it on payment of a small fee to the mayor, bailiffs, and commonalty. Among the privileges may be reckoned an interest in the tract of ground called Lancaster Marsh, consisting of two hundred and ten acres, enclosed in 1795, the rents of which are divided amongst eighty of the oldest freemen, or their widows. The mayor is a justice of the peace for the county, and he and the aldermen are justices of the peace within the borough, holding quarterly courts of session for all offences not capital; also a court of pleas every week, for the recovery of debts to any amount. A court for the hundred of Lonsdale is also held here, on the first Wednesday in every month, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The town-hall is a neat building, erected, in 1781, at an expense of £1300, and containing a court-room and apartments for the transaction of the public business of the corporation: it is embellished with full-length portraits of the Rt. Hon. William Pitt, and Admiral Lord Nelson, painted by Mr. Lonsdale, a native of the town, and presented by him to the corporation. The borough prison is a small edifice, for the temporary confinement of prisoners, who are subsequently sent to Lancaster castle. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., and continued to make returns till the 1st of Edward II.; it afterwards intermitted till the reign of Edward VI., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the freemen generally, of whom there are about three thousand: the mayor and bailiffs are the returning officers. The court of pleas for the county palatine is held twice in the year, before the judges of the northern circuit, and the assizes and general quarter sessions for the county are also held in this town, where also, as being the county town, the election of knights of the shire takes place. The remains of the ancient castle are used as the county gaol, and additional buildings have been erected, upon a very extensive scale, at an expense exceeding £140,000. The entrance, through a gateway of beautiful design, over which is a statue of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, is flanked by octagonal towers and leads into a spacious court-yard enclosed with embattled walls and strengthened with towers; opposite to the entrance is the ancient square keep, a building of prodigious strength, to the north of which are the shire-hall and courts, with the room for the grand jury, and other apartments: the hall is of a semicircular form, and elegantly and commodiously arranged for the business of the assizes: the nisi prius court, in which are full-length portraits of Colonel Stanley and Mr. Blackburn, presented by the late Sir Robert Peel, Bart., exhibits some architectural beauty; and in the crown court is an equestrian portrait of King George III., painted by Northcote, and presented to the county by James Ackers, Esq., while high sheriff. The common gaol comprises seventeen divisions for the classification of prisoners, seventy-three work-rooms, thirty-two day-rooms, and twelve airing-yards; there are two tread-mills employed in pumping water and turning power looms; a considerable portion of their earnings is paid to the prisoners on their discharge. The castle hill and terrace afford a fine promenade, commanding extensive views of the surrounding scenery, which is most richly diversified.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £41, and in the patronage of Oliver Marton, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and to which the privilege of sanctuary was anciently attached, was originally erected by Roger de Poitou, who founded a Benedictine priory here, as a cell to the abbey of St. Martin de Sees in Normandy, which, on the suppression of Alien priories, was by Henry V. annexed to the abbey of Sion in Middlesex: the present edifice is in the later style of English architecture, and contains some fine specimens of skreen-work and carvings in oak, which are thought to have been brought from Cockersand abbey, on its dissolution. The registry for this division of the archdeaconry is kept in this church, in which also the Commissary's court was formerly held. Among the monuments is one by Roubilliac to the me-memory of William Stratford, L.L.D.; and in the churchyard is the shaft of a Danish cross, embellished with sculpture, and bearing an inscription in Runic characters. St. John's chapel was built by subscription, in 1755: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Lancaster. St. Ann's chapel was erected, in 1796, at the sole expense of the Rev. Robert Houseman: the patronage of the living, a perpetual curacy endowed with £800 royal bounty, will revert to the vicar in the course of fifty years after the date of its erection. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Presbyterians, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The free grammar school is of uncertain origin: it existed prior to 1615, at which time Rundall Carter, of London, bequeathed £10 per annum as a salary for an usher; and it appears to have been generally supported by the corporation, by whom it was most probably founded, and who have the nomination of the head master: there are about sixty scholars attending it, who pay a certain quarterage, and of whom a few receive classical instruction: the salaries of the masters are paid by the corporation. The Blue-coat charity school, established by subscription in 1770, has been incorporated with the National school for boys, for which a spacious stone building was erected, in 1817, by subscription, at an expense of £1100, and which in that year was endowed by Mr. Matthew Pyper, one of the Society of Friends, with £2000 Navy five per cent. annuities: there are in this school three hundred and forty boys, of whom a certain number is clothed. A National school for girls with a house for the mistress, was built, in 1820, by subscription: there are one hundred and twenty girls in the school, who are instructed in reading, writing, and household work, to qualify them for domestic service. A charity school, established in 1772, in which sixty girls are taught to read, write, knit, sew, and spin, is supported partly by subscription, and partly by the earnings of the children, a fourth part of which is given to them. A school, in which are eighty children, was established in 1820, and is supported by the Roman Catholics of the town; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Gardyner's almshouses, founded in 1485, consisting of four tenements adjoining the vicarage-house, are appropriated to four aged men, between whom the sum of £6. 11. 8., in quarterly payments, is divided by the corporation. Penny's almshouses, consisting of twelve tenements, with a chapel forming three sides of a quadrangle, the area of which is laid out in gardens for the almspeople, was founded, by a bequest from William Penny, Esq., in 1715, and endowed with lands producing about £340 per annum, for twelve aged men or women, who are appointed by the corporation, and receive each £3. 6. 8. per quarter, a suit of clothes, and other allowances: from the same fund a chaplain receives a small stipend, for reading prayers to the almspeople, and some apprentice fees are given with poor children. Eight almshouses were founded, in 1781, by Mrs. Anne Gillison, who endowed them with land and money producing about £40 per annum, for eight unmarried women, to each of whom £4 and a gown are given annually. There are numerous charitable bequests for distribution, among which the most considerable is that of William Heysham, M.P., who, in 1725, bequeathed an estate producing £256 per annum, in trust to the corporation, for the benefit of eight poor men resident within the borough; and there are several for the relief of prisoners for debt confined in Lancaster castle. The county lunatic asylum, on Lancaster moor, was established in 1816, and is conducted under the superintendence of a committee of visiting magistrates, of whom the Rt. Hon. Lord Stanley is president: the establishment comprise a physician, surgeon, superintendent, matron, house-steward, treasurer, and chaplain. The premises comprise a spacious quadrangular building of stone, with a handsome portico of the Doric order, and, with the gardens and grounds, occupy five acres of land: the buildings contain hot and cold baths, with every accommodation requisite for the patients, and under the long covered galleries afford opportunities of exercise in bad weather; and the grounds furnish every kind of amusement that may contribute to the health and recreation of the patients: there are about one hundred and forty males, and about one hundred and twenty females, in this asylum, who are individually treated with a due regard to their several degrees and species of malady; and a chapel has been erected, in which many of those whose state of mind renders them susceptible of its influence, derive the consolation of religion. A dispensary for supplying the sick poor with medicine was instituted in 1781; and connected with it is a house of recovery for persons labouring under contagious diseases. The reigning sovereign enjoys the title of Duke of Lancaster.

LANCAUT, a chapelry in the parish of TIDENHAM, hundred of WESTBURY, though locally in that of Blidesloe, county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N.) from Chepstow. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel, which is dedicated to St. James, is under the rector of Wollastone, in the archdeaconry of Hereford, and diocese of Gloucester.

LANCHESTER, a parish comprising the chapelries of Ebchester, Esh, Medomsley, and Satley, and the townships of Benfield-side, Burnop with Hamsteels, Buttsfield, Collierly, Conside with Knitsley, Billingside, Greencroft, Heelyfield, Holmside, Ivestone, Kyo, Lanchester, and Langley, in the western division of CHESTER ward, and the township of Comsay, in the north-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, and containing 4979 inhabitants, of which number, 659 are in the township of Lanchester, 8 miles (N. W. by W.) from Durham. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, endowed with £1040 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a venerable structure in the early style of English architecture, surmounted by a square tower of hewn stone, adorned with battlements and flying buttresses: in the interior are several sculptured decorations, interesting monuments, and portions of stained glass. It was made collegiate, for a dean and seven prebendaries, by Bishop Anthony Beke, about 1283, and valued, at the dissolution, at £49. 3. 4., and in the Lincoln taxation at £90. 13. 4., per annum: the dean's house occupied a plot of ground surrounded by a fosse, a little northward from the church; but there are no vestiges, excepting six carved oak seats under an arch in the northern wall of the chancel, and a piscina on the southern side of the altar. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A free school was established by subscription, in 1748, and is endowed with £10 per annum, the bequest of George Clavering, Esq., of Green-croft. At Cornsey, in this parish, almshouses for the maintenance of six poor men and six poor women, with a master and a mistress, were founded, by the late W. Russel, Esq., of Brancepeth castle, and endowed with a rent-charge. Petty sessions are held here once a fortnight, and a court for the recovery of debts under 40s. twice a year. The new turnpike road from Durham to Shotley bridge, made under an act of parliament obtained in 1810, passes through the vale in this parish. Lanchester occupies the site of a principal Roman station, though its identity has been disputed by antiquaries. Camden, Gale, and Hunter, call it Longovicum; Horsley, Glabanta or Glanoventa (considered the most perfect Roman station in the kingdom); whilst modern writers regard it as Epiacum: the period of its origin is uncertain, but its restoration is ascribed to the Emperor Gordian: it stood on the line of the Watling-street, and was successively garrisoned by a portion of the twentieth legion, the Varduli, and the Ligones. The station occupied an eminence half a mile westward from the village; the rampart, enclosing a cultivated area of eight acres, is in most parts quite perfect: numerous coins, altars, monuments, and other relics, have been discovered at different periods; several of which are preserved in the library at Durham.

LANCING, a parish in the hundred of BRIGHTFORD, rape of BRAMBER, county of SUSSEX, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Worthing, containing 590 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £6. 9. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lincoln. The church has lately received an addition of one hundred and fourteen sittings, of which seventy are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £30 towards defraying the expense. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Adur and Shoreham harbour, and on the south by the English channel.

LANDBEACH, a parish in the hundred of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Cambridge, containing 371 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LANDCROSS, a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Bideford, containing 83 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £5. 4. 9½., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Rolle. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. General Monk, afterwards Duke of Albermale, was born here in 1608.

LANDEWEDNACK, a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, 10½ miles (S. S. E.) from Helston, containing 387 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £11. 16. 10½., and in the patronage of Vivian Robinson, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Lanty, has a curious ancient font. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In this parish is the Lizard Point, the southernmost point of land in Great Britain, whence ships leaving the channel date their departure, and upon which are two lighthouses and a signal station. About a mile from it is Kynan's Cove, one of the most remarkable curiosities on the coast: it is formed of vast projecting rocks overhanging the sea, so as to resemble in one part of it an arched grotto. The Soap rocks, three miles distant, yield the celebrated steatite, formerly in great request among the manufacturers of china.

LANDFORD, a parish in the hundred of FRUSTFIELD, county of WILTS, 10 miles (S. E.) from Salisbury, containing 213 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £4. 3. 9. T. Bolton, Esq. was patron in 1800. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

LANDGUARD-FORT, in the parish of FELIXSTOW, hundred of COLNEIS, county of SUFFOLK, 12 miles (S. E. by S.) from Ipswich, and 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Harwich, which see. Here is a chapel for the garrison.

LANDICAN, a township in the parish of WOODCHURCH, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 5¾ miles (N.) from Great Neston, containing 53 inhabitants.

LANDKEY, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of MOLTON, county of DEVON, 2¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Barnstaple, containing 683 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Swimbridge, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Exeter, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. At Herford, in this parish, was anciently a chapel. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LANDMOTH, a joint township with Catto, in that part of the parish of LEAK which is in the wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, North riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from North Allerton, containing 59 inhabitants.

LANDRAKE, a parish in the southern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Saltash, containing, with the parish of St. Erney, 841 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the curacy of St. Erney, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £18. 12. 4. The Countess of Mount-Edgembe was patroness in 1802. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is remarkable for the loftiness of its tower, which is a picturesque object for miles around. The parish is bounded on the east by Lynher river, where it is crossed by a bridge. Here are fairs for cattle on July 19th and August 24th. A charity school was founded, in 1703, by Sir Robert Jeffrey, Knt., who endowed it with lands now producing about £40 per annum. There are five almshouses, with a small endowment in land.

LANDULPH, a parish in the southern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (N.) from Saltash, containing 579 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £20. 3. 6½., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Dilpe, contains an inscription, giving an account of the pedigree of Theodore Paleologus, a lineal descendant of the last Christian emperors of Greece, who died in 1636, and whose remains were interred here. The navigable river Tamer runs on the east and south of the parish.

LANDWADE, a parish in the hundred of STAPLOE, county of CAMBRIDGE, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Newmarket, containing 20 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Exning, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The remains of the ancient manor-house exhibit a specimen of the domestic architecture of the sixteenth century.

LANEAST, a parish in the northern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 7 miles (W.) from Launceston, containing 229 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty. W. T. Baron, Esq. was patron in 1826. The church is dedicated to St. Gulwel.

LANE-END, a market town and chapelry in the parish of STOKE UPON TRENT, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Newcastle under Lyne, containing, with Longton, 7100 inhabitants. This place, which is situated at the southern extremity of the district called "The Potteries," and on the road between Newcastle and Uttoxeter, has risen to opulence and importance within a few years, in consequence of the flourishing state of the earthenware and china manufacture. The population is rapidly increasing; and among the indications of modern improvement may be mentioned the establishment of a mechanics' institute. The Trent and Mersey canal passes about two miles westward from the town, and through it runs a small stream, on which are several mills for grinding flints. The market is held on Saturday for provisions, of which the supply is very abundant; and there are fairs for woollen cloth, hardware, and pedlary, on February 14th, May 29th, July 22nd, and November 1st. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with land for the erection of a parsonage-house, £1000 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of certain Trustees. The chapel, which is a brick edifice, rebuilt about 1795, has recently received an addition of five hundred sittings, of which four hundred and fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £800 towards defraying the expense. In 1827 an act of parliament was obtained, authorising a sale of all tithes and rectorial dues belonging to the rectory of Stoke upon Trent, and which contained powers for further endowing and converting the chapelry of Lane-End into a distinct rectory. A new church is now being erected by the parliamentary commissioners appointed for the building of additional churches. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and Methodists of the New Connexion, and a chapel for Roman Catholics. A charity school was founded in 1760, and endowed by John Bourne, Esq., the master having a salary of £15 per annum, and a rent-free residence, for which he instructs about forty children of both sexes. There is also a National school.

LANEHAM, a parish within the liberty of SOUTH-WELL and SCROOBY, though locally in the South-clay division of the wapentake of Bassetlaw, county of NOTTINGHAM, 6½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Tuxford, containing 347 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of York, rated in the king's books at £5. 3. 4., and endowed with £400 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. The river Trent runs through the parish.

LANERCOST-ABBEY, a parish in ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 2½ miles (N. E.) from Brampton, comprising the townships of Askerton, Banks, Burtholme, Kingwater, and Waterhead, and containing 1512 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Carlisle. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, is part of the ancient abbey, and is principally in the early style of English architecture, with portions in the Norman. In this parish, which was crossed by the great Roman wall of Julius Agricola, was the station of the Cohors Prima Ælia Dacorum, called Amboglana, the site of which is an extensive plain terminating in a precipitous descent to the river Irthing: the dimensions of the castrum are one hundred and twenty yards north and south, by eighty east and west: some altars have been found here, dedicated to Jupiter Optimus Maximus, as also dedications to Mars and Cocis, with various monumental and other inscriptions, though almost effaced by time: a fragment of the ancient wall, ten feet in height, and five yards in length, is yet standing at Harehill. On the north bank of the river Irthing are the very interesting ruins of an Augustine priory, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, founded in 1169, by Robert de Vallibus, lord of Gilsland, and endowed by himself and others with a revenue valued at the dissolution at £79. 19.: it was frequently visited by Edward I., and partly destroyed by conflagration in 1296; in 1311, Robert Bruce, with his army, lay here for three days. The ruins comprise vestiges of the conventual church, cloisters, refectory, and other buildings; the nave has been fitted up as the parish church; the dilapidated walls, which exhibit numerous specimens of architecture in the early style, are covered with ivy, ash, and other plants: the western gateway consists of a circular arch, richly decorated and supported by pilasters, and is surmounted by a statue of Mary Magdalene, the tutelar saint of the abbey. In a part of the ancient cemetery which has been converted into gardens, several stone coffins and monuments lie among the trees. Within this parish, and about seven miles from Lanercost is Gilsland spa, the waters of which are sulphuretted chalybeate: the scenery is beautiful and romantic, and there is every requisite accommodation for visitors, with billiard-tables, music-rooms, libraries, &c. The spring, anciently called Holy Well, acquired its present name about the year 1770.

LANGAR, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of BINGHAM, county of NOTTINGHAM, 10½ miles (E. S. E.) from Nottingham, containing, with Barn-stone, 287 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 7. 11. The Rev. W. Bowerbank was patron in 1825. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is a large cruciform edifice, with a richly ornamented tower: in it are several monuments of the Lords Scroope, one of which, in memory of Lord Scroope, who died in 1609, and his lady, is remarkably elegant: it contains also a handsome monument to the memory of that distinguished officer Admiral Earl Howe, who died August 5th, 1799, and was buried here. On an elevation near the village is the site of his lordship's once magnificent residence, which has been very much curtailed.

LANGBAR, a joint township with Nesfield, in that part of the parish of ILKLEY which is in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Skipton. The population is returned with Nesfield. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LANGCLIFFE, a township in the parish of BENTHAM, western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N.) from Settle, containing 420 inhabitants. Here are cotton and paper manufactories.

LANGDALE, a chapelry, comprising Great and Little Langdale, in the parish of GRASMERE, KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.E. by S.) from Orton, containing 317 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Grasmere. The chapel is situated at Great Langdale, and another once stood at a place now called Chapel-Mire, in Little Langdale. On a hill called Wreynose are placed three stones, denominated shire-stones, and marking the point at which the counties of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Lancaster, meet and terminate. Fine blue slate, much of which is sent to London and other parts, is obtained in the mountains on each side of the river Brathay; the loftiest pike of these, called Harrison Stickle, rises two thousand four hundred feet above the level of the sea. Within the chapelry is Elter-water, near which is a gunpowder-mill; there are also several smaller lakes, and the two beautiful waterfalls, Colwith Force and Skelwith Force. A school was erected, in 1824, by the Gunpowder Company, in consideration of ground granted to them for the establishment of their manufactory.

LANGDON (EAST), a parish in the hundred of CORNILO, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Dover, containing 347 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £7. The Earl of Guildford was patron in 1788. The church is dedicated to St. Augustine. A fair for toys and pedlary is held on Old May-day. Here is a workhouse for lodging the poor of this and some of the neighbouring parishes, in which several of them are employed in spinning and weaving linen, sacking, &c.

LANGDON (WEST), a parish in the hundred of BEWSBOROUGH, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Dover, containing 86 inhabitants. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, which was dedicated to St. Mary, is in ruins. An abbey for White canons, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Thomas the Martyr, was founded here, in 1192, by William de Auberville, which at the dissolution had a revenue estimated at £56. 6.

LANGDON-HILLS, a parish in the hundred of BARSTABLE, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Horn-don on the Hill, containing 205 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £10. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and All Saints. From the summit of this range of hills, the loftiest in this part of the county, are some extremely fine and extensive prospects, especially towards the south, south-east, and south-west, of the metropolis; the whole river and vale of the Thames below London, and the hills and coast of Kent, as far as the Medway, being visible in clear weather.

LANGENHOE, a parish in the hundred of WINS-TREE, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Colchester, containing 131 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. 4. Earl Waldegrave was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. The parish is bounded on the east by the navigable river Colne.

LANGFIELD, a township in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $11\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Halifax, containing 2069 inhabitants. On Stoodley Pike, a lofty eminence in this township, a column has been raised, commemorative of the great military achievements of the Duke of Wellington.

LANGFORD, a parish in the hundred of BIGGLES-WADE, county of BEDFORD, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Biggles-wade, containing 631 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

LANGFORD, a parish comprising the tything of Little Farringdon, in the hundred of FARRINGDON, county of BERKS, and the township of Grafton, and the hamlet of Radcutt, in the hundred of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Lechlade, and containing 638 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Langford Ecclesia in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £21. 19. $4\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. John W.
Peters was patron in 1825. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has lately received an addition of two hundred and two sittings, of which one hundred and thirty-nine are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £80 towards defraying the expense. It is said that the boundary line of the two counties divides the church and churchyard.

LANGFORD, a parish in the hundred of THURSTA-BLE, county of ESSEX, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Maldon, containing 251 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £10. 4. $9\frac{1}{2}$. Mrs. West-comb was patroness in 1813. The church is dedicated to St. Giles. The Chelmer and Blackwater navigation bounds the parish on the south.

LANGFORD, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Watton, containing 29 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Ickborough, not rated in the king's books, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich. Alexander Baring, Esq. was patron in 1824. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is an ancient building of flint, with a square western embattled tower; it contains several memorials of the Methwolds and Garrards, formerly lords of the place.

LANGFORD, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of NEWARK, county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Newark, containing 147 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. The Fosse-road crosses the parish, and the river Trent bounds it on the west.

LANGFORD (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, county of WILTS, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Wilton, containing 32 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Earl of Pembroke. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

LANGFORD (STEEPLE), a parish in the hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, county of WILTS, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Wilton, containing 557 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4. 10. 2., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Norwich. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

LANGHAM (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of HOLT, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Cley. The living is a vicarage, united to the rectory of Cockthorpe, Glandford, and Blakeney, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £3. 6. 8. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LANGLEY, a chapelry in the parish of HAMPSTEAD-NORRIS, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from East Ilsey. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel has long since been desecrated.

LANGLEY, a township in that part of the parish of LANCHESTER which is in the western division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Durham, containing 97 inhabitants. On the bank of the river Browney are the ruins of an ancient mansion, part of which has been converted into a farm-house.

LANGLEY, a parish in the hundred of CLAVERING, county of ESSEX, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Saffron-Walden, containing 320 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Clavering, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London. The church is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LANGLEY, a parish in the hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 4 miles (S. E.) from Maidstone, containing 263 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 19. $9\frac{1}{2}$.. Mrs Bouverie was patroness in 1789. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LANGLEY, a parish in the hundred of LODDON, county of NORFOLK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Acle, containing 349 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £600 royal bounty. Sir T. B. Proctor, Bart. was patron in 1817. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. An abbey of Premonstratensian canons, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded and endowed, in 1198, by Robert Fitz-Roger Helke, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £128. 19. 9. Its site is now called the Grange, and near it, in a fine park well stocked with deer, is Langley house, a handsome structure, having a quadrangular turret rising from each of its four angles.

LANGLEY, a chapelry in the parish of SHIPTON under WHICHWOOD, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, 5 miles (N.E.) from Burford, containing 63 inhabitants.

LANGLEY, a chapelry in the parish of ACTON-BURNELL, hundred of CONDOVER, county of SALOP, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Much Wenlock. The population is returned with the township of Ruckley.

LANGLEY, a hamlet in the parish of CLAVERDON, Henley division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Henley in Arden, containing 192 inhabitants.

LANGLEY, a tything in the parish of KINGTON ST. MICHAEL, northern division of the hundred of DAMERHAM, county of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Chippenham, containing 504 inhabitants.

LANGLEY (ABBOT'S), a parish in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. by S.) from King's Langley, containing 1733 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £15, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. Sir J. Filmer, Bart. was patron in 1821. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is partly Norman, and partly in the later style of English architecture; it has a square tower surmounted by a short spire, and contains some handsome monuments, and other sepulchral memorials. The Grand Junction canal passes through the parish. Nicholas de Breakspear, who first instructed the Norwegians in Christianity, and the only Englishman ever raised to the popedom, was born in this parish, though the place from which he took his name is situated in the adjoining parish of St. Michael: he assumed the title of Adrian IV., and was poisoned in 1159, in the fifth year of his pontificate, by a citizen of Rome, whose son he refused to consecrate bishop.

LANGLEY (KING'S), a parish in the hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, 19 miles (W.S.W.) from Hertford, containing 1242 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is built of flint and stone, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a short spire, and is remarkable as containing the tomb of Edmund de Langley, fifth son of Edward III., and Duke of York, who was born at an ancient royal palace here; he died in 1402, and was buried in the church of the priory, from which, at the dissolution, his tomb was removed to the parish church: it has lately received an addition of two hundred and seventy-seven sittings, of which two hundred and fifty-seven are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £200 towards defraying the expense. A priory, or house for friars preachers, founded here by Roger, son of Robert Helle, or Helke, but afterwards enlarged and more liberally endowed by the munificence of the kings Edward I., II., III., and IV., possessed, in the 26th of Henry VIII., a revenue of £150. 14. 8. Queen Mary restored it for a prioress and nuns, but it was totally suppressed in the 1st of Elizabeth. A large paper manufactory here affords employment to about fifty persons. The Grand Junction canal passes through the parish, in excavating which a human skeleton and jaw bones, of gigantic size, were found in 1820, and an ancient sword and a spear in 1822.

LANGLEY (KIRK), a parish in the hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Derby, containing, with the township of Meynell-Langley, 552 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £12. 2. 1., and in the patronage of Godfrey Meynell, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, was nearly destroyed by the violent tempest which happened in 1545. Courts leet and baron are annually held here. A school-house was erected, by subscription, in 1750, and endowed, in 1752, by the Rev. John Bailey, then rector, with land now let at £12 a year, and again, in 1768, with a rent-charge of £5 per annum, for the instruction of twelve children. A Sunday school has also been established by the rector.

LANGLEY (MEYNELL), a township in the parish of KIRK-LANGLEY, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY. The population is returned with the parish.

LANGLEY-BURREL, a parish in the hundred of CHIPPENHAM, county of WILTS, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Chippenham, containing 428 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £12. 7. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$. R. Ashe, Esq. was patron in 1807. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LANGLEY-DALE, a joint township with Shotton, in the parish of STAINDROP, south-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Barnard-Castle, containing, with Shotton, 198 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The smelt works established here yield weekly upwards of three thousand stone of lead, and four thousand ounces of silver. Here is an ancient tower, formerly an out-post belonging to Raby castle.

LANGLEY-MARISH, a parish in the hundred of STOKE, county of BUCKINGHAM, comprising a portion of the market town of Colnbrook, and containing 1616 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Wyrardisbury, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln. The church, formerly a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Wyrardisbury, is dedicated to St. Mary, and was erected at the expense of the Kedermisters, of whom, Sir John Kedermister left for public use a small library, consisting of works chiefly on divinity; it is deposited in the church, the place being separated from the rest of the building by an ancient screen. He also founded, in 1649, almshouses for six poor persons; and Henry Seymour erected others for four inmates, in support of which, Captain Henry Seymour, in 1733, bequeathed £200 to purchase lands: the inmates receive about two shillings and sixpence each per week. There are two places of worship for dissenters, one of which belongs to the Independents. Courts leet and baron are annually held here.

LANGLEY-PRIORY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, containing 13 inhabitants. A priory of Benedictine nuns, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded, in the beginning of the reign of Henry II., by William Pantulf, and Burgie his wife, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was estimated at £34. 6. 2.

LANGO, a chapelry in the parish and lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LAN-CASTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Clitheroe. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Blackburn. Here, in 798, Duke Wada fought an unsuccessful battle against Ardulph, King of Northumberland.

Corporate Seal.

LANGPORT - EAST-OVER, a market town and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Pitney, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Somerton, and 130 (W. S. W.) from London, on the great western road, containing 1004 inhabitants. This place is of great antiquity, and is supposed to have derived its name from the Saxon words long, extended, and port, a town, from the length of its principal street: in the Norman survey it is called Lanporth. It was a royal burgh in the time of William the Conqueror, and contained thirty-four resident burgesses. In the civil war between Charles I. and the parliament, Langport, being considered a commanding station, was well garrisoned, and alternately in the possession of the royal and of the parliamentary forces. In July 1644, the former were compelled to abandon the place, from the result of an engagement here, in which three hundred men were killed, and one thousand four hundred made prisoners. The town is situated on the river Parret, which is navigable for barges, near its junction with the Yeo and the Ile: at the western entrance a very ancient bridge of ten arches crosses the river, and there are nine other bridges, which are repaired from the funds of the corporation. At the eastern approach, on the ancient lines of fortification, is an arch thrown over the road, which supports a building called the "Hanging Chapel," formerly devoted to religious uses, and during Monmouth's rebellion, having been the place of execution, but now occupied as a private residence. The principal part of the town is on an eminence, and commands some pleasing and extensive views; but that part near the river lying low is subject to frequent inundations: since 1800, the general appearance of the whole has been much improved, by the erection of many new houses, and the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water from an adjacent well. A considerable traffic in coal, culm, iron, timber, salt, corn, &c., is carried on with London, Bristol, and various other places; and several boats, of from eight to fourteen tons' burden, are constantly employed between this town and Bridgewater. The market is on Saturday: fairs are held on the Monday before Lent, the second Wednesday in August, the last Monday but one in September, and the last Monday in November, for cattle. The government of the town is vested, by a renewed charter of James I., in the year 1617, in a corporation consisting of twelve chief burgesses, including a portreeve, justice, two bailiffs, assisted by a recorder, town clerk, serjeant at mace, and other officers. The portreeve and bailiffs are elected from the body corporate, annually on the 1st of November, and the recorder, town clerk, and serjeant at mace, as vacancies occur. The portreeve, justice, and recorder, are justices of the peace: the portreeve is coroner for the borough and clerk of the market, and his predecessor is justice. The corporation are empowered to hold a court of record before the portreeve, recorder, and bailiffs, every Tuesday, for pleas not exceeding the value of 40s. The town-hall, which is a neat edifice, was erected about 1733. This borough sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward I., but the privilege was not subsequently exercised. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Huish-Episcopi, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archdeacon of Wells, as Prebendary of Huish cum Brent in the Cathedral Church of Wells. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient structure in the early style of English architecture; in the eastern window, amongst other representations in ancient stained glass, are those of the twelve Apostles: the church has recently undergone new internal arrangement and decoration. There is a place of worship for Independents. The free grammar school was founded, about the year 1675, by Thomas Gillett, for all boys residing in the town: the present income is £70 per annum, and the average number of scholars about thirty. A National school, for children belonging to the parishes of Langport and Huish, was erected in 1827, and is supported by voluntary contributions. Two poor persons of this parish are eligible to almshouses founded at Somerton, in this county, by Sir Edward Hext, in 1626. An hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, stood here previously to 1310.

LANGRICK-VILLE, a chapelry in the soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, containing 195 inhabitants. Langrick-Ville was, with six other districts, created a township, by act of parliament, in 1812, on the occasion of a very extensive drainage of about fourteen thousand acres of Wildmore, and the eastern and western fens, and is not dependent on any parish. A chapel has been erected here, and was consecrated in 1818.

LANGRIDGE, a parish in the hundred of BATH-FORUM, county of SOMERSET, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Bath, containing 103 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £5. 19. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of William Blathwayt, Esq. In rebuilding the rectory-house, a few years since, several stone coffins and skulls, and a silver-mounted battle-axe, were discovered. At one of the extremities of the parish is Lansdown hill, where a bloody, though indecisive, battle was fought between the royal and parliamentarian armies in 1643.

LANGRIGG, a joint township with Mealrigg, in that part of the parish of BROOMFIELD which is in ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Wigton, containing, with Mealrigg, 194 inhabitants.

LANGRISH, a tything in the parish and hundred of EAST MEON, Alton (South) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON. The population is returned with the parish. Langrish is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

LANGSETT, a township in the parish of PENISTONE, wapentake of STAINCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Penistone, containing 325 inhabitants.

LANGSTONE, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Newport, containing, with the hamlet of Llandeber, 171 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £4. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Charles Gore.

LANGTHORNE, a township in that part of the parish of BEDALE which is in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bedale, containing 135 inhabitants.

There was formerly a chapel at Cross Hill in this parish.

LANGTREE, a joint township with Standish, in the parish of STANDISH, hundred of LEYLAND, county palatine of LANCASTER, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Wigan. The population is returned with Standish.

LANGWATHBY, a chapelry in the parish of EDENHALL, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles

(N. E. by E.) from Penrith, containing 250 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to the vicarage of Edenhall, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle. The chapel, dedicated to St. Peter, was erected by subscription in 1718, on the site of a more ancient edifice. This chapelry is separated from the parish by the river Eden, over which is a bridge of three arches, built in 1686.

LANGWITH, a parish in the hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Mansfield, containing 153 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £4. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire. The church is dedicated to St. Helen.

LANGWITH, a township in the parish of CUCKNEY, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Mansfield, containing 378 inhabitants.

LANGWITH, a township in that part of the parish of WHELDRAKE which is within the liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, though locally in the wapentake of OUZE and DERWENT, East riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from York, containing 39 inhabitants.

LANHYDROCK, a parish in the hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Bodmin, containing 251 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, and in the patronage of G. Hunt, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Hydrock, though small, is an elegant fabric, with an embattled tower overgrown with ivy; a few years since it underwent a thorough repair, the ancient style of the building being preserved entire. Lanhydrock house, which is approached from the river Fowey by a fine avenue of trees about a mile in length, was garrisoned for the parliament in the civil war, and surrendered to the royalists under Sir Richard Grenville, in August 1644: it is an embattled structure of granite, forming three sides of a quadrangle, in the style that prevailed in the early part of the seventeenth century, but of late years, through neglect, it has been going gradually to decay.

LANIVET, a parish in the hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Bodmin, containing 803 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £24. The Rev. William Philipps was patron in 1817. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. About a quarter of a mile from the church are considerable remains of a Benedictine monastery, called St. Bene't's, and supposed to have been a nunnery subordinate to some foreign house. There are certain lands, part of its former possessions, in this and other parishes, producing an income of about £110 per annum, vested in twelve feoffees, for the maintenance of poor persons in an ancient almshouse, with a charity school under the same roof, the master of which has a salary of £8, and a rent-free residence.

LANLIVERY, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by S.) from Lostwithiel, containing 1318 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8. The Rev. William Hocker was patron in 1815. The church is dedicated to St. Brevita. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LANOVER, in the county of MONMOUTH. — See LLANOVER; and the same with regard to the other places in that county, having the prefix LLAN.

LANREATH, a parish in WEST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from West Looe, containing 629 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £32, and in the patronage of John Buller, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Marnarch. Herod's Foot river, and the lakes Ball Water and Trebant Water, are in this parish. Fairs for cattle are held on Whit-Tuesday, November 18th, and the third Tuesday after Shrovetide. A charity school, founded in 1711, possesses a small endowment.

LANSALLOES, a parish in WEST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 6 miles (W. by S.) from West Looe, containing 880 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £18, and in the patronage of the Rev. W. Rawlings. The church is dedicated to St. Alwys. The parish is bounded on the south by Lantivet bay.

LANTEGLOS, a parish in the hundred of LES-NEWTH, county of CORNWALL, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Camelford, containing, with the borough of Camelford, 1256 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Advent, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £34. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Lanty. The river Camel runs through the parish. Here is an endowed school.

LANTEGLOS, a parish in WEST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 2 miles (E.) from Fowey, containing 973 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £14. 7. 1., and in the patronage of Lord Grenville. The church is dedicated to St. Lanty. This parish is separated from the town of Fowey by the river and harbour of the same name, for the defence of which there is an old castle corresponding with one on the opposite shore: it includes the fishing village of Polrnan, which had anciently a market and a fair, and appears to have been a place of some importance, having furnished one ship and sixty mariners to the fleet before Calais in the reign of Edward III. On the brow of a hill rising behind the village are the remains of an ancient chapel, which was dedicated to St. Saviour, still serving as a noted land-mark. Wheal Howell, a copper mine lately discovered, is in operation. The Barton, a manor-house in this parish, having been garrisoned for the parliament, sustained much injury in the civil war, in August 1644, and ultimately surrendered to Sir Richard Grenville, who placed in it a garrison for Charles I., that monarch having narrowly escaped being shot here, whilst inspecting the harbour from a fine promenade in the grounds.

LANTON, a township in the parish of KIRK-NEWTON, western division of GLENDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Wooler, containing 69 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the Glen river.

LAPFORD, a parish in the hundred of NORTH TAWTON with WINKLEY, county of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Chulmleigh, containing 674 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 1. $10\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. W. Radford. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket.

LAPLEY, a parish in the western division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Penkridge, containing, with the township of Wheaton-Aston, 916 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. $3\frac{1}{2}$. John Swinfen, Esq. was patron in 1800. The church is dedicated to All Saints. In 1669, Joan Scutt gave £10 per annum for the instruction of poor children. Here was anciently a priory of Black monks, subordinate to the abbey of St. Remigius at Rheims.

LAPWORTH, a parish in the Warwick division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Henley in Arden, containing, with a portion of the hamlet of Kingswood, 622 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £9. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Merton College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains specimens of the early, decorated, and later styles of English architecture: the tower and spire are on the north side of the north aisle. There is a place of worship for Independents. Two schools for boys and girls were erected and are supported by the proceeds of divers united benefactions, amounting to £412. 5. 3. per annum, which is applied to various benevolent purposes, as severally indicated on a tablet in the church; about sixty boys and from twenty to thirty girls are instructed. The Stratford on Avon canal passes through this parish.

LARBRICK, a joint township with Little Eccleston, in the parish of KIRKHAM, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Poulton, containing 224 inhabitants. There is a chalybeate spring in this township.

LARK-STOKE, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ILMINGTON which is in the upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER, 4 miles (N. E.) from Chipping-Campden, containing 5 inhabitants.

LARKTON, a township in the parish of MALPAS, higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Whitchurch, containing 60 inhabitants.

LARLING, a parish in the hundred of SHROPHAM, county of NORFOLK, 2 miles (N. W. by N.) from East Harling, containing 171 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of N. W. Ridley Colborne, Esq. The church, which is dedicated to St. Ethelbert, presents a very fine specimen of early Norman architecture in the arch of the south porch.

LARTINGTON, a township in the parish of ROM-ALD-KIRK, western division of the wapentake of GIL-LING, North riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles

(W. N. W.) from Barnard-Castle, containing 243 inhabitants. Here was formerly a chantry chapel, and attached to Lartington hall, the seat of Henry Witham, Esq., lord of the manor, is a very handsome Roman Catholic chapel, containing a painting of a crucifix, by Le Brun, which is considered so good an imitation of sculpture as to deceive the best judges. A school was endowed, in 1686, by a benefaction of £60 from John Parken, and one of £40 from Francis Appleby; the income is £20 per annum: eight children are educated.

LARTON, a joint township with Newton, in the parish of WEST KIRBY, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 8 miles (N. N. W.) from Great Neston, containing, with Newton, 48 inhabitants.

LASBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of LONGTREE, county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Tetbury. The population is returned with Weston-Birt. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 5., and endowed with £200 royal bounty. Edward Estcourt, Esq. was patron in 1804.

LASHAM, a parish in the hundred of ODIHAM, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Alton, containing 188 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £6. 18. 9., and in the patronage of G. P. Jervoise, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LASKILL-PASTURE, a township in the parish of HELMSLEY, wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Helmsley, containing 91 inhabitants.

LASSINGTON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Gloucester, containing 52 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £6. 10., and in the patronage of Sir B. W. Guise, Bart., and the Bishop of Gloucester; the former having two presentations, and the latter one. The Herefordshire and Gloucestershire canal runs parallel with the river Leadon, which bounds this parish on the north and east, and falls into the western branch of the Severn near the ancient camp, where both rivers are crossed by the same bridge; here also the canal is crossed by a branch of the Severn, and joins the main branch at Gloucester. The petrification called Astroites, or Star-stone, is met with in a hill in this neighbourhood.

LASTINGHAM, a parish in the wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the chapelry of Rosedale-West-Side, and the townships of Appleton le Moors, Farndale-East-Side, Farndale High-Quarter, Hutton le Hole, Lastingham, and Spaunton, and containing 1834 inhabitants, of which number, 225 are in the township of Lastingham, 7 miles (N. W.) from Pickering. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £17. 7. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A Benedictine monastery was founded here in honour of the Virgin Mary, about 648, by Cedd, Bishop of the East Saxons, of which the present church is probably the only vestige; underneath the choir is a vaulted crypt, the massive cylindrical columns and sculptured arches of which exhibit fine specimens of Norman architecture; the east end is circular, and at the west is a low tower; part of the church is in the Norman, and part in a later, style.

LATCHFORD, a chapelry in the parish of GRAPPENHALL, hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E.) from Warrington, containing 1252 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Grappenhall. The church, dedicated to St. James, has lately received an addition of seven hundred and eighty-seven sittings, of which four hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £400 towards defraying the expense. The Duke of Bridgewater's, the Mersey, and the Irwell, canals pass through this parish. A cotton manufactory has been recently established here. Latchford had anciently two weekly markets and two annual fairs, granted in the fourteenth century.

LATCHFORD, a hamlet in the parish of GREAT HASELEY, hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Tetsworth. The population is returned with the parish.

LATCHINGDON, a parish in the hundred of DENGIE, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Burnham, containing 414 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £37. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. This parish extends across the hundred of Dengie, from Latchingdon creek and Blackwater river on the north, to the navigable river Crouch, on the south.

LATHBURY, a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N.) from Newport-Pagnell, containing 164 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A free grammar school was founded and endowed with £12 per annum, in the reign of Elizabeth, by Anthony Cave: the right of appointing the master was vested in the Dean and Canons of Christ Church college: he likewise gave two exhibitions, of £6 each, for the scholars: the endowment has been lost, and the school-room was taken down in 1698. The learned Dr. Chelsam, celebrated for his defence of Christianity, against Gibbon, held this living. The parish is nearly surrounded by the river Ouse: an ancient monastery formerly occupied the site of the present manor-house.

LATHOM, a township in the parish of ORMSKIRK, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Ormskirk, containing 2997 inhabitants. The free grammar school at Newburgh, in this township, was erected, in 1714, by the Rev. Thomas Crane, who endowed it with an estate at Dalton, to which Richard Okell, the schoolmaster, in 1761, added another, producing, together with an additional bequest of about £9 per annum, by Jonathan Lucas, in 1793, a total income of £52 per annum: there are one hundred scholars, of which number, forty poor children of Latham and Newburgh are instructed gratuitously. At Latham park is an ancient almshouse consisting of several tenements, with a chapel. There is a domestic chapel connected with the mansion of Lord Skelmersdale, by whom the officiating minister is appointed; his lordship has lately ornamented the chapel, at an expense of £1200, and has likewise erected a school-room, in which the children are educated at his own charge. Lathom house, once "the chief seat of the Stanleys," was originally built by the De Lathoms; during the great civil war it sustained repeated sieges from the parliamentary forces, its owner, the Earl of Derby, being one of the most staunch supporters of the royal cause. On the 28th of February, 1644, it was besieged by General Sir Thomas Fairfax, with a force of three thousand troops, but was most gallantly defended by the Countess of Derby, with only a small band of three hundred men, who, in several destructive sallies, slew five hundred of the enemy, wounded one hundred and forty, and repeatedly destroyed their works: on the 26th of May, the assailants were obliged to raise the siege, on the arrival of the royalists under Prince Rupert. In the following year it was again besieged, by General Egerton, at the head of four thousand men, to whom, after an obstinate defence, it was surrendered, for want of ammunition, when it was plundered and the fortifications destroyed: the fine seat of the Wilbraham family now stands on its site. A market and a fair, to be held at this place, were granted to Robert de Lathom, in the 32nd of Edward I. Here is a saline chalybeate spring, which also contains some portion of natron.

LATTIMERS, a chapelry in the parish of CHESHAM, hundred of BURNHAM, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Chesham, with which the population is returned.

LATTON, a parish in the hundred of HARLOW, county of ESSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Harlow, containing 378 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £7. M. Burgoyne, Esq. was patron in 1820. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. Here was a priory of Black canons, founded in the fourteenth century, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist: some remains of the conventual buildings have been converted into a barn; they contain specimens in the decorated style.

LATTON, a parish in the hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, county of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W. by N.) from Cricklade, containing 315 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with which that of Eisey is annexed, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Earl of St. Germans. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. A tessellated pavement was discovered here in 1670.

LAUGHTON, a parish in the hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Market-Harborough, containing 173 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Rev. Mr. Humfrey. The church is dedicated to St. Luke. The Grand Union canal passes along the southern boundary of this parish.

LAUGHTON, a parish in the wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. by E.) from Falkingham, containing 76 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, united with the rectory of Falkingham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln. The church has long been in ruins.

LAUGHTON, a parish in the wapentake of CORRINGTON, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, comprising the township of Laughton, and the hamlet of Wildsworth, and containing 422 inhabitants, of which number, 319 are in the township of Laughton, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Gainsborough. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £12. The Marchioness of Hertford was patroness in 1820. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LAUGHTON, a hamlet in the parish of KETTLETHORPE, wapentake of WELL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $10\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Lincoln. The population is returned with the parish.

LAUGHTON, a parish in the hundred of SHIP-LAKE, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Lewes, containing 731 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. 3., and endowed with £200 royal bounty. The Earl of Chichester was patron in 1801. The church is principally in the early style of English architecture, with insertions of a later date.

LAUGHTON en le MORTHEN, a parish partly within the liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, East riding, and partly in the southern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding, of the county of YORK, comprising the chapelry of Letwell, and the townships of Gilden-Wells, Laughton en le Morthen, Throapham, and Woodsetts, and containing 1055 inhabitants, of which number, 652 are in the township of Laughton en le Morthen, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Tickhill. The living is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Chancellor in the Cathedral Church of York. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a fine specimen of the early English style: the tower and spire are visible at the distance of sixty miles: the height to the weathercock is one hundred and ninety-five feet. There is a place of worship for Independents. The free school is endowed with a dwelling-house, garden, and land, together with a rent-charge of £2. Ten poor children are educated gratuitously: five children are also instructed for £5 per annum, the bequest of William Beckwith, in 1816.

LAUNCELLS, a parish in the hundred of STRATTON, county of CORNWALL, 1 mile (E. S. E.) from Stratton, containing 891 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. 10. 10. L. W. Buck, Esq. was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. The Bude and Holsworthy canal passes through this parish, from west to east. There is an almshouse for four poor persons. Here was a cell to the abbey of Hertland in Derbyshire.

Seal and Arms.

LAUNCESTON, a borough, market town, and parish, possessing separate jurisdiction, though locally in the northern division of East hundred, county of CORNWALL, $20\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Bodmin, and 213 (W.S.W.) from London, containing, exclusively of those portions of the borough which extend beyond the limits of the parish, 2183 inhabitants. The ancient name of Launceston was Dunheved, the swelling hill: it was also called Lanstephadon, or Church Stephen Town. Its present name seems to be a contraction of Lan-cester-ton, or Church Castle Town; the word Llan signifying a church in the British language. The manor and honour of Launceston, which had a very extensive jurisdiction, belonged from time immemorial to the Earls of Cornwall, who had their chief seat at Launceston castle: it was given by William the Conqueror to his half-brother, Robert, Earl of Montaigne, whom he made Earl of Cornwall. The church of the parish of St. Stephen, now the borough of Newport, adjoining to Launceston, and considered as part of it, was made collegiate, before the Conquest, for Secular canons. King Henry I. gave this college to the church of Exeter. Reginald, Earl of Cornwall, was a great benefactor to the college of St. Stephen, and used all his influence with King Stephen to remove the bishop's see from Devonshire to Cornwall, and constitute this the cathedral church: but it was successfully opposed by William Warlewast, Bishop of Exeter, who, being then resident at Lawhitton, on his first triennial visitation, suppressed the college of Secular canons, and in its stead founded a priory of Augustine monks, in the parish of St. Thomas, about half-way between St. Stephen's and the castle. The castle of Launceston passed with the earldom; and when Cornwall was erected into a duchy, was annexed to it by act of parliament. Hubert de Burgh, who had large possessions in Cornwall, was made governor of the castle, and sheriff for the county, by King John. From its strong position, and its situation at the entrance into the county, this castle was an important post during the parliamentary war. It was at first in the hands of the parliament, and under the governorship of Sir Richard Buller, who, on the approach of Sir Ralph Hopton with the king's forces, quitted the town and fled. In 1643, Sir Ralph was attacked by Major-General Chudleigh, without success. In August, 1644, the place was surrendered to the earl of Essex, but fell into the hands of the royalists again after the capitulation of the earl's army. In 1645, the Prince of Wales sojourned for some time in Launceston. In November of the same year the town was fortified, by Sir Richard Grenville, who, being at variance with Lord Goring, another of the king's generals, caused proclamation to be made in all the churches of Cornwall, that if any of Lord Goring's forces should come into Cornwall, the bells should ring, and the people rise to drive them out. Shortly after, Sir Richard Grenville, having refused to take the chief command of the infantry under Lord Hopton, as generalissimo, was committed to the prison of Launceston, Colonel Basset being then the governor; who, in March, 1646, surrendered the place to Sir Thomas Fairfax. In the time of the Commonwealth, the castle and park, being put up to sale by the government, were purchased by Robert Bennet, Esq., but on the Restoration, they reverted to the crown.

The town is pleasantly situated near the western bank of the Tamar, on a steep ascent, at the foot of which is the little river Attery; on the summit of a hill is a high conical rocky mount, partly natural, and partly artificial, upon which the keep of the ancient castle, with a Norman gateway and part of the outer walls, is still standing: some portions of the old town wall, and the north and south gates, one of which is on the Exeter road, also remain. There are a few good houses, but the streets are in general narrow and badly paved; the inhabitants are well supplied with water, which is brought by pipes from Dunheved Green: on the north side of the church is a pleasant promenade, shaded by an avenue of trees, and commanding a fine prospect over the adjacent country. Assemblies are held at the White Hart inn during the assizes: there are two book clubs, and a small subscription library. About two years since, a library and philosophical institution, with a good apparatus, was established here, and is supported by subscription: lectures are given during the winter at the grammar school, which is also occasionally used for concerts, plays, &c. An extensive manufacture of serges was formerly carried on, but it has for several years been on the decline. A branch of the Bude canal has recently been brought within four miles of the town, and promises materially to improve the general trade; fuel has already been reduced in price. The markets are on Thursday for butchers' meat, and on Saturday for corn and provisions of all sorts: fairs are held on Whit-Monday, July 5th, November 17th, and December 6th, for cattle; and on the first Thursday in March, and the third Thursday in April, for cattle of all sorts, free of toll: there are likewise three cattle fairs in the parish of St. Stephen, on May 12th, July 31st, and September 25th.

Launceston was constituted a free borough in the reign of Henry III., by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, who granted various privileges to the burgesses, and a piece of ground on which to build their guildhall, to be held of him and his heirs by the annual tender of a pound of pepper: the borough extends as far as Poulston bridge, on the Tamar, and into the parish of Lawhitton. The charter of incorporation was granted by Queen Mary, in 1555: the municipal body consists of a mayor, eight aldermen, a recorder, and freemen, in all about seventeen persons. The mayor is elected by the freemen, from two persons nominated by the aldermen; the aldermen are chosen by the freemen from their own body, and the freemen are elected by the whole corporation: the mayor, the late mayor, the senior alderman, and the deputy recorder, are justices of the peace; and two general sessions of the peace are held within a month after Easter and a month after Michaelmas, when prisoners accused of petty offences are tried; more serious offences are reserved for the assizes. A court of pleas, for the recovery of debts to an unlimited amount, is held every Monday, before the mayor, three aldermen, and the recorder. Besides the parish of St. Mary Magdalene, Launceston, the borough comprises the extra-parochial district of St. Thomas-street, and portions of the parishes of Lawhitton and South Petherwin. Petty sessions for the northern division of East hundred are held here, on the first Tuesday in every month. The assizes for the county, formerly held wholly in this town, have, for more than half a century, been held here alternately with Bodmin, on which occasion only the county gaol at Launceston is now used. The south gate, repaired about three years since, is used as the town prison. This borough first returned members to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I.: the right of election is in the corporation, and the mayor is the returning officer: the influence of the Duke of Northumberland is predominant.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £12. 10. per annum private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation. The church, formerly the chapel of St. Mary Magdalene, was made parochial in the early part of the sixteenth century: it is in the later style of English architecture, built with square blocks of granite, and covered with a profusion of grotesque ornaments: the tower, which stands at the west end, is constructed of different materials, and is apparently of much greater antiquity. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The grammar school was founded by Queen Elizabeth, and endowed with £16 per annum, chargeable on the estates of the duchy of Cornwall, to which an augmentation of £10 per annum was made, in 1685, by George Baron, Esq., whose descendants have the right of nominating ten free scholars; but the school has been discontinued for some years. Two charity schools are supported by voluntary contributions. Here was formerly an hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Leonard; the income, arising from certain fields which belonged to it, and amounting to about £25 per annum, is vested in the corporation for charitable uses. Launceston gives the title of viscount to the reigning sovereign.

LAUNCESTON-TARRANT, county of DORSET. — See TARRANT (LAUNCESTON).

LAUND-BOOTH (NEW), a joint township with Reedly-Hallows and Filly-Close, in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2 miles (N.) from Burnley, containing, with Reedly-Hallows and Filly-Close, 422 inhabitants.

LAUND-BOOTH (OLD), a township in that part of the parish of MITTON which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (N.) from Burnley, containing 390 inhabitants.

LAUNDE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Uppingham, containing 36 inhabitants. A priory was founded here, in the reign of Henry I., by Richard Basset, and Maud his wife, for Black canons of the order of St. Augustine, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £510. 16. 5.: the chapel and burial-ground are still preserved.

LAUNTON, a parish in the hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E.) from Bicester, containing 553 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £11. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LAVANT, a parish comprising East and West Lavant, in the hundred of ALDWICK, though locally in that of Box and Stockbridge, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Chichester, and containing 364 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the deanery of Pagham, the court for which is held in the parish of All Saints, Chichester; it is rated in the king's books at £20. 18. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Lord Willoughby de Broke. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. This parish has the privilege of sending four children to the charity school, founded by the Countess of Derby, at Boxgrove.

LAVANT (MID), a parish in the hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Chichester, containing 243 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. L. G. Dorien, Esq. was patron in 1814.

LAVENDON, a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.E.) from Olney, containing 613 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Cold Brayfield, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. Sir G. Noel, Bart. was patron in 1817. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. An abbey of Premonstratensian canons was founded, in the reign of Henry II., by John de Bidun, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £79. 13. 8. Here was formerly a market on Tuesday, granted to Paulinus Peyore, in 1248, but now disused: a fair is held on the Tuesday before Easter.

LAVENHAM, a market town and parish in the hundred of BABERGH, county of SUFFOLK, situated on the river Brett, 18 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Ipswich, and 61 (N.E.) from London, containing 1898 inhabitants. The town, which is remarkably healthy, occupies the declivities of two hills rising gradually from the river, and consists of several small streets, which are neither paved nor lighted; the houses are in general of mean appearance; the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The manufacture of blue cloth formerly flourished here, under the direction of several guilds, each of which had its separate hall; but at present wool-combing and spinning, and these on a small scale, are the only trades carried on. The market, now almost disused, is on Tuesday: the market-place is a spacious area, containing a stone cross. Fairs are held for horses and cattle on Shrove-Tuesday, and October 11th, 12th, and 13th, for toys. Lavenham was formerly governed by six capital burgesses, who held their office for life, assisted by inferior officers, but their authority has long since ceased, and the rector, who is a magistrate, possesses considerable authority in the town. Courts leet and baron are held at the will of the lord of the manor. The county magistrates hold their meetings at Lavenham; and there is a bridewell, which is also partly used as a work-house.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £20. 2. 11., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Caius College, Cambridge. The church, which is dedicated to St. Peter, was rebuilt, in the reign of Henry VI., partly by the De Veres, Earls of Oxford, who formerly resided here, and partly by Mr. Thomas Spring, a rich clothier, whose armorial bearings are jointly displayed in many parts of the building. It is an eminently beautiful structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty clerestory, enriched battlements, and a fine square tower: the entrance is by a porch, supposed to have been erected by John, the fourteenth Earl of Oxford, and enriched with most elaborate embellishments: the ceiling of the church is covered with exquisite tracery; and the pews of the Earl of Oxford, and the Spring family, are beautiful models of the most highly-finished carving in the latest English style. In the church is a curious mural monument to Allaine Dister, a wealthy clothier of this town; and another of alabaster and marble to the Rev. Mr. Copinger. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The free school was founded, in 1647, by Richard Peacock, Esq., with an endowment of £5 per annum, augmented, in 1699, by Edward Colman, Esq., with £16 per annum; a dwelling-house and garden for the master have been added by subscription: there are at present only five boys on the foundation. Two National schools for boys and girls are supported by the proceeds of a bequest of £2000 three per cent. consols., by Henry Steward, in 1806; the income is £53. 17. 6. per annum. There are thirty almshouses, the maintenance of them being chargeable on the old town lands, which produce an income of £186 per annum, being partly distributed among the necessitous poor, who enjoy the benefit of some other benefactions. The Rev. George Ruggle, author of a Latin comedy entitled "Ignoramus," and other dramatic pieces, was born at Lavenham, in 1575.

LAVER (HIGH), a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 464 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Rev. Philip Budworth. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Here is a National school. The celebrated John Locke resided at the mansion-house of Otes in this parish, during the last two years of his life: he died in October 1704, and was interred on the south side of the church-yard: over his remains is a black marble tomb, enclosed within iron rails, and on the wall of the church is his epitaph in Latin, composed by himself.

LAVER (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 5 miles (N.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 107 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £15. 10. 5. Robert Palmer, Esq. was patron in 1824. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LAVER-MAGDALEN, a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 5½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 236 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £16. 12. 1. The Rev. J. W. Burford, D.D. was patron in 1794. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

LAVERSTOCK, a parish comprising the hamlet of

Ford in the hundred of ALDERBURY, and the tything of Milford in that of UNDERDITCH, county of WILTS, 1 mile (N. E.) from Salisbury, and containing 904 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, and in the patronage of the Vicars Choral of the Cathedral Church of Salisbury. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. Here is a celebrated establishment for lunatics, under the superintendence of Dr. Finch.

LAVERSTOKE, a parish in the hundred of OVERTON, Kingsclere division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2¾ miles (E. N. E.) from Whitchurch, containing 101 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £8. 10., and in the patronage of William Portal, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The river Test runs through the parish. Laverstoke is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

LAVERTON, a hamlet in the parish of BUCKLAND, lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER. The population is returned with the parish.

LAVERTON, a parish in the hundred of FROME, county of SOMERSET, 3½ miles (N.) from Frome, containing 189 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £6. 18. 6½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bath and Wells. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LAVERTON, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-MALZEARD, lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 6¼ miles (W. by N.) from Ripon, containing 430 inhabitants.

LAVINGTON, otherwise LINTON, a parish in the wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Corby, comprising the township of Osgodby, and the hamlets of Hanby and Keisby, and containing 330 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £14. 7. 1. Sir G. Heathcote, Bart. was patron in 1824. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LAVINGTON (EAST or MARKET), a parish in the hundred of SWANBOROUGH, county of WILTS, comprising the market town of East Lavington, and the tything of Easterton, and containing 1438 inhabitants, of which number, 1061 are in the town of East Lavington, 6 miles (S.) from Devizes, and 90 (W. by S.) from London. The town is situated in a fertile valley, at the base of the chalk hills which form the northern boundary of Salisbury plain, and consists principally of one street: the trade is chiefly in corn and malt. The market is on Wednesday; and a fair is held on the 10th of August. A court baron for the manor is held twice a year. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £14. 2. 6., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, stands on a lofty eminence, hence the popular name of Steeple-Lavington given to the town. There are two places of worship for Independents. Here is a free school for the education of thirty-six children. The learned and laborious antiquary, Dr. Thomas Tanner, Bishop of St. Asaph, and author of the "Notitia Monastica," was born here, in 1674, his father having been vicar of the parish; and at his death, in 1733, he bequeathed £200 for the benefit of the poor.

LAVINGTON (WEST), a parish in the hundred of POTTERNE and CANNINGS, county of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W. by S.) from Lavington, containing, with the tything of Littleton-Pannell, 1123 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £11. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A free school was liberally endowed with land, in 1542, by William Dauntsey. There are three almshouses for as many poor women.

LAWFORD, a parish in the hundred of TENDRING, county of ESSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W.) from Manningtree, containing 688 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has recently received an addition of one hundred and sixty sittings, of which, one hundred and ten are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches having contributed £100. In 1723, John Leach bequeathed a rent-charge of £22. 4., for teaching ten poor children, and clothing ten poor persons not receiving parochial relief. The navigable river Stour runs on the south of this parish.

LAWFORD (CHURCH), a parish in the Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Rugby, containing 355 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £11. 15. 5., and in the patronage of Lord Montagu. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LAWFORD (LITTLE), a hamlet in the parish of NEWBOLD upon AVON, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, 4 miles (W.) from Rugby, containing 27 inhabitants.

LAWFORD (LONG), a hamlet in the parish of NEWBOLD upon AVON, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Rugby, containing 474 inhabitants.

LAWHITTON, a parish in the northern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Launceston, containing 435 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £19. 6. 8., and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. This place had anciently a market and a fair, granted to one of the bishops of Exeter. A small portion of this parish is included within the borough of Launceston.

LAWKLAND, a township in the parish of CLAPHAM, western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Settle, containing 351 inhabitants. Eldroth chapel, in this township, formerly a chapel of ease, is now used as a school-room for teaching poor children, for which purpose there is an endowment in land and money, producing about £13 a year.

LAWLING, a chapelry in the parish of LATCHING-

DON, hundred of DENGIE, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Burnham. The population is returned with the parish.

LAWRENCE (ST.), a parish in the hundred of DENGIE, county of ESSEX, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Bradwell near the Sea, containing 229 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £18. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The Blackwater river is navigable on the north of this parish.

LAWRENCE (ST.), a parish in the hundred of RINGSLOW, or ISLE of THANET, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (W.) from Ramsgate, containing 1601 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Pegwell bay, on the south of this parish, abounds with a delicious fish called Prill.

LAWRENCE (ST.), a chapelry in the parish of PRESTON, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Preston. The population is returned with the parish.

LAWRENCE (ST.), a parish in the liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Newport, containing 96 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Yarborough. The church is only twenty feet long and twelve wide: the greater part of the parish consists of a slip of land extending about a mile and a half along the sea-shore, and forming part of the romantic tract called Undercliff.

LAWRENCE (ST.) ILKETSHALL, county of SUFFOLK.—See ILKETSHALL (ST. LAWRENCE).

LAWSHALL, a parish in the hundred of BABERGH, county of SUFFOLK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Bury-St. Edmund's, containing 837 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £20. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$. N. Lee Acton, Esq. was patron in 1810. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The poor children of the Sunday school are partly clothed by means of various charitable bequests.

LAWTON (CHURCH), a parish in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 6 miles (S. E.) from Sandbach, containing 512 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £9. 2. 7., and in the patronage of — Lawton, Esq. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has a Norman south door. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Here is a small fund for the instruction of poor children. The Trent and Mersey canal is joined here by the Macclesfield canal, and passes through the parish; upon its banks are coal wharfs, a small quantity of coal being raised in the parish: the Old Lawton salt works are on the border of this parish and Asbury.

LAXFIELD, a parish in the hundred of HOXNE, county of SUFFOLK, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Framlingham, containing 1158 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Cratfield, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Lord Huntingfield. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A free school was founded, in 1718, by John Smith, who endowed it with the proceeds of his manor and other estates: the income is £170 per annum: twenty boys are instructed and four apprenticed yearly and partly clothed. A sum of £5 per annum is paid to a schoolmistress for teaching twelve poor girls to read and work, and a similar sum is assigned in aid of the Sunday school: it is in contemplation to extend these schools, in consequence of the increased value of the endowment. A free school was founded, under the will of Ann Ward, in 1721, who devised £30 for that and other charitable purposes: £20 per annum is paid to a schoolmaster, who instructs ten poor children; and £10 is paid to the schoolmistress under Smith's charity, for teaching ten girls.

LAXTON, a parish in the hundred of CORBY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Rockingham, containing 190 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, and in the patronage of Lord Carbery. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LAXTON, or LEXINGTON, a parish in the South-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Tuxford, containing, with Moorhouse, 615 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £11, and in the patronage of Earl Manvers. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. Forty shillings per annum, being the interest of £40, the bequest of a person unknown, is applied towards the education of children.

LAXTON, a chapelry in the parish of HOWDEN, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, East riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Howden, containing 268 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Howdenshire, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Howden. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LAYCOCK, a parish in the hundred of CHIPPENHAM, county of WILTS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Chippenham, containing 1682 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 4. 2. W. H. F. Talbot, Esq. was patron in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. Cyriack. There is a place of worship for Independents. An abbey of nuns, of the order of St. Augustine, was founded here, in 1232, by Ela, Countess Dowager of Salisbury: it was dedicated to the Virgin Mary and St. Bernard, and at the dissolution its revenue was valued at £203. 12. 3. The remains of the conventual buildings have been fitted up as a private residence belonging to a branch of the family of Talbot: in a room, in which records are kept, is an original copy of the great charter of Henry III., deposited here by Ela, Countess of Salisbury, at the time when, during her widowhood, she held the shrievalty of the county of Wilts, being, as its endorsement imports, a copy of the principal charter sent to her in that capacity, for the use of the knights and military tenants of Wiltshire. A weekly market and an annual fair were granted to this abbey, but the former has been disused: fairs are held on July 1st and December 21st. In the centre of one of the streets of the village is an ancient stone cross.

LAYER de la HAY, a parish in the hundred of WINSTREE, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W. by S.) from Colchester, containing 603 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, endowed with £600 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. John Bawtree, Esq. was patron in 1826.

LAYER-BRETON, a parish in the hundred of WINSTREE, county of ESSEX, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Colchester, containing 259 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £7. The Rev. J. F. Benwell was patron in 1819. There is a place of worship for Independents.

LAYER-MARNEY, a parish in the hundred of WINSTREE, county of ESSEX, 7 miles (S.W.) from Colchester, containing 246 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £15. 3. 4. Matthew Corsellis, Esq. was patron in 1828. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the later style of English architecture, and contains several fine ancient monuments of the Marney family. In 1500, Sir Henry Marney erected Layer Marney hall, one of the earliest brick mansions in the kingdom: part of the south side, and the great entrance tower, which is very lofty, are yet standing. In an ancient brick edifice, about fifty yards from the church, William de Marney, in 1330, founded a college, for a warden and two chaplains.

LAYHAM, a parish in the hundred of COSFORD, county of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by E.) from Hadleigh, containing 595 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £16. 0. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

LAYSTERS, a parish in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Tenbury, containing 227 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £500 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Thomas Elton Miller. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. An ancient ecclesiastical establishment here was connected with the priory of Shene in Surrey: there are still some vestiges of the buildings on a farm called the Cinders, being partially surrounded by a moat.

LAYSTHORPE, a joint township with East Newton, in the parish of STONEGRAVE, wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Helmsley. The population is returned with East Newton.

LAYSTON, a parish in the hundred of EDWINSTREE, county of HERTFORD, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. N. E.) from Buntingford, containing 1014 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Buntingford, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14. 16. 2., and in the patronage of William Butt, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is situated in the fields, about half a mile eastward from the town of Buntingford, in the centre of the site of the ancient village of Layston, which has totally disappeared: it is used only for the solemnization of marriages, the parishioners resorting to the chapel at Buntingford, on account of its greater convenience. There are two small endowments, one by Esdras Bland in 1668, and the other by Lady Jane Barkham in 1653, for the instruction of poor children. (See Buntingford).

LAYTHAM, a township in the parish of AUGHTON, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, 8 miles (N.) from Howden, containing 125 inhabitants.

LAYTON, a joint township with Warbrick, in the parish of BISPHAM, hundred of AMOUDERNESSE, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W.) from Poulton, containing, with Warbrick, 749 inhabitants.

LAYTON (EAST), a township in that part of the parish of STANWICK, ST. JOHN, which is in the western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (E.S.E.) from Greta Bridge, containing 137 inhabitants.

LAYTON (WEST), a township in the parish of HUTTON-MAGNUM, western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Greta Bridge, containing 69 inhabitants.

LAZONBY, a parish in LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, comprising the chapelry of Plumpton-Wall, and the township of Lazonby, and containing 801 inhabitants, of which number, 533 are in the township of Lazonby, 1 mile (S.W.) from Kirk-Oswald. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £13. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The river Eden bounds this parish on the east, and the Petterill on the west. In Baron wood is a lofty rock, wherein is an artificial cave, called Giant's Chamber, or Sampson's cave. The great Roman road passes from north to south, and another intersects the parish in a direction towards Salkeld bridge. Here is a good freestone quarry, and one producing stone for mill-stones. At Castle Rigg are the ruins of a moated building; and upon the fell, urns, containing bones and ashes, were discovered, some years ago. There are several cairns on the commons.

LEA, a township in that part of the parish of BACKFORD which is in the higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (N.N.W.) from Chester, containing 87 inhabitants.

LEA, a township in the parish of WYBUNBURY, hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, containing 71 inhabitants. The Ellesmere, or Wyrall, canal passes through this parish.

LEA, county of DERBY. —See DETHWICK-LEA.

LEA, a parish partly in the hundred of ST. BRIAVELLS, county of GLOUCESTER, and partly in the hundred of GREYTREE, county of HEREFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.S.E.) from Ross, containing 180 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Gloucester, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of St. John's College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. John.

LEA, a joint township with Ashton, Ingol, and Cotnam, in the parish of PRESTON, hundred of AMOUDERNESSE, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Preston, containing 658 inhabitants. A school was erected and endowed with a rent-charge on an estate, in 1784, by Samuel Neeld; the income is £90 per annum, and there are fifteen scholars.

LEA, a parish in the wapentake of CORRINGHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Gainsborough, containing 199 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 4. 2., and in the patronage of the Rev. Sir C. J. Anderson, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Helen. Here are some fish ponds and a moat, the remains of an ancient religious house. Gypsum is found under the marl in this parish. A Cistercian nunnery was founded, in 1180, at Hevening, in this parish, by Reynier Evermue; it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and at the dissolution had a revenue of £58. 13. 4.

LEA, a parish in the hundred of MALMESBURY, county of WILTS, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E.S.E.) from Malmesbury, containing, with the township of Cleverton, 371 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Allcannings, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury.

LEA-BAILEY, a tything in the parish of NEWLAND, hundred of ST. BRIAVELLS, county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E.) from Ross, containing 93 inhabitants.

LEA-HALL, a hamlet in that part of the parish of BRADBORNE which is in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Ashbourn, containing 23 inhabitants.

LEA-MARSTON, a parish in the Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, 4 miles (N.) from Coleshill, containing 284 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty. C. B. Adderley, Esq. was patron in 1817. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

LEA-NEWBOLD, a township in that part of the parish of ST. OSWALD, CHESTER, which is in the lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, 6 miles (S.S.E.) from Chester, containing 61 inhabitants.

LEACH, a joint township with Marlston, in that part of the parish of ST. MARY, CHESTER, which is in the lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Chester. The population is returned with Marlston.

LEACROFT, a joint township with Hednesford, in the parish of CANNOCK, eastern division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, 6 miles (S.E. by E.) from Penkridge. The population is returned with Hednesford. Here is a considerable manufactory for edge tools; and coal is raised in this part of the parish.

LEADENHAM, a parish in the wapentake of LOVE-DEN, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 9 miles (N.W. by W.) from Sleaford, containing 574 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £29. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. Thomas Brown was patron in 1822. The church, dedicated to St. Swithin, is partly in the decorated, and partly in the later English, style, and has a tower and spire of elegant proportions. The petty sessions for the division are held here.

LEAD-HALL, a township in that part of the parish of RYTHER which is in the upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Tadcaster, containing 50 inhabitants.

LEADON (HIGH), a hamlet in that part of the parish of RUDFORD which is in the lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Newent, containing 92 inhabitants.

LEAFIELD, a chapelry in the parish of SHIPTON under WHICHWOOD, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Witney, containing 553 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant. The chapel, founded in the reign of Elizabeth, by Sir Henry Upton, and dedicated to St. Michael, has lately received an addition of two hundred and eighty sittings, of which, two hundred and fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £250 towards defraying the expense.

LEAGRAM, a joint township with Bowland, in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 9 miles (W. N. W.) from Clitheroe, containing, with Bowland, 370 inhabitants.

LEAK, a parish comprising the townships of Borrowby, Crosby, Knayton with Brawith, Landmoth with Catto and Leak, in the wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, the chapelry of Nether-Silton, and the township of Gueldable, in the wapentake of BIRDFORTH, North riding of the county of YORK, and containing 1083 inhabitants, of which number, 11 are in the township of Leak, 6 miles (N.) from Thirsk. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Durham, rated in the king's books at £16. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a small sum for the instruction of poor children. Leak was once a large town, but was destroyed about the time of the Conquest: the church and a farm-house alone remain in the township.

LEAKE, a parish in the wapentake of SKIRBECK, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Boston, containing 1417 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Governors of Oakham school. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. Thomas Allenson, in 1555, bequeathed land for the support of a school, and for the maintenance of five poor people of the parish.

LEAKE (EAST), a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Kegworth, containing 783 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of West Leake, not rated in the king's books, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, exhibits a fine specimen of the later style of English architecture. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school was founded and endowed with lands, about 1731, by John Blay, citizen of London, and a native of this place: the income is about £48 per annum: forty boys are instructed. He likewise bequeathed £10 to every farmer, and £5 to every cottager, in the village. Many of the inhabitants are employed in frame-work knitting. This parish is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

LEAKE (WEST), a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Kegworth, containing 211 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with which that of East Leake is united, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £25. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Hastings.

LEAMINGTON-HASTINGS, a parish in the Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Southam, containing 444 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £20. The Rev. H. W. Sitwell was patron in 1822. The church is dedicated to All Saints. About thirty poor children are educated by a schoolmaster, who receives £25 per annum, chargeable on the parish land. In the reign of James I. an hospital for the maintenance of eight poor persons of this parish was founded, and endowed by Humphrey Davis. An almshouse also was founded and endowed, in 1687, for two poor persons, by means of a bequest from Dorothy, widow of Sir Charles Wheeler, Bart. The Warwick and Napton canal passes through this parish, on the southern side.

LEAMINGTON-PRIORS, a parish and fashionable watering-place, in the Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Warwick, and 90 (N. W.) from London, containing 2183 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the river Leam, on which it is situated, and from its having originally belonged to the priory of Kenilworth. From an obscure hamlet consisting only of a few cottages it has, within the last twenty years, from the celebrity of its mineral springs, risen with unprecedented rapidity into a large and populous town, which, for the spaciousness of its streets, the elegance of its houses, and the beauty and interest of the surrounding scenery, is not excelled by any watering-place in the kingdom. It is visited during the season by numerous families of distinction, and by invalids who frequent it for the benefit of the waters; and, from the salubrity of the air, and the mildness of its temperature, it has become the permanent residence of a number of respectable families, who have erected handsome dwelling-houses in various parts of the town and its immediate vicinity. So rapid has been its increase that it has, within the short space of twenty years, quadrupled its population, which upon a moderate computation must have been more than doubled since the last census. The town is situated in a fine open vale, sheltered from the severity of the winds by gentle acclivities richly clothed with wood, and surrounded by a fertile and highly-cultivated tract of country, abounding with objects of historical interest, and with scenes of impressive beauty. The river Leam, over which is a handsome stone bridge connecting the old with the new town, and the river Avon, wind through the adjoining meadows, enlivening the landscape; and in the distance are seen the stately towers of Warwick castle and church, rising above the intervening groves, and presenting themselves in various points of view with increasing beauty and effect. The mineral springs are of three kinds, sulphureous, saline, and chalybeate: the water of the sulphureous spring, according to the analysis of Dr. Loudon, a resident physician, contains sulphuric acid, chlorine, soda, lime, and magnesia; the gases are oxygen, azote, carbonic acid, and sulphuretted hydrogen. The saline water contains chlorine, lime, sulphuric acid, magnesia, silica, peroxide of iron, and soda; the gases are oxygen, azote, and carbonic acid. The chalybeate water contains chlorine, sulphuric acid, lime, magnesia, sodium, silica, and peroxide of iron; the gases are oxygen, azote, and carbonic acid; the saline and chalybeate waters differing chiefly in the proportions of their respective ingredients. There is a constant and plentiful supply of the mineral waters for drinking and for bathing, and the varieties of the several springs comprehend the respective properties and rival the efficacy of the Cheltenham, Harrogate, and Tunbridge waters.

The spring first discovered here, and now called the Old Well, is described by Camden, Speed, and Dugdale; its water was analysed in 1688, and it has recently been enclosed by Lord Aylesford, who has erected a neat pump-room over it, containing a marble font, from which a pipe is conducted on the outside of the building, for the use of the poor. The second spring was discovered in 1784, by Mr. Abbots, who erected six warm baths, a cold bath, and shower baths, with dressing-rooms adjoining; since that time, numerous establishments have been fitted up in various parts of the town, all similarly conducted, of which the principal are the Royal Spa, a handsome stone building, with a fine colonnade of the Doric order, extending the whole length of the front, and having an entrance near each end leading respectively to the gentlemen's and ladies' baths, and into the pump-room, which is in the centre. This establishment contains fifteen hot, cold, and shower baths, of which two are provided with cranes for lowering and raising invalids in a chair: the baths are furnished with dressing-rooms and every requisite accommodation; the pump-room, eighty-five feet long, thirty-six wide, and of proportionate height, is lighted by a range of upper windows; the walls are ornamented with Doric pilasters supporting a handsome entablature: at one end of the room is the pump, with two pipes, one of sulphureous, the other of saline, water; and at the other end is an orchestra, in which a well-selected band performs during the hours of attendance: this elegant building, which forms one of the principal ornaments of the town, is situated on the banks of the river Leam, between the old and the new town; the grounds are tastefully laid out in lawns, shrubberies, and walks, affording a fine promenade, and, during the hours of walking, an excellent band is in attendance. The Imperial Fount and marble baths in Clemens-street contain a complete arrangement of twelve hot, cold, sulphureous, vapour, fumigating, and shower baths, with jets d'eau for topical application, and a pump of sulphureous, saline, and chalybeate water, with every requisite accommodation and attendance. Wise's baths, at the corner of Bath-street; Robbins' bath, near the bridge; Smith's original baths, in Bath-street; and various similar establishments, are all arranged with due care, and attended with every regard to the accommodation of the persons frequenting them. In proportion to the number and rank of the visitors are the hotels and lodging-houses provided for their accommodation. Among the numerous establishments of the kind, the most conspicuous are, the Regent's and Copps' hotels: the former is an extensive and elegant range of building in the new town, splendidly fitted up as a family hotel and public boarding-house; it has stabling for upwards of one hundred horses, with proportionate standings for carriages. Nearly adjoining the hotel is a private lodging-house belonging to the proprietor, a beautiful structure in the later English style of architecture, containing several spacious rooms, and a suite of offices, in every respect adapted for the residence of a family of distinction, with gardens and pleasure grounds tastefully laid out. Copps', or the Royal hotel, in the High-street, formerly consisting of several houses, has been partly rebuilt, and now forms a splendid establishment, having a very handsome façade in the Grecian style of architecture, with an elegant portico of the Corinthian order: the accommodations, in every respect, are adapted to the reception of families of the highest rank, and the domestic regulations are calculated to promote the comfort of its numerous guests: it has accommodation for ninety horses, and carriages in proportion. The Bedford hotel, in Union Parade; the Blenheim hotel, in Clemens-street, and numerous others on a smaller scale, are all under excellent regulation; and there are numerous private boarding and lodging-houses of every grade, suited to the taste, condition, and requirements of the various classes of visitors.

The town is well paved, and lighted with gas under the direction of commissioners appointed under an act of parliament obtained for that purpose, and amply supplied with water; the streets are spacious, and intersect each other at right angles; the houses are handsomely built, and fronted with Roman cement; and many of them display elegant specimens of Grecian and other kinds of architecture. The public library and reading-rooms, in Bath-street, constitute a handsome structure, with a colonnade of six Ionic pillars, supporting an entablature and pediment, and resting upon a piazza, which forms the entrance; the reading-room is forty feet long, and thirty-six feet wide, with a circular end, separated from the principal area by two Ionic pillars, and two pilasters of green porphyry, and opening by folding doors into a pleasant lawn, in which are a fountain, and a small orchestra; contiguous to the principal reading-room is one smaller, which is generally used in the winter season. Above the reading-rooms and library is a spacious and elegant assembly-room, eighty feet long, and forty feet wide, chastely ornamented, and lighted by three magnificent chandeliers suspended from the ceiling; at one end of the room is a noble mirror of plate glass, twelve feet high, and eight feet wide; the card and refreshment rooms are equally splendid, and the whole suite is admirably adapted for either for public or private meetings. The upper assembly-rooms, in the Union Parade, comprise a ball-room ninety-six feet in length, forty-five feet in width, and twenty-six feet high, lighted by a range of seven windows on one side: the walls are ornamented by a row of pilasters of the Ionic order, and the ceiling is divided into compartments, from which are suspended three elegant chandeliers; attached to the assembly-room are card and refreshment rooms, of uniform character: subscription assemblies take place here every fortnight during the winter, and every week during the summer: the Philharmonic concerts are held here four nights during the summer season. The buildings, which were erected in 1812, comprise also a news-room and a billiard-room. Bisset's museum and picture gallery is a place of general resort: it contains a collection of British and foreign birds, beasts, fishes, and insects; the arms, dresses, and musical and war-like instruments, of barbarous nations; and an extensive collection of pictures. The theatre, a small building neatly fitted up, is open three times in the week during the season; and the races which take place at Warwick, in the spring, from the patronage of the resident gentry, may be almost considered as belonging to this place; the ladies of Leamington contribute fifty guineas to the sweepstakes at these races; and the gentlemen, the Leamington cup, of fifty guineas' value. Ranelagh gardens, occupying ten acres, and neatly laid out in walks and shrubberies, form a pleasing promenade; a botanical collection is now in progress, and hot-houses and green-houses have been erected on an extensive scale. The market is on Wednesday, and is abundantly supplied with provisions of every kind. The Warwick and Knapton canal, passing through the town, supplies the inhabitants, at a moderate price, with coal from the pits in the neighbourhood of Birmingham.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 10., and in the patronage of the Rev. Henry Wise. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient structure in the decorated style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire; it has been considerably enlarged, and has undergone many recent alterations. An episcopal chapel in the upper town was erected after the design, and at the expense, of the Rev. R. Downes, the present vicar, and has been licensed, but not consecrated: the building is professedly after the Norman model, and in some respects the details of that style have been partially imitated: the interior is darkened by the adoption of the massive round column, and the deep-toned painting of the glass in the windows; and the exterior forms a solitary and a striking deviation from the good taste which prevails generally in the architectural features of the town. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists, and a Roman Catholic chapel, a small, but handsome edifice, having, in a niche over the entrance, a whole-length figure of St. Peter, with a key in his right hand, finely sculptured. The National school is a neat and commodious building, having, on the ground-floor, a school-room for boys, and above it one of equal dimensions for girls, together with apartments for the master and the mistress. Baths have been erected for the gratuitous use of the poor, and there are various bequests for charitable purposes.

LEAP, a tything in the parish of EXBURY, in that part of the hundred of BISHOP'S WALTHAM which is in the New Forest (East) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Lymington. The population is returned with the parish. The village, being nearly opposite to Cowes, is the common place of embarkation for the Isle of Wight from this part of Hampshire.

LEARCHILD, a township in the parish of EDLINGHAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Alnwick, containing 30 inhabitants.

LEASINGHAM (NORTH), or ROXHOLME, a parish in the wapentake of FLAXWELL, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Sleaford, containing 87 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united, in 1726, to the rectory of South Leasingham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10. 15. 5. The church, which was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has been demolished.

LEASINGHAM (SOUTH), a parish in the wapentake of FLAXWELL, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Sleaford, containing 259 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, to which that of North Leasingham was united in 1726, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$. Sir J. H. Thorold, Bart. was patron in 1786. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

LEATHERHEAD, a parish (formerly a market town) in the second division of the hundred of CORTHORNE, county of SURREY, 12 miles (E. N. E.) from Guildford, and 18 (S. W. by S.) from London, containing 1478 inhabitants. This place, anciently called Leddrede, is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river Mole, over which there is a bridge of fourteen arches, built of brick. The vale through which this stream flows, in its course to Reigate, is bounded on each side by a range of steep eminences, on the declivities of which are numerous elegant seats, and fine parks and plantations; and the scenery in the neighbourhood is highly picturesque and beautiful. The trade of the town is inconsiderable, and the market is disused; but a fair is held on the 10th of October, in a field to the north of the town, chiefly for the sale of horses and pigs. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £14. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Rochester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Nicholas, is a cruciform structure, said to have been founded by Edward I.: the nave and aisles are of the early English style, the chancel of the decorated, and the tower and north transept of the later English; the east window is ornamented with stained glass: within is a fine screen, and a painting of the "Last Supper." There is a place of worship for Independents. A free school for ten boys is endowed with £15 per annum, principally from a bequest by John Lucas, who, in 1796, left £400 South Sea annuities, for the support of this charity. Several other benefactions have been made for distribution among the poor.

LEATHLEY, a parish in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Castley and Leathley, and containing 422 inhabitants, of which number, 312 are in the township of Leathley, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Otley. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £7. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. A free school was founded and endowed with a rent-charge of £12, in 1769, by Anne Hitch; all children who apply are admitted.

LEAVELAND, a parish in the hundred of FAVERSHAM, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Faversham, containing 69 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Badlesmere, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £4, and in the patronage of Lord Sondes. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence.

LEAVENING, a township in the parish of ACKLAM, partly in the wapentake of BUCKROSE, and partly within the liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, East riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from New Malton, containing 294 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LEAVINGTON (CASTLE), a township in the parish of KIRK-LEAVINGTON, western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Yarm, containing 44 inhabitants. Here was anciently a castle, but the eminence on which it stood, called Castle hill, is the only remaining vestige of its existence.

LEAVINGTON (KIRK), a parish in the western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Castle-Leavington, Kirk-Leavington, Pickton, and Low Worsall, and containing 637 inhabitants, of which number, 282 are in the township of Kirk-Leavington, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Yarm. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church, dedicated to St. Martin, is a small ancient structure.

LEBTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of NORTH WITHAM, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (S.E. by S.) from Colsterworth, containing 35 inhabitants.

LECHLADE, or LEACHLADE, a market town and parish in the hundred of BRIGHTWELLS - BARROW, county of GLOUCESTER, 28 miles (S.E.) from Gloucester, and 75 (W. by N.) from London, containing, with Linhill, 1154 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the little river Leche, and the Saxon word ladean, to empty; this stream rises near North-Leach, and falls into the Thames below St. John's bridge, in this parish. In Domesday-book the manor is reckoned among the possessions of Henry de Ferrars, who had an eel-fishery here. The town is situated on the margin of the Thames, near its confluence with the Leche, on the road from Cirencester to London: it is neatly built, and consists principally of one long and wide street, not regularly paved nor lighted, but the inhabitants are sufficiently supplied with water from wells. Its commerce depends chiefly on the transit of commodities, particularly Wiltshire and Gloucester cheese, brought hither in wagons for conveyance to the metropolis by the Thames, that river becoming navigable at this place; and here the canal terminates which unites this river and the Severn. The market, for which a grant was obtained by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, brother of Henry III., is held on Tuesday, but almost disused: the fairs are, August 5th and 10th for cattle and toys, and September 9th for cattle and cheese, which last is much frequented. A constable and a tythingman are appointed at a triennial court leet held by the lord of the manor.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £12. 13. 4 and in the patronage of the Rev. J. Leigh Bennett. The church, which is dedicated to St. Lawrence, is a handsome structure in the later style of English architecture, built about the middle of the fifteenth century, at the joint expense of the vicar, the inmates of Lechlade priory, and the inhabitants of the parish; the spire is remarkable for its symmetrical beauty, and the pulpit is of sculptured stone. There is a place of worship for Baptists. In 1787, Thomas Oatridge bequeathed £100 stock in the three per cent. consols., to the Sunday school in this parish, and £3 per annum is accordingly paid to it by the minister. In a meadow near St. John's bridge formerly stood a priory of Black canons, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, which was founded by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, in the reign of Henry III., the revenue of which, on its suppression in 1743, was applied to the foundation of a chantry in the parish church. There was also an hospital on or near the bridge, founded by Peter Fitz-Herbert, about the time of Henry III. Towards the end of the last century, a subterraneous structure was discovered in a meadow in the vicinity, with brick pillars and Mosaic pavement, supposed to have been a Roman bath, from which circumstance it has been conjectured that this was a Roman town, to which a vicinal road extended from Cirencester. Thomas Coxeter, an eminent antiquary, was born here in 1689.

LECK, a chapelry in the parish of TUNSTALL, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale, containing 284 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Tunstall.

LECKBY, a joint township with Cundall, in the parish of CUNDALL, wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Boroughbridge. The population is returned with Cundall.

LECKFORD, a parish in the hundred of KING'S SOMBOURN, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.N.E.) from Stockbridge, containing 200 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £8. 16. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Leckford in the Cathedral Church of Winchester: the prebend, or sinecure rectory, rated in the king's books at £9, is in the patronage of the President and Fellows of St. John's College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The Andover canal passes close to the village.

LECKHAMPSTEAD, a chapelry in the parish of CHIEVELEY, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, 5¼ miles (S.W.) from East Ilsley, containing 358 inhabitants.

LECKHAMPSTEAD, a parish in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, 3½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Buckingham, containing 519 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £15. 13. 4., and in the patronage of John Beauclerk, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains an octagonal font, ornamented with representations of the Crucifixion, St. Catherine, &c., rudely executed in basso relievo. There is an endowment of £15 per annum for a free school. This parish is divided into Church-end, North-end, and Lymes'-end: within its limits there is a chalybeate spring.

LECKHAMPTON, a parish in the hundred of CHELTHENHAM, county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Cheltenham, containing 318 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £18. 13. 4., and in the patronage of C. N. Trye, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. A branch of the Gloucester and Cheltenham railway passes through this parish to the Crippets on the south.

LECKONFIELD, a parish in the Hunsley-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Beverley, containing 302 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Egremont. Here was anciently a castle belonging to the Earls of Northumberland.

LEDBURN, a hamlet in the parish of MENTMORE, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Leighton-Buzzard, containing 165 inhabitants.

LEDBURY, a parish in the hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, comprising the market town of Ledbury, and the township of Parkhold, and containing 3476 inhabitants, of which number, 3421 are in the town of Ledbury, 15 miles (E. by S.) from Hereford, and 120 (W. N. W.) from London. This place derives its name from the Leden, which intersects the parish from north to south. The town, which stands at the eastern angle of the county, and at the southern extremity of the Malvern hills, is situated on a declivity, and consists of three principal streets, which run north and south, and are intersected by smaller ones at right angles; they are lighted, and partially paved, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water: in the more ancient parts of the town the houses are composed of timber and brick, with projecting stories; the modern houses are of red brick, presenting a respectable appearance. The manufacture of silk and broad cloth was carried on here to a considerable extent during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., but at present the principal business consists in the manufacture of ropes, lines, and sacking; and there are also malt-houses and tan-yards. Hops are cultivated, and cider and perry made, in the neighbourhood, and, in productive seasons, a great quantity of the former liquor is sent to all parts of the kingdom. There are some quarries of excellent limestone, and others of grey marble. The Hereford and Gloucester canal, projected some years since, extends only from Gloucester to this town at present, having been left unfinished. The market is on Tuesday, for poultry, butter, and pedlary; and fairs are held on the Monday after February 1st, Monday before Easter, May 12th, June 22nd, October 2nd, and the Monday before December 21st, for cattle, pigs, &c. The market-house is an ancient edifice of timber and brick, supported on sixteen strong oak pillars. The parish is divided into five parts, the borough, Wall Hills, Ledon and Haffield, Wellington, and Mitchell and Netherton; the last four of these form the Foreign of the manor, for which courts leet and baron are held annually, when the constables for the town are chosen: the borough is called the Denizen, and has likewise a court leet and baron annually. Petty sessions for the hundred are held here every Wednesday. Ledbury sent members to two parliaments in the reign of Edward I., but surrendered the elective franchise subsequently, on the plea of poverty.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £14. 12. 6.: the rectory is divided into the two portions of Overhall and Netherhall: the Bishop of Hereford appoints the portionists, who present to the vicarage alternately. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a spacious and handsome structure, exhibiting some fine specimens of Norman architecture, particularly the door in the centre of the west front, and the chancel, on the north side of which is a chapel, dedicated to St. Catherine, of decorated character: the north porch is in the early style of English architecture, as is also the tower, which is detached from the church, and is surmounted by a finely-proportioned spire, about sixty feet in height, which, in 1811, was struck by lightning, but sustained little injury. Over the altar is a painting of the Lord's Supper, copied from an original by Rubens; and at the east end of the north aisle, a new window, recently made, is ornamented with the figures of Faith, Hope, and Charity, in stained glass, the expense of which was £500: the church has recently undergone internal repairs and decorations, the cost of which was defrayed by voluntary contributions: there are several interesting monuments. The Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists have each a place of worship. There are two endowed schools, with residences for the master and the mistress: one for boys, who are taught to read and write, and another for girls, who are taught to read and work; at another school, said to have been founded at the dissolution of a chantry attached to the church, four boys are taught writing and arithmetic gratuitously, and there are other boys who pay £1. 16. per annum: the master receives a stipend annually from the Exchequer, and occupies the building rent-free; formerly the masters of this school were clergymen, but within the last thirty years they have been laymen, and are chosen at a vestry meeting. The hospital of St. Catherine was founded, in the thirteenth century, by Hugh Foliot, Bishop of Hereford, and endowed for six widowers and four widows: the revenue was valued at the dissolution at £32. 7. 11., but it was refounded by Elizabeth, in 1580, for a master, seven poor widowers, and three widows: the Dean and Chapter of Hereford are the trustees. The increase of funds enabled the trustees to erect a new hospital, in 1822, from a design by Mr. Smirke, intended to comprise twenty-four dwellings, for as many brethren, twelve only of which have been hitherto completed, at an expense of £5888: each inmate receives six shillings per week, and a quarterly payment of £1. 2., with other advantages. The senior canon of Hereford cathedral, as master, has a good dwelling-house and a large garden near the hospital, where he is required to reside two months in the year; to his annual stipend is added a farm of seventy acres, and forty acres of coppice wood, and he has the appointment of the brethren and the sisters. Morning service is performed in a chapel adjoining the hospital, four days in the week, by the chaplain, who, in addition to his salary, has the incumbency of one of the livings in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter. There are several almshouses for poor persons; and a dispensary was established in 1824. At Well Hills, about a mile from the town, is a camp, supposed to have been originally British, though subsequently occupied as a Roman station, containing an area of about thirty acres; a smaller camp at Haffield was probably used as a temporary position. Within this parish is also a part of the famous Beacon camp, considered by some antiquaries as one of the fortresses constructed by Caractacus, when this part of Britain was invaded by the Romans under Ostorius Scapula. At Ledbury died Jacob Tonson, an eminent bookseller, and the subject of a satirical triplet by Dryden, whose epitaph, published in the Gentleman's Magazine for February 1736, was closely copied by Dr. Benjamin Franklin, for his own tombstone, and has been often recorded in print.

LEDHAM, a township in the parish of NESTON, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chester, containing 74 inhabitants.

LEDHAM, a parish in the upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Fairburn, Ledsham, and Ledstone, and containing 881 inhabitants, of which number, 212 are in the township of Ledsham, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ferry-Bridge. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £7. 4. 2., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. Mrs. Wheler was patroness in 1826. The church, dedicated to All Saints, contains a splendid monument to the memory of Lady Elizabeth Hastings; her figure is placed in a reclining posture, and those of Lady Frances and Lady Ann, her sisters, are placed on pedestals by its side: the inscription is in Latin. Lady Elizabeth Hastings, in 1738, founded and endowed a school for twenty orphan girls, and another for twenty boys, all of whom are supplied with books.

LEDSTONE, a township in the parish of LEDHAM, upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (N. W.) from Ferry-Bridge, containing 243 inhabitants.

LEDWELL, a hamlet in the parish of SANDFORD, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Neat Enstone. The population is returned with the parish. Here was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. A fine sand, used in the manufacture of glass, is found in the vicinity.

LEE, a parish in the hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Great Missenden, containing 198 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £8 per annum and £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Henry Deering, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was formerly a chapel of ease to the rectory of Weston-Turville.

LEE, a parish in the hundred of BLACKHEATH, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, 7 miles (S. E. by E.) from London, containing 737 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £3. 11. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, which stands on an eminence near Blackheath, is built of flint and stone, and has a neat cemetery containing several handsome monuments, the most conspicuous of which are those of the great astronomer, Edmund Halley; the celebrated comedian, William Parsons; the amiable Lady Dacre; and Sir Samuel Fludyer, Bart., who, as lord mayor of London in 1761, gave a sumptuous banquet to George III. and his royal consort. Christopher Boone, in 1683, founded and endowed an almshouse for six poor persons, with a chapel attached, and a school for twelve poor children; the endowment, which is vested in the company of Merchant Taylors in London, consists of certain lands and houses producing an income of about £71 per annum. This parish has the right of sending one boy to the school at Blackheath founded by Mr. Colfe.

LEE (EAST, or CHAPEL), a liberty in the parish of EAST TILBURY, hundred of BARSTABLE, county of ESSEX, containing 10 inhabitants.

LEE (ST. JOHN), a parish in the southern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Hexham, comprising the chapelries of Bingfield and Wall, and the townships of West Acomb, Anick, Anick-Grange, Cocklaw, Fallowfield, Hallington, Portgate, and Sandhoe, and containing 1952 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of York, for the Peculiar Court of Hexhamshire, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of T. R. Beaumont, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. John of Beverley, and situated on a fine eminence on the northern side of the river Tyne, was anciently noted for an annual procession made to it by the monks of Hexham. There are mines of coal and lead in the parish.

LEE-BOTWOOD, a parish in the hundred of CONDOVER, county of SALOP, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Church-Stretton, containing 204 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to that of Longnor, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Archdeacon Corbett. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, once belonged to the abbey of Haughmond. Coal and limestone are obtained in the parish, through which runs a small brook called the Rae.

LEE-BROCKHURST, a parish in the Whitchurch division of the hundred of BRADFORD (North), county of SALOP, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wem, containing 162 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of—Clayton, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LEE-WARD, a township in the parish of ROTHBURY, western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Rothbury, containing 93 inhabitants.

LEEMAILING, a township in the parish of BELLINGHAM, north-western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 1 mile (W. N. W.) from Bellingham, containing 285 inhabitants. There is a neat domestic chapel at Hesleyside, the seat of William John Charlton, Esq. The township is bounded on the north by the North Tyne river.

LEEDS, a parish in the hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Maidstone, containing 515 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, to which that of Broomfield is united, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, has at the west end a remarkably low square tower. Leeds is said to have derived its name from Ledian, counsellor to Ethelbert II., who built here a fortress in 978. Subsequently, in 1119, a priory of Black canons, in honour of St. Mary and St. Nicholas, was founded by Robert de Crepito Corde, alias Creveceur, or Croucheart, Knt., the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £362. 7. 7. The abbey church was equal in magnitude and beauty to a cathedral, and the monastic buildings, considerable remains of which still exist, were of correspondent size and grandeur. Leeds castle, the residence of the family of Fairfax, is one of the most stately in the kingdom: it is seated in a beautiful park, is surrounded by a moat, and approached by a stone bridge of two arches: the buildings, which are entirely of stone, are ranged round a spacious quadrangle, and though they exhibit the architecture of different periods, the structure as a whole produces a most striking and noble effect. It has two ancient gateways, a grand hall, and a magnificent suite of state apartments: there are also the remains of the inner vallum, of the keep, and of various other detached parts, said to have been erected by the Creveceurs, its ancient owners, by William of Wykeham, and by Henry VIII. George III. and his royal consort were entertained here with great splendour in their excursion to Coxheath Camp, in 1779. Courts leet and baron are held annually, at which three officers, termed Bors-holders, are appointed.

Seal and Arms.

LEEDS, a parish and liberty, in the West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the market town of Leeds, which has a separate jurisdiction, though locally in the wapentake of Skyrack, the chapelries of Armley, Beeston, Bramley, Chapel-Allerton, Farnley, Headingley with Burley, Holbeck, Hunslet or Hunfleet, and Wortley, and the township of Potter-Newton, and containing 83,796 inhabitants, of which number, 48,603 are in the town of Leeds, 25 miles (S. W. by W.) from York, and 191 (N. N. W.) from London. From what source this place, anciently called Loidis, derives its name, has not been ascertained. It was made a royal vill after the destruction of the ancient Cambodunum by Cadwallo, a British prince, and Penda, King of Mercia, over the last of whom, on his subsequent invasion of Northumberland, in 655, Oswego, King of Bernicia, obtained a signal victory in the immediate vicinity of the town. During the reign of William the Conqueror, Ilbert de Lacy is supposed to have erected a castle here, which was besieged by King Stephen, on his route towards Scotland, and in which Richard II., after his deposition, was for some time confined, previously to his removal to Pontefract: but there are no vestiges of it, nor can the site, which is stated to have been on Mill hill, be distinguished by any traces of its previous existence. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., many skirmishes between the contending parties took place in the neighbourhood, and that monarch resided for some time in the town, in a mansion supposed to have been the first in that part of the kingdom that was built of brick, and, from the colour of that material, called the Red Hall.

The town, which is more celebrated as the principal seat of the woollen manufacture, than either for its antiquity or for its historical importance, is pleasantly situated on the summit and acclivities of an eminence rising gradually from the northern bank of the river Aire, over which are two substantial bridges of free-stone; one consisting of five arches, and the other, about a mile to the west, erected in 1817, from a design by Rennie, at an expense of £7000, and called Wellington bridge, consisting of one beautiful arch, one hundred feet in span: to the east of the latter a suspension bridge is now being constructed, the expense of which is estimated at £4500. The streets in the more ancient parts of the town are inconveniently narrow, but in other parts spacious and commodious: many improvements have been effected under the provisions of acts of parliament obtained in 1809 and 1815, under which also the town is well paved, lighted with oil and coal gas by companies who have extensive works in York street and Park-street, and supplied with excellent water forced from the Aire by an engine into three capacious reservoirs, from which, after undergoing a process of purification, it is distributed to the houses of the inhabitants. The houses are in general neatly built of brick, and roofed with white slate, and in various parts of the town are some elegant mansions and handsome ranges of modern buildings, among which latter is Park-place, in front of which the ground is tastefully laid out in shrubberies and walks: the environs afford much beautiful scenery, and are embellished with numerous seats and elegant villas. There is an establishment of hackney coaches in the town. The Literary and Philosophical Society, consisting of sixty proprietary, and one hundred ordinary, members, was established in 1820; meetings are held on the first and third Fridays in every month, from November till May, for the discussion of literary and philosophical subjects. The hall appropriated to this purpose is a handsome stone building, erected, by Mr. Chantrell, in the Grecian style of architecture, and comprises a lecture-room, library, and museum. A museum of natural curiosities was also established by Mr. Calvert, in 1827. The Northern Society, for the encouragement of the fine arts, and under the patronage of the King, has a handsome gallery adjoining the music-hall; and a horticultural society, established in 1820, holds its meetings in the town. There are several public subscription libraries, of which the principal are, the old library, in Commercial-street; the new library, in Albion-street, consisting of one hundred proprietary members, whose shares are £7. 7. each, and an annual subscription of £1. 5.; the parochial library, containing works on Theology, for the use of the resident clergy of the establishment; the Methodists' and the Eclectic libraries. The commercial buildings, a handsome edifice of stone, with a noble circular portico, comprising a news-room, hotel, and commercial offices, were erected in 1826, and are equally an accommodation and an ornament to the town. The mechanics' institution, to which a useful library is attached, was established in 1825. The theatre, a neat building erected, in 1771, by Mr. Tate Wilkinson, is opened, during the months of May and June, by the York company: subscription concerts take place every fortnight during the season, at the music-hall in Albion-street; and assemblies are held every alternate week during the winter, in a handsome suite of rooms over the White Cloth hall. The public baths, in Wellington-road, a handsome range of buildings erected, in 1820, by the same architect, and in the same style, as the philosophical hall, are commodiously arranged, and comprise hot, cold, shower, and vapour baths, with others artificially prepared, and possessing the properties and temperature of the Matlock and Buxton waters. The Masonic hall is a neat edifice in Stein's buildings, Briggate; and a bazaar, on the principle of those in the metropolis, was established in 1826, for which a neat building has been erected, which is well calculated for the exhibition and sale of fancy articles. The cavalry barracks, near the north road, form a very extensive and complete establishment, occupying eleven acres of ground; the buildings, which are handsome, and contain every requisite accommodation, were erected at an expense of £28,000.

To the extent and variety of the manufactures carried on in this town and its neighbourhood, particularly the manufacture of woollen cloth, which has within the last few years been brought to a very high state of perfection, may, in a great degree, be attributed the prosperity of the West riding of the county. Formerly only the coarser kinds of cloth were made here, but, since the introduction of machinery, and more especially under the improvements made in the manufacture by Mr. Hirst, a native of this town, the Yorkshire cloths, which were always regarded as inferior, have been made to equal, if not to surpass, those of the western counties of England, in fineness of texture, and brilliance and permanence of colour; and superfine black and blue cloths, made from wool carefully selected, have been sold for £5 per yard. Many very extensive factories have been established, in some of which the whole process, from the first breaking of the wool to the completion of the cloth for the consumer, is performed by machinery worked by steam. The principal branches of manufacture at present are, superfine broad and coarse narrow cloth, ladies' pelisse cloth and shawls, stuffs of various kinds, Scotch camblets, blankets, and carpets. Several large factories have been established in the town and neighbourhood, for the spinning of flax; and a great quantity of worsted goods, the manufacture of which has been progressively increasing, is sent hence to every part of the kingdom. The cotton manufacture has extended in some degree from Lancashire to this town, and at present affords employment to a small proportion of the labouring class. In the immediate vicinity are large manufactories for crown and flint glass and glass bottles; an extensive pottery, the reputation of which procures for its wares a large demand in every part of the united kingdom; several large iron foundries, and an extensive manufactory for steam-engines, inferior to few in the country. In the parish is dug clay for making fire-proof bricks, also another kind for tobacco-pipes. The neighbourhood abounds with mines of coal: on the banks of the Aire are numerous mills for grinding corn, rape-seed, dye-wood, and for fulling cloth, and several turning, carding, and spinning establishments. In addition to the staple trade and manufactures, Leeds carries on an extensive trade in tobacco, for the preparation of which from the leaf, several mills have been erected. The river Aire, which passes through the southern part of the town, affords a navigable communication with the Humber; and the Leeds and Liverpool canal, constructed in 1776, which joins the Aire, opens a direct line of navigation extending to Hull, Liverpool, and the principal towns in the kingdom. The cloth-halls are spacious buildings for the sale of cloth in an unfinished state: they occupy quadrangular areas divided into rows, on each side of which are stands for the manufacturers; the hall for dyed cloths contains one thousand eight hundred of these stands, and that for white cloths about the same number: the former was erected in 1758, and the latter in 1775. The market is announced by the ringing of a bell, and in the course of an hour, for which it continues open, purchases to the amount of many thousand pounds are effected, with the utmost regularity and in perfect silence, by the merchants who attend them, and under whose directions, or by persons accustomed to that business, the cloths are dressed and finished for the use of the consumer. The number of pieces of cloth manufactured in the West riding, from the year 1772 to 1781 inclusive, was two millions nine thousand nine hundred and seventy-two and a half, and from 1812 to 1821, the number was four millions five hundred and twenty-one thousand seven hundred and forty-two. The market-days are Tuesday and Saturday; the former for corn and general merchandise, and the latter for woollen goods and provisions. The corn market is held in the corn exchange, in Briggate-street, a handsome stone building, having in the front a statue of Queen Anne sculptured in white marble: the market for cattle and hay is in Vicar-lane: the market for butchers' meat is held in various parts of the town, of which the most central are Fleet-street, Cheapside, the South market, and Butchers'-row; the wholesale market for carcasses is held in Leadenhall, a spacious area considerably below the ground, by which means it is preserved from the heat of summer and the frosts of winter; to this market is attached a spacious slaughter-house, also underground: the fish market is held at the Old Cross, in Fish-street; and the fruit, vegetable, poultry, and pig markets, are held in various parts of the town, and, like all the others, are abundantly supplied. The fairs are on July 10th and 11th for horses, and November 8th and 9th for cattle; and a fair for the sale of leather is held quarterly in the South market-place.

The government of the town, by charter of incorporation granted in the reign of Charles I., and extended and renewed by Charles II., is vested in a mayor, recorder, twelve aldermen, and twenty-four common council-men, assisted by a town clerk and subordinate officers. The mayor is appointed from among the aldermen, who in general succeed to that office in rotation. The common council-men fill up vacancies in their own body, and appoint a chief constable, deputy constable, and constables for the ten districts into which the town is divided. The mayor and aldermen are justices of the peace within the borough, and among the privileges enjoyed by the freemen is exemption from serving on juries out of the parish: any inhabitant is eligible to offices under the corporation, and any person becoming an inhabitant is free to exercise his trade without restriction. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for the borough, in January, April, July, and October, at which the mayor and recorder preside, for all offences not capital: the mayor sits daily for the examination of delinquents; and some of the aldermen attend every Tuesday and Friday at the court-house for the determination of police affairs. The town is within the jurisdiction of a court of record for the recovery of debts to any amount; and within that of a court baron for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, for the Honour of Pontefract; the latter of these courts is occasionally held at Leeds. The Michaelmas quarter sessions for the West riding are held here, by adjournment from Knaresborough, and also the petty sessions for the wapentake of Skyrack. A relic of feudal servitude subsists in the custom which obliges all the inhabitants of Leeds, except those whose houses stand within the manor of Whitkirk (formerly belonging to the Knights Templars), to have their corn ground at the King's mills, which are held under a lease from the crown. The court-house, erected in 1813, is an elegant edifice of stone, with a handsome portico of the Corinthian order in the centre, on each side of which the façade is decorated with panels enriched with emblematical sculpture: the principal entrance, from Park-row, leads into a spacious vestibule, on one side of which is the Rotation office, and on the other the rooms appropriated to the magistrates of the West riding, communicating with the sessions-hall, which is commodiously arranged; above the vestibule are the grand jury room, and other requisite apartments. Behind the court-house is the prison for the town, containing thirteen cells, intended only for the confinement of prisoners prior to their trial, when, if found guilty, they are sent either to the house of correction at Wakefield, or to York castle. Leeds never enjoyed the privilege of parliamentary representation, except during the Protectorate of Cromwell, when one member was returned for this borough to the parliament of 1654. On the disfranchisement of Grampound, in 1821, a bill passed the House of Commons, for the transfer of the elective franchise to Leeds; but it was re-modelled in its progress through the upper house, and the town yet remains unrepresented.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £38. 0. 2½.

and in the patronage of twenty-five trustees. The parish church, dedicated to St. Peter, is an ancient and venerable cruciform structure, with a square embattled tower rising from the centre, and decorated with pinnacles, and, though plain, retains considerable portions of its ancient Norman character; the roof is painted in fresco, and the interior contains several interesting monuments; marriages are solemnized at this church exclusively. Thoresby, author of the "Ducatus Leodiensis," who was a native of Leeds, is interred in it, but there is no monument to his memory. The church of St. James, formerly a chapel belonging to those in the late Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, is a neat octangular edifice of stone: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar, and the Mayor and Corporation. St. John's church was founded in 1634, and endowed with £80 per annum, and £10 per annum for repairs, by John Harrison, Esq., a native of the town, whose remains are therein deposited, under a monument of black marble: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar, and the Mayor and Corporation. The church dedicated to St. Paul is a neat stone building; the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar. Trinity church, erected in 1721, is a handsome structure in the Roman Doric style of architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the joint patronage of the Vicar, the Recorder and the Minister of St. John's. The church on Quarry hill, dedicated to St. Mary, and containing one thousand two hundred and seven sittings, of which eight hundred and one are free, was erected, in 1824, by a grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £10,951. 15. 4.: it is a handsome edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower. Christchurch, in Meadow-lane, containing one thousand two hundred and forty-nine sittings, of which eight hundred are free, was erected, also in 1824, by a grant of £10,456. 13. from the same funds, and differs from St. Mary's only in having angular pinnacles and no tower. The church at Woodhouse, dedicated to St. Mark, was erected, in 1825, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £9003, and contains one thousand two hundred sittings, of which eight hundred are free; the architecture is similar to that of St. Mary's: the livings are all perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the Vicar. There are upwards of twenty places of worship for 'Arians, Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyan, Primitive, and other Methodists, Female Revivalists, Swedenborgians, and Unitarians, also a Roman Catholic chapel. The free grammar school was originally founded, in 1552, by William Sheafeld, priest, who endowed it with several portions of land, on condition that the inhabitants should erect a school-house, which was subsequently built at the cost of John Harrison, Esq., in 1624, and enlarged, in 1692, by Godfrey Lawson, mayor, and in 1780 a house for the master was erected by the trustees. The original endowment, augmented by subsequent benefactions, produces an income of more than £1600 per annum: the establishment consists of a head-master, second master, and an assistant, whose salaries are respectively £500, £250, and £60: the school is free to all boys of the parish, for instruction in the classics and mathematics: it is entitled to send a candidate for one of Lady Elizabeth Hastings' exhibitions at Queen's College Oxford; and it is also, in turn with the schools of Heversham and Halifax, entitled to one of three scholarships of £20 per ann. each, and tenable till the holders take the degree of M.A., founded by the Rev. Thomas Milner, in Magdalene College; and, in failure of a candidate from the school at Normanton, to one of two scholarships founded, by Mr. Frieston, at Emanuel College, Cambridge. A charity school, in which eighty girls are clothed and instructed, is supported by a portion of the produce of lands appropriated to charitable uses, amounting annually to nearly £400; and a very neat and commodious building was erected for its use, in 1815, at the expense of £1000. A National school, also a neat building, erected in 1812, in which three hundred and twenty boys, and one hundred and eighty girls, are taught; a Lancasterian school, in which one thousand children are instructed; and a similar school for girls, are all supported by subscription: there are also, in connexion with the established church and the various dissenting congregations, not less than forty Sunday schools in various parts of the town. Harrison's hospital, comprising originally thirty almshouses, to which twelve more have been added, were founded, in 1653, by John Harrison, Esq., who endowed them with mills and tenements producing about £80 per annum: the endowment has been augmented by Mrs. Catherine Parker, Mr. Joseph Midgley, Arthur Ikin, Esq., and others, and the buildings, occupying a large quadrangular area, afford an asylum to sixty-four aged women, who receive an allowance of £10 per annum each, paid quarterly. Almshouses for ten aged widows were founded by Mrs. Mary Potter, in 1729, and endowed by her with £2000, to which was added £400 by Mrs. Barbara Chantrill; from the produce of which sums, together with other benefactions, each of the inmates receives an allowance of £12. 12. per annum. Eight houses were left by Josias Jenkinson, Esq., in 1643, for the reception of sixteen aged persons, but no funds having been appropriated to keep them in repair, they became dilapidated, and have been since entirely rebuilt: the rents of a farm bequeathed by the same Mr. Jenkinson, for distribution among the poor, have been appropriated as an endowment to these houses, the tenants of which receive an annual allowance of £5. Under the superintendence of the governors of the workhouse are schools of industry, in which the children of the poor are taught to prepare the different wools for the loom, by an intimate intermixture of the various colours, in order to produce uniformity of pattern in the mixed cloths. The general infirmary, founded in 1771, is a neat and commodious edifice, in an open and healthy situation: it is liberally supported by subscription, and is well regulated under the superintendence of a president and a committee, and attended by three physicians, three surgeons, an apothecary, and an assistant. The house of recovery, in Vicar-lane, was built by subscription in 1802, and has been found very efficacious in arresting the progress of contagion. A dispensary for curing diseases of the eye was established in 1821, and is principally supported by members of the medical profession, by whom it is gratuitously attended. The general dispensary, and a lying-in hospital, were both established in 1824. The Strangers' Friend Society, for the visitation and relief of the distressed of all denominations; and the Guardian Society, for reclaiming females who have deviated from the path of virtue, are supported by subscription; and there are various other charitable institutions and bequests for the wants of the inhabitants of this large and populous manufacturing district. Mrs. Rachael Dixon bequeathed certain houses and premises in trust to the vicar of Leeds and the minister of St. John's, the rents of which are to be equally distributed among three widows of clergymen of the established church. In the neighbourhood are several chalybeate and other mineral springs: that of Holbeck is like the sulphureous water of Harrogate, but more slightly impregnated; and it is so much esteemed, that it is brought daily to Leeds for sale. On the declivity of Quarry hill are vestiges of a Roman camp, the trenches of which are covered with buildings; and Roman coins and other relics of antiquity have been discovered in the neighbourhood. In Briggate-street are some remains of the chantry of St. Mary Magdalene, founded, in 1470, by the Rev. William Evers, vicar of the parish; and on a sequestered spot on the banks of the Aire, about three miles from the town, are the picturesque ruins of Kirkstall priory, founded, in 1152, for monks of the Cistercian order, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £512. 13. 4.: the remains, exhibiting a mixture of the Norman and early English styles of architecture, occupy a quadrangular area, four hundred and fifty feet in length, and three hundred and forty in breadth, and form one of the most interesting specimens of monastic grandeur in the kingdom. Dr. Berkenhout, author of several works on Chemistry, Natural History, and other subjects; Dr. James Scot, author of three of the Seatonian prize-poems, and a writer in the Public Advertiser, under the signature Anti-Sejanus; and Benjamin Wilson, F.R.S., a landscape painter of respectable talent, were natives of this town. Leeds gives the title of duke to the family of Osborne.

LEEK, a parish comprising the market town of Leek, the chapelries of Endon, Onecote, and Rushton-Spencer, and the townships of Bradnop, Longdon, Heaton, Leek-Frith, Rushton-James, Stanley, and Tittisworth in the northern, and the township of Rudyard with Caudery in the southern, division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 23 miles (N.E.) from Stafford, and 154 (N.W. by N.) from London, and containing 4292 inhabitants. This place is of great antiquity, and has been styled "The Capital of the Moorlands;" subsequently to the Conquest the manor became the property of the Earls of Chester, one of whom obtained for the town the grant of a market from King John, and was eventually given to the monks of the abbey Dieu la Croix, in this parish. In 1745, the troops of the Pretender marched through Leek on the 3d of December, in their advance to Derby, and returned on the 7th of the same month. The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence on the main road from London to Manchester; the streets are well paved, and lighted with gas under an act of parliament obtained in 1824; and the inhabitants are supplied with water by means of pipes, from a spring about one mile distant. The curious phenomenon of a double sunset occurs here at a certain time of the year, owing to the relative position of a rocky mountain westward from the town. The principal source of business is in the manufacture of ribands and various articles in silk: a considerable quantity of cheese is made in the neighbourhood; and some valuable mines of coal, lead, and copper, in the adjacent hills, some of which were worked before the year 1680, afford employment to several individuals. The Caldon branch of the Trent and Mersey canal passes within half a mile of the town, and near it runs the river Churnet. The market is on Wednesday; and fairs, chiefly for cattle, are held on the Wednesday in Easter week, May 18th, on Whit-Monday, July 3rd and 28th, the Wednesday after the 10th of October, and November 13th. Courts leet and baron are held by the lord of the manor, at which a constable is appointed; and the petty sessions for the northern division of the hundred are held here.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £7. 9. 1½, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Macclesfield. The church, dedicated to St. Edward the Confessor, is a very ancient structure in the early style of English architecture; it has a tower with eight pinnacles, and stands on an eminence which commands a very extensive prospect. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists: that belonging to the Methodists is very large, and in connexion with it is a Sunday school, in which upwards of one thousand one hundred children are instructed. A school-house was erected, at the expense of the Earl of Macclesfield, in the beginning of the last century, for a free grammar school, but it has no endowment, except from a benefaction by the Rev. George Roades, who, in 1712, bequeathed property which was invested in the three per cents., and produces £9. 13. 10. per annum, which sum is paid to the master for teaching English to six poor boys of this parish. Eight almshouses for single women not under sixty years of age were founded and endowed by Elizabeth Ash, in 1676, with a rent-charge of £40 per annum. Additional benefactions to this charity make the total income £78. 3. 6. per annum. Very munificent donations have been made from time to time in aid of the poor of this parish, and the sum of £290 arising from them is annually distributed in food, clothing, and other necessities, including small sums of money. The remains of Dieu la Croix abbey (now corrupted to Dieulacres), which was founded by Ranulph de Blundeville, Earl of Chester, in 1214, in honour of St. Mary and St. Benedict, for Cistercian monks, and valued, at the dissolution, at £243. 3. 6. per annum, are here. Thomas Parker, first Earl of Macclesfield, who became Lord High Chancellor, and President to the Royal Society, was born, in 1666, at Leek, where his father practised as an attorney.

LEEK-FRITH, a township in that part of the parish of LEEK which is in the northern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Leek, containing 806 inhabitants.

LEEK-WOOTTON, a parish in the Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, 2¼ miles (S.) from Kenilworth, containing 436 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. 1. Chandos

Leigh, Esq. was patron in 1824. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Daniel Winter, in 1776, bequeathed £10 per annum towards the support of a school, for which sum, together with others raised by contributions, and the free use of a house for his residence, the master teaches all poor children of the parish who apply.

LEEMING, a chapelry in the parish of BURNESTON, wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, 2½ miles (E. N. E.) from Bedale, containing, with Exelby and Newton, 562 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Burneston. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. The petty sessions for the division are held at the Oak Tree Inn, Leeming Lane. The ancient Herman-street, which extends northward to Inverness, passes through this chapelry.

LEES, a hamlet in the parish of DALBURY, hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, 6¼ miles (W. by N.) from Derby. The population is returned with the parish.

LEES, a chapelry in the parish of ASHTON under LINE, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 1½ mile (E.) from Oldham. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, and in the patronage of the Rector of Ashton under Line. The turnpike-road from Oldham to Huddersfield passes through the village, near which is a chalybeate spring, called Lees Spa.

LEESE, a township in that part of the parish of SANDBACH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 2½ miles (N. E.) from Middlewich, containing 135 inhabitants.

LEESTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of PICKWELL, hundred of GARTREE, though locally in that of Guthlaxton, county of LEICESTER, 4¼ miles (S. E. by S.) from Melton-Mowbray. The population is returned with the parish.

LEFTWICH, a township in the parish of DAVENHAM, hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 1 mile (S.) from Northwich, containing 1192 inhabitants. A charity school here is supported by annual donations, averaging about £13.

LEGBOURN, a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, though locally in that of Louth-Eske, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Louth, containing 412 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant. The Rev. R. Powley was patron in 1800. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A priory of Cistercian nuns, in honour of the Virgin Mary, was founded here before the reign of John, by Robert Fitz-Gilbert: at the dissolution, its revenue, was £57. 13. 5.

LEGSBY, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Market-Raisen, containing 231 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 4. 2. Sir H. Nelthorpe, Bart. was patron in 1819. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas the Apostle.

Seal and Arms.

LEICESTER, a borough, market, and county town, having separate jurisdiction, in the county of LEICESTER, 97 miles (N.N.W.) from London, containing, with the extra-parochial liberties of Black Friars and White Friars; and with the chapelry of Knightlow, in the hundred of GUTHLAXTON, and Bishop's Fee, in the hundred of GARTREE (both in the parish of St. Margaret); and with the extra-parochial district called New Works, and a portion of the parish of St. Mary, called the South Fields, both in the hundred of GUTHLAXTON, 30,508 inhabitants, according to the census of 1821; between which period and the year 1800, the population had nearly doubled, and, since 1821, it has increased to nearly 40,000. Leicester, which had flourished from remote antiquity as the principal town of the Coritani, was, upon the conquest of Britain by the Romans, made one of their stipendiary cities, and is clearly identified with the Ratae of Antoninus, and the Ratisorion of Richard of Cirencester. That it was a Roman station of considerable importance is evident from the remains of a Roman temple, supposed to have been dedicated to Janus, and from numerous tessellated pavements and other relics of Roman antiquity which have been discovered in the vicinity. By the Saxons it was, from its situation on the river Lear, now the Soar, called Legerceastre, of which its present name is simply a contraction. Under the Heptarchy, this place belonged to the kingdom of Mercia; and it was for a short time the see of a bishop, whose successors removed to Dorchester, and finally to Lincoln. In 874, the Danes, having overrun this part of the kingdom, seized upon Leicester, which they constituted one of the five great cities of their empire in Britain, and retained, till Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred, and widow of Ethelred, Earl of Mercia, who, after her husband's death, continued to govern the province, rescued it from their possession, after a successful encounter, in which the Danes were defeated with considerable slaughter. At the time of the Norman Conquest, the castle, which had been nearly destroyed in the Danish wars, was rebuilt, and entrusted to Hugo de Grentemaisnel, on whom William bestowed the greater part of the town; but in the disputed succession to the throne, after the death of William, Hugo, embracing the cause of Robert, Duke of Normandy, in opposition to William Rufus, the castle was demolished by the partisans of the latter, and remained for some time in ruins. In the reign of Henry I., Robert de Mellent being created Earl of Leicester, repaired, enlarged, and fortified the castle, which he made his baronial residence; but his son, Robert le Bossu, having taken part in the rebellion of the young Prince Henry against his father, Henry II., Leicester was besieged by the king's forces under Richard de Lucy, and, after an obstinate battle, in which the earl was taken prisoner, fell into the hands of the king. The king's forces having entered the town, set fire to it in several places, razed the walls, and destroyed the fortifications; and having ultimately reduced the castle, which held out for a considerable time, demolished it entirely. The earl afterwards recovering his liberty, joined the Crusaders, and on his return from Palestine founded, in expiation of his rebellious conduct, the monastery of St. Mary de Pratis, near the town, in which, having assumed the habit of a monk, he spent the remainder of his life. A royal mint, which was established at Leicester in the reign of Athelstan, and situated near the North bridge, was maintained here till the commencement of this reign. In the reign of John, Robert Fitz-Parnel, Earl of Leicester, obtained from that monarch a charter of incorporation and many privileges, which were afterwards extended and confirmed by Henry III., at the solicitation of Simon de Montfort, then Earl of Leicester, who, rebelling against his sovereign, and engaging in the baronial wars of that reign, was slain at the battle of Evesham. After the death of Montfort, Henry III. conferred the earldom of Leicester on his second son, Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, whose grandson Henry made this place his principal residence, and under him and his two immediate successors, the castle was restored to its former strength and magnificence. After the accession of the house of Lancaster to the throne, Leicester was frequently visited by the sovereigns of that family. A parliament was held here by Henry V., in 1414, and another by the Dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, during the minority of Henry VI., in 1425. In the conflict between the houses of York and Lancaster, the castle is supposed to have suffered severely, and in the reign of Richard III. it had become so dilapidated, that when that monarch was at Leicester, a few evenings prior to the battle of Bosworth Field, he preferred to sleep at the Blue Boar inn, in the town: the bedstead upon which he slept is now in the possession of T. Babington, Esq., of Rothley Temple. During the parliamentary war the town suffered materially; it was taken by storm by the royal army, in May 1645, but was retaken by the parliamentary forces under Fairfax, in June following, soon after which, orders were issued by the parliament to pull down what remained of the castle, and to dispose of the materials. The remains are intermixed with the various buildings that have been erected on the site; the most conspicuous portion of them is a beautiful arched gateway tower, called the magazine, from its having been purchased by the county as a dépôt for the ammunition of the trained bands, in 1682.

The town is pleasantly situated nearly in the centre of the county, and on the banks of the river Soar, over which are four bridges, named respectively, North, West, Branston, and Bow bridge; the first, a handsome structure erected in 1792, the others, ancient buildings which have been recently repaired: the principal street, extending from south to north, is upwards of a mile in length, and there are many other spacious streets; the houses, which, within the last half century, have been much improved, are chiefly built of brick, and roofed with slate; the town is paved and watched by subscription, lighted with gas by a company incorporated in 1821, and supplied with water from a public conduit in the market-place, and from wells in various parts of the town. A promenade, called the New Walk, which extends nearly three-quarters of a mile in length, in a south-eastern direction from the town, was formed about the year 1785; the ground was given by the corporation, and laid out by subscription: it affords, in many parts, some pleasing views of the town, and of the hills of Charnwood Forest, which abound in beautiful scenery. The town library, established by the corporation in 1632, consists chiefly of Theological works. The theatre, a neat building, is opened in September; and assemblies are held, during the winter, in a suite of rooms in a building originally erected for an hotel, and purchased by the county for the accommodation also of the judges of the assize, and for the meetings of the county magistrates: the ball-room, seventy-five feet long, and thirty-three feet wide, is elegantly painted by Reinagle, and lighted on assembly nights by eight splendid lustres, and branches held by statues, after designs by Bacon. A musical festival first took place here in 1827, which, from the patronage it received, will be triennially repeated. Races are held in September, on the south-east side of the town, where a grand stand has been erected, and every means adopted for the improvement of the course; and on the north-east side of the town is an extensive enclosed cricket-ground. An agricultural society, which has been established for many years, holds its meetings here annually in October. The staple manufacture of the town, that of worsted and cotton hosiery, has been established for more than two centuries: the number of frames in the town and neighbouring villages is about seven thousand, and the number of persons employed in the frame-work knitting, worsted spinning, wool combing and dyeing, is about twelve thousand. In addition to the manufacture of hose, of which a great quantity is exported, there are manufacturers of lace, cotton thread, ropes and twine, stocking-frames, needles, and pipes, and several woolstaplers. Situated on the great northern road, Leicester has every facility of land carriage to London, Manchester, Nottingham, Derby, and other towns; and, in 1791, an act of parliament was obtained for opening a communication with the Loughborough canal, and through that with the various lines of navigation connected with the Trent, the effect of which has been to introduce the coal of Derbyshire by the cheaper conveyance of water carriage. The act also contained provisions for making an additional line of navigation from Loughborough to the Leicestershire collieries in Charnwood Forest, and although the expense of cutting the canal was incurred, it has never been brought into use. In the parliamentary session of 1830, an act was obtained for constructing a rail-road, in a direct line, from Leicester to Swannington, a district abounding with coal. The market, which is on Saturday, is particularly celebrated for the quality of the butchers' meat: the fairs, principally for horses, cattle, sheep, and cheese, are on January 4th, March 2nd, the Saturday before Easter, May 12th, which lasts for three days, June 1st, July 5th, August 1st, September 13th, October 10th (for three days), November 2nd, and December 8th.

The government, by charter of King John, confirmed and extended by succeeding sovereigns, and renewed, with all former privileges and immunities, in the 41st of Elizabeth, is vested in a mayor, recorder, high steward, bailiff, twenty-four aldermen, and forty-eight common council-men, assisted by a town clerk and subordinate officers. The mayor and bailiff are annually elected in September, by the whole corporation, from among the aldermen; the mayor, recorder and the four aldermen who have last past the chair, are justices of the peace for the borough and liberties, over the latter of which only the county magistrates have a concurrent jurisdiction. The freedom is inherited by all the sons of a freeman, and acquired by servitude, by purchase, or by gift: among the privileges are, exemption from toll in all the fairs of England, and the liberty of depasturing cattle in the Abbey meadows and other grounds. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for offences not capital; and a court of record, for the recovery of debts to any amount, is held by prescription, confirmed by charters of Elizabeth and James I., before the mayor, recorder, and aldermen, or any three of them, including the mayor; and there is also an officer called the steward, who issues all writs, manages the business, and presides in the absence of the recorder; he is appointed pursuant to the charter, as also is a bailiff, whose duties resemble those of a county sheriff. The elective franchise was first exercised in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time the borough has returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the freemen generally not receiving alms, whether resident or not, and in the resident householders paying scot and lot, together about six thousand in number: the mayor and bailiff are the returning officers. This being the county town, the election of knights of the shire, and the assizes and quarter sessions for the county, are held in it. The guildhall is a neat and commodious building, containing, among other portraits with which the interior is decorated, one of Sir Thomas White, lord mayor of London, and founder of St. John's College, Oxford. The hall of the ancient castle has been fitted up for holding the assizes and sessions for the county, and, from the ample space which it affords, the courts are so arranged as not to interfere with each other. The borough gaol contains two wards for male, and one for female, felons, and one ward for debtors; and, on the completion of the new county gaol, it will be converted into a house of correction. The old common gaol for the county, now the town gaol, contains four divisions, one work-room, four day-rooms, and four airing-yards, for the classification of prisoners. A new gaol and house of correction for the county has been built at the south end of the town, comprising eight distinct wards, ranged round the governor's house in the centre (in the upper part of which is the chapel, communicating by bridges with the upper stories of the several wards), with work-rooms, day-rooms, and airing-yards, an infirmary, and other offices, the whole enclosed within a stone wall, forming on the entrance side a handsome castellated façade in the ancient style of English architecture.

The borough comprises the parishes of All Saints, St. Leonard, St. Martin, and St. Nicholas, and parts of the parishes of St. Margaret and St. Mary, all, excepting St. Margaret's, which is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of that parish in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln. The living of All Saints' is a discharged vicarage, with those of St. Clement, St. Michael, and St. Peter united, the churches of which are demolished, rated together in the king's books at £6.13.5., (St. Clement's and St. Michael's being not in charge,) endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is an ancient structure in the early style of English architecture, with a tower on the north side of the north aisle; the chancel is modern, but in various parts of the church are some fine old portions intermixed with later insertions; the interior contains an early English font of curious device, and some fine carving in wood. The living of St. Leonard's is a vicarage, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and united with that of St. Margaret, being rated together in the king's books at £23. 8. 6½., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of St. Margaret's in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln: the church of St. Leonard was demolished during the parliamentary war, in 1645; that of St. Margaret, erected about 1444, is a beautiful structure, combining portions in the early, decorated, and later styles of English architecture, with a tower of the later style, of which character are also the chancel and the clerestory of the nave: the interior contains some wooden stalls and seats richly carved; and among the monuments is an alabaster tomb of Bishop Penny, previously abbot of the neighbouring monastery of St. Mary de Pratis: in the church-yard is the tomb of Andrew, Lord Rollo, decorated with military trophies. The living of St. Martin's is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is a venerable cruciform structure, partly in the early, and partly in the later, style of English architecture, with a tower rising from the centre, and supported on four semicircular arches, opening into the nave, chancel, and transepts, the lower part of which is in the Norman style of architecture, surmounted by a spire of later date: the interior was despoiled of its ornaments by the parliamentary troops, who converted it into barracks during their occupation of the town, but it has been restored with due regard to its ancient character; the chancel, which is in the later style, is decorated with three stone stalls under the south-east window, and it has a noble organ, built by Snetzler, and a fine painting of the Ascension, by Francesco Vanni, presented by Sir William Skeffington, Bart. The archdeacon of Leicester holds his court in the south aisle, and the Bishop of Lincoln confirms in the chancel, of this church, at which the judges of assize attend divine service. The living of St. Mary's is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is an ancient structure, combining the Norman, and the early style of English, architecture, with later insertions: the tower, which is surmounted by a lofty spire, is situated at the west end of the south aisle, and detached from the nave: the spire was erected in 1783, at the expense of £300, in the place of a former spire, destroyed by lightning. On the south side of the chancel are three fine Norman stalls, with double shafts and enriched mouldings; and on the south side of the south aisle are three early English stalls, highly ornamented: the font is of curious and beautiful design, and the oak roofs, which are exquisitely carved, are in some parts in tolerable preservation. The living of St. Nicholas' is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £3. 11. 3., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is in the early style of Norman architecture, with a tower between the nave and the chancel, and is said to have been built with the materials of a Roman temple, of which a considerable fragment still remains in a wall adjoining the church-yard. The society for the enlargement of churches and chapels have granted £1500 in aid of a subscription among the inhabitants for rebuilding this church. A very handsome district church, dedicated to St. George, and containing one thousand eight hundred sittings, of which nine hundred and ninety-nine are free, was erected in the parish of St. Margaret, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, in 1826, at an expense of £14,964. 4. 8.; it is a handsome edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of St. Margaret's. There are seven places of worship for Baptists, one for the Society of Friends, one for Huntingtonians, three for Independents, one for Wesleyan Methodists, two for Primitive Methodists, one for Unitarians, and a Roman Catholic chapel: the last is a handsome edifice in the ancient style of English architecture, and the Wesleyan meeting-house is very spacious.

The free grammar school is supposed to have been originally founded by Thomas Wigston, a prebendary of the collegiate church of St. Mary de Pratis; it was re-founded, and a new school-house erected, by the corporation in 1575, and is partly supported from the funds of Wigston hospital, and partly by the corporation, who appoint the master; it is open to all the sons of burgesses, for classical and commercial instruction: there are two exhibitions of £6 per annum to Lincoln College, Oxford, founded by Mr. Thomas Hayne, at the disposal of the corporation, for boys of this school, or, in failure of such, for boys of Melton-Mowbray school; an annuity of £4 per annum to be paid to two poor boys so long as they should continue in the school; and an exhibition of £6 per annum to Oxford or Cambridge, tenable for five years, founded by Henry, Earl of Huntingdon: these exhibitions, not having been claimed for many years, are accumulating, and will be added by the corporation to funds with which they intend to found exhibitions of sufficient value to excite competition. The Green-coat school was founded, in 1782, by Gabriel Newton, alderman, for the clothing and education of thirty-five boys: the school was rebuilt in 1808, and the funds having increased, the number of scholars has also been increased to eighty, each of whom, after remaining three years in the school, receives an apprentice-fee of £5. St. Mary's charity school, for clothing and instructing eighty boys and forty girls, was established in 1785, and a school-house built by subscription, at an expense of £600. St. Martin's school was built, in 1791, at an expense of £950, and is supported by subscription; there are one hundred and fifty boys and eighty-four girls instructed and partly clothed in this institution. A National school-room was erected, in 1814, by subscription, aided by a grant of £300 from the National Society, on a site bestowed by the Crown, as connected with the duchy of Lancaster; in this school from four hundred to five hundred children are taught on the National plan; and in St. Margaret's school, erected in 1807, seventy-three boys and forty-one girls are instructed on the same plan, and annually clothed. The Old Trinity hospital was founded, in 1330, by Henry, Earl of Leicester and Lancaster, who endowed it originally for fifty infirm and aged men, and five women to attend on them : in 1354 the foundation was greatly augmented by his son, Henry, Duke of Lancaster, who converted the original establishment into a college, called the New Work, or Cotlegium Novi Operis, and it was further extended by John of Gaunt, son-in-law of Duke Henry. The whole establishment consisted of a dean, twelve secular canons, twelve vicars, three clerks, six choristers, fifty poor men, fifty poor women, ten nurses, and other attendants ; at the dissolution, its revenue was £800, and the corporation, having purchased the site, refounded on it the hospital for poor widows : there are at present in this establishment about ninety men and women, who receive each three shillings and eightpence per week, and are nominated by the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, or, on his failing to appoint within three months, the vacancies are filled up by the corporation : some of the men belonging to this hospital, clothed in ancient armour, attend in the procession at the proclamation of the fairs. An hospital for a master, confrater, twelve aged men, and twelve aged women, all unmarried, was founded, and dedicated to St. Ursula, in the latter part of the fifteenth century, by William Wigston, merchant-stapler, and mayor of Leicester : the master, who has a salary of £160 per annum, and the confrater, who has £70 per annum, are appointed by the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and appoint the hospitallers, who receive four shillings and tenpence per week, with an allowance of coal and candles. The hospital of St. John the Baptist, founded, in 1235, for a master, brethren, and sisters, was given by Queen Elizabeth to the corporation, who converted it into a hall for wool ; but, in the reign of James I., they endowed it with £17 per annum, and placed in it six poor widows, among whom that sum is distributed. An hospital for four aged widows, who receive four shillings per week, was founded, in 1703, by Mr. Bent, alderman of this borough ; and, in 1710, an hospital was founded by Mr. Matthew Simson, who endowed it for six aged widows, each of whom receives £3 per annum, and five hundred weight of coal : these premises were rebuilt by the trustees in 1807. The late John Johnson, Esq. erected, in 1792, five neat dwelling-houses, which he called the Consanguinitarium, and intended as a residence for five of his needy relatives, assigning for the support of the establishment an income of more than £60 per annum. The female asylum, in the New Works, was established, in 1800, by the exertions of the late Rev. Thomas Robinson, for the maintenance, clothing, and instructing in household business, of sixteen poor orphan girls, who are admitted at the age of thirteen, and remain for three years in the institution, when they are placed out as servants in respectable families. The infirmary, at the southern extremity of the town, was erected in 1771, and is supported by subscription : the building, which is plain, consists of a centre and two wings, and contains accommodation for eighty-four patients, who are admitted without distinction from every part of the country : attached to it is a house of recovery from fever, or other contagious diseases, added in 1818. Adjoining the infirmary is the lunatic asylum, towards the erection and support of which, Mrs. Topp bequeathed £1000, and Mrs. Ann Wigley £200. Sir Thomas White also bequeathed £10,000 in trust to the corporation, to be lent for nine years, without interest, in sums of £50, which have been subsequently enlarged, to the freemen of Leicester, and other towns in the county ; and there are charitable bequests, amounting to more than £800 per annum, at the disposal of the corporation, for distribution among the poor ; included in which is the produce of a grant, by Charles I., of forty acres of land in the forest of Leicester.

Among the monastic establishments anciently existing here, was a collegiate church, founded long before the Conquest, within the precincts of the castle, which was, with the city and the castle, destroyed in the wars during the reign of the Conqueror, and refounded, in 1107, by Robert de Mellent, Earl of Leicester : the greater portion of its revenue was transferred to the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis, but it continued, under the designation of St. Mary the Less, till the dissolution, when the remaining part of it was valued at £24. 13. 11. : the remains are only part of the crypt, still discernible in the cellar of a house erected on its site. The abbey of St. Mary de Pratis was founded, in 1143, by Robert le Bossu, Earl of Leicester, for Black canons, and dedicated to St. Mary, in which that earl ended his days : it became possessed of great wealth, and was frequently visited by several of the kings of England, and other illustrious personages, among whom was Cardinal Wolsey, who, lodging there on his route to London, after his disgrace, died within its walls, and was buried in the church : at the dissolution its revenue was £1062. 0. 4 $\frac{3}{4}$. : the remains consist chiefly of the outer walls, on which is an inscription curiously worked in bricks of different colours. In the north part of the town was an hospital for lepers, founded, in the reign of Richard I., by William, son of Robert Blanchmains, Earl of Leicester. In the north-western part was a convent of Franciscan or Grey friars, founded, in 1265, by Simon de Montfort, in the church of which was interred the body of Richard III., after his death at the battle of Bosworth Field : in an island in the Soar was a house of Black friars, founded in the reign of Henry III., and dedicated to St. Clement, by one of the Earls of Leicester ; and here was also a priory for canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, dedicated to St. Catherine, which remained till the dissolution. Of the Roman relics here, the most curious are, a tessellated pavement, found in a cellar nearly opposite the town prison, in 1675 ; and a milliary, or Roman mile-stone, discovered, in 1771, on the side of the Fosse-road leading to New Works, and about two miles from the town. This stone, which has given rise to much archæological research, was removed to the town by the corporation, and is placed in Belgrave Gate, on a square pedestal, with a column above it, surmounted by a cross ; and, from the inscription on it (often published), it appears to have been erected in the reign of the Emperor Hadrian, and is said to be the oldest that has been discovered in this country. About a quarter of a mile south of the infirmary are the ancient artificial embankments, called the Rawdykes, supposed also to be of Roman origin ; and among smaller remains are an abundance of coins, of which it is supposed that a complete series might have been formed from Nero to Valentinian. Dr. Richard Farmer, the learned author of an essay on the learning and genius of Shakspeare, was a native of this town. Leicester gives the inferior title of earl to Marquis Townshend.

LEICESTER-ABBEY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 1 mile (N.) from Leicester, containing 15 inhabitants. An abbey of Black canons, in honour of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here, in 1143, by Robert Bossu, Earl of Leicester, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was estimated at £1002. 0. 4., and the site granted by Edward VI. to the Marquis of Northampton. There are slight remains of the conventual buildings, the most remarkable portion of which is an outer wall, exhibiting on its face an inscription wrought in bricks of different colours.

LEICESTER-FOREST, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, containing 71 inhabitants.

LEICESTERSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the north-west by that of Derby, on the north by that of Nottingham, on the east by those of Lincoln and Rutland, on the south-east by that of Northampton, and on the south-west by that of Warwick: it lies between $52^{\circ} 23'$ and $52^{\circ} 58'$ (N. Lat.), and between $41'$ and $1^{\circ} 38'$ (W. Lon.), and includes eight hundred and four square miles, or five hundred and fourteen thousand, five hundred and sixty statute acres. The population, according to the census of 1821, was 174,571. Leicestershire, so called from the name of its principal town, formed part of the territory of the Coritani, and, subsequently, of the Roman division of Britain named Flavia Caesariensis. Under the Anglo-Saxons it was a central portion of the powerful kingdom of Mercia. It suffered most severely from the incursions of the Danes, who, landing on the eastern coast, laid waste the whole county as far as Leicester, which town, having finally fallen into their possession, became, on their peaceable establishment in this part of the kingdom, one of their five principal cities in England. The first remarkable historical occurrence in this county, subsequently to the Norman Conquest, was the destruction, in 1173, of the town of Leicester, in consequence of its being the chief place of refuge, after their defeat at Bury, of the adherents of Prince Henry, in his rebellion against his father, Henry II. In 1217, in the reign of Henry III., the castle of Mount-Sorrel, being garrisoned by Saher de Quincy, Earl of Winchester, for Louis the Dauphin, was taken by the forces of the young king, under Ranulph de Blundeville, Earl of Chester, and razed to the ground. In the general demolition of the baronial castles which took place at a later period of the same reign, when the royal cause was triumphant, the fortresses in Leicestershire appear to have been unsparingly levelled with the ground; owing probably, in a great measure, to the very prominent part taken on the side of the barons by the celebrated Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, and consequently by his dependents and retainers. It was in this county, by his preaching at Lutterworth, of which parish he was rector, that the doctrines of Wickliffe were first openly promulgated, towards the close of the fourteenth century; and at Leicester, in April 1414, was held the parliament which granted a subsidy of three hundred thousand marks to Henry V., to enable him to assert his title to the crown of France, and which ordained death to the maintainers of the doctrines of Wickliffe, and to the readers of the Scriptures in English. In 1485, this county was the scene of the memorable conflict of Bosworth Field, the last of thirteen pitched battles between the partisans of the houses of York and Lancaster; when, upon the defeat and death of Richard III., the Earl of Richmond was crowned upon the field, as Henry VII. In 1644, at the period when this county, amongst others, took a decided part against Charles I., in the great contest between him and the parliament, on this same celebrated spot a skirmish took place, on the 1st of July, between the royalists and a detachment of Lord Grey's horse, under Captain Babington, when the former were defeated. In 1645, the parliamentary forces sustained two defeats within the limits of the county, from Sir Marmaduke Langdale; one between Harborough and Leicester, in which the former lost one hundred men killed and two hundred and fifty prisoners; the other near Melton-Mowbray, under Colonel Rossiter, when they lost a hundred and seventy killed. It was on the 31st of May, in the same year, that Leicester was stormed and taken by Charles I. and Prince Rupert.

Leicestershire is included in the diocese of Lincoln, and province of Canterbury, and forms an archdeaconry comprising the six deaneries of Akeley, Framland, Gartree, Goscote, Guthlaxton, and Sparkenhoe, and two hundred and thirteen parishes, of which one hundred and thirteen are rectories, eighty-two vicarages, and eighteen perpetual curacies. For civil purposes it is divided into the hundreds of Framland, Gartree, Goscote (East and West), Guthlaxton, and Sparkenhoe; in which are the borough and market town of Leicester, and the market towns of Ashby de la Zouch, Market-Bosworth, Market-Harborough, Hinckley, Loughborough, Lutterworth, Melton-Mowbray, and Mount-Sorrel. Two knights are returned for the shire, and two representatives for the borough of Leicester: the county members are elected at Leicester. This county is included in the midland circuit: the assizes are held at Leicester, as also are the quarter sessions, on January 11th, April 19th, July 12th, and October 18th. The county gaol is at Leicester: there are fifty-two acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county, for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £138,182. 15., the expenditure to £138,904. 7., of which £117,962. 2. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The general surface of the county consists of innumerable gently-rising hills, with few precipitous declivities, so that almost the whole is available for cultivation. The margins of the rivers and brooks are natural grass land; and the uplands partly arable and partly under grass. The modern enclosures are almost entirely devoid of trees, but the fences of the more ancient abound with timber. The highest grounds are, some of the summits of the Charnwood Forest hills, which consist of barren rocks, projecting abruptly above the surface, and composed of a kind of granite: the elevation of these peaks is not more than eight or nine hundred feet above the level of the sea, and is consequently within a temperate region of the atmosphere, yet the views from them are some of the most extensive and beautiful in the kingdom. Bardon hill, in particular, an isolated eminence, and the loftiest of the whole, is celebrated for the astonishingly expansive prospects which it commands; from this point the eye may range over the whole midland district of England; Lincoln cathedral, the Dunstable hills, the Malvern hills, the Sugar Loaf in South Wales, the Wrekin, and other mountains in Shropshire and North Wales, and the Peak of Derbyshire, being all visible from it. The elevation of the meadows on the margins of the rivers is from one to two hundred feet above the level of the sea; and the climate of the whole county is mild and temperate.

The soils are divisible into three classes. 1. Clay loam, having a considerable degree of tenacity, and being generally of a good depth, which latter circumstance, together with its friability and porous quality, is the chief cause of its fertility: this is unfit for turnips, but makes good corn and excellent grass land. 2. Sandy, or gravelly loam, which is more loose and friable than the last, generally of a good depth, adapted to the cultivation of turnips, and of every kind of grain, and excellent for grass, either natural or artificial. 3. The peaty meadow soil, which has been formed from the decomposition of vegetable matter, and the sediment brought down by the streams from the uplands: this is particularly adapted to grass, whether hay or pasture, but to grass only. The best soil is generally upon the hills, and the worst and coldest in the vallies. The soil of Charnwood Forest is for the most part a moist greyish-coloured loam, in want of drainage and improvement, and indeed the general characteristic of the upland soil of Leicestershire is a greyish or brownish friable loam, of greater or less depth, upon a substratum of clay, marl, gravel, or rock; the strongest and most tenacious is to be found in the vale of Belvoir. About two hundred and forty thousand acres of land in this county are under occasional tillage. The average produce of wheat is estimated at three quarters and a half, or twenty-eight bushels per acre; that of barley at rather less than five quarters: the last-mentioned is the favourite grain crop of the Leicestershire farmer, and a greater breadth of land is sown with it than with any other corn. Oats are grown to a great extent, on account of the number of horses bred and kept in the county; the average is about five quarters per acre. Peas are not extensively cultivated. Beans were formerly reckoned a staple growth, but their cultivation is now much less general. Rye is chiefly grown as early spring pasture for sheep; and vetches, though not extensively, as green food for horses. Common and Swedish turnips are cultivated to a great extent, being sown upon all soils that are not too strong and heavy. Cabbages are extensively cultivated; as are also carrots and potatoes: cole-seed or rape, red and white clover, trefoil, and ray-grass, are frequently sown. About half the enclosed land of the county consists of permanent grass. The natural meadows on the banks of the rivers and brooks are very numerous and extensive, and frequently of excellent quality. The pastures are for the most part grazed by a mixed stock of sheep, and of cattle. In various parts of the county are numerous good dairies, which produce large quantities of cheese: Stilton cheese, the richest and highest-priced thick cheese produced in Great Britain, is made in most of the villages about Melton-Mowbray; it obtained its name from the first maker of it, resident at Wymondham, near Melton-Mowbray, having supplied an inn at Stilton, where it first became generally known and esteemed. This county has long been distinguished for the judgment and perseverance which persons of ability and consideration resident in it have displayed in improving every species of live stock, and bringing them to a high degree of perfection: among these, the late Robert Bakewell, Esq., of Dishley farm, near Loughborough, who died in 1795, stood pre-eminent. The breed of cattle now prevailing in Leicestershire is the long-horned, which is of handsome form, and greatly esteemed for the purpose of feeding; and there has been, besides, from time immemorial, and still continues to be, an influx of cattle to be fattened for the butcher, from Ireland, Wales, Scotland, Shropshire, Staffordshire, Herefordshire, Northumberland, and Lancashire. In the neighbourhoods of Hinckley, Bosworth, Appleby, and Snarestone, are many respectable dairies of long-horned cows, as well as in that part of the county bordering on Derbyshire and the Trent, and in the vale of Belvoir; but in this latter district the cows are in part of the short-horned Holderness breed: the stock of dairy cows is kept up chiefly by rearing in the county. The Leicestershire cattle, when full grown and fat, weigh, on an average, the cows from eight to ten score per quarter, the oxen from ten to fifteen score: the prevailing colour is red, or brindled, with streaks of white along the back and belly. The present stock of sheep consists of three varieties,—the Old Leicester, the New Leicester, and the Forest sheep. The Old Leicester sheep are supposed to be an improvement of the old stock of the common fields, by intermixture with the Lincolnshire breed and by better keeping: they are large and heavy, with much wool, but large in bone, rather coarse in the pelt, and take a considerable time to fatten. The New Leicester breed was formed chiefly by Mr. Bakewell: the offals of these sheep are small, and their profitable parts large, their backs being broad and straight, their breasts full, their heads small, the flesh fine grained and well flavoured, and the wool fine of its kind; they are also capable of being fattened in a short time, on a small proportion of food, and to a great weight in proportion to their apparent size. The Forest sheep are for the most part confined to Charnwood; and they are all clothed with a coarse combing wool. Folding of sheep is hardly ever practised, except in the very few remaining common fields. The improvement of hogs has been attended to with the same care and success as that of other live stock. Leicestershire seems to have been always famous for a useful and beautiful breed of black horses, and from time immemorial more have been produced in the county than are required for its use. Many blood horses are also bred in this county; asses are used in many parts for carrying burdens, and have been lately introduced as farmers' stock; mules have long been in use here. Charnwood Forest is situated in the northern part of the county, though some miles from the border, and is wholly devoid of timber, and almost of underwood: its general face is, however, bold and romantic, having a great variety of hills, generally terminating in bare and rugged rocks, which have a very picturesque appearance to a considerable distance, and in all directions: the substance of these rocks is a soft primeval stone of the vitreous kind, and is conveyed to a considerable distance in every direction, for the purpose of mending the roads: this extensive tract, comprising from fifteen to sixteen thousand acres, has lately been enclosed. The Leicestershire and Rutlandshire Agricultural Society holds its annual meetings at Leicester: another agricultural society meets at Oakham in Rutlandshire, and at Melton-Mowbray, alternately. This county has long enjoyed pre-eminence in the annals of hunting: Melton-Mowbray is the residence of a large number of the nobility and gentry during the season; many houses being let furnished for their accommodation, and in the town there is stabling for several hundred horses.

The mineral products of Leicestershire are iron-stone, lead, coal, slate, limestone, and freestone. Iron-stone is plentifully found upon Ashby Wolds, and has been smelted and cast into pigs and utensils for various purposes, at the works by the side of the Ashby canal: the stone is found at from five to eight yards from the surface, mixed with twice its own quantity of a kind of blue marl rubbish. A rich lead-ore is found in the fissures of the limestone obtained at Staunton-Harold, and is smelted. There are coal mines at Cole-Orton, at the Lount, and Ashby Wolds: the works at the two former places are ancient; those at the latter were established, about the commencement of the present century, by the late Marquis of Hastings, at a great expense, the coal being raised from a depth of nearly two hundred yards; the stratum is nine feet in thickness and of good quality. At Swithland, to the east of Charnwood Forest, are raised large quantities of rather thick and heavy slate, which, however, is firm and durable, and is much used for roofing houses, and some of the thicker blocks for grave-stones and the purposes of building. The Bredon limestone quarries are excavated in an isolated rock of considerable extent, which has a slight covering of earth: there are lime-works very similarly situated at Cloud hill in the same neighbourhood. At Barrow upon Soar is dug the stone from which is burned the famous Barrow lime, which is in such high request, more especially as a cement in the construction of works under water, it being carried for that purpose to a very great distance: lime from these kilns was used in constructing the pier at Ramsgate, when other mortar had failed. Between the stratum of stone and the surface are three or four yards of waste, the expense of removing which increases the price of the lime: in the fissures of this limestone rock are found many curious fossil petrifications. Freestone exists in most parts of the county, as does also clay suitable for brick. The red granite from the rocks at Mount Sorrel furnishes a valuable material for Macadamizing the roads.

The principal manufactures are, woollen yarn, worsted, and stockings, which afford employment to many persons not only in Leicester, Hinckley, and other towns, but also in the principal villages throughout most parts of the county: indeed the number of persons employed in trade here is to those employed in agriculture nearly as seven to four, and of these a very large proportion is employed in the manufacture of wool into stockings, principally at Leicester, Hinckley, and Loughborough, both for the London market and exportation. At Loughborough, Hinckley, and Ashby, many hats are manufactured. The manufacture of machine lace has been established here of late years, and is carried on to a considerable extent, principally in the towns and neighbourhoods of Loughborough, Leicester, and Ashby. At Leicester and Loughborough are several malt-kilns. A large quantity of raw wool is sent into Yorkshire. Several persons are engaged in the making of malt at Leicester and Loughborough. Cheese is a considerable article of exportation, it being computed that not less than one thousand five hundred tons are annually conveyed down the Trent, for the use of the metropolis and the navy. Numerous cattle, fattened in this county, are sold for London, Birmingham, and the populous parts of Staffordshire: large quantities of sheep, bred here, are also fattened and sold to be forwarded to London or Birmingham; and others, not fully fattened, are sold to the farmers of the adjacent counties.

The most important river in Leicestershire is the Soar, which rises between Hinckley and Lutterworth, and flows northward by the towns of Leicester, Mount-Sorrel, and Loughborough, receiving the waters of numerous smaller streams, the principal of which is the Wreke: passing near Dishley, during the latter part of its course, it forms the boundary between this county and Nottinghamshire for a distance of upwards of five miles, and at last falls into the Trent, near Sawley in Derbyshire. This river, with the aid of different artificial cuts, has been made navigable from the Trent up to several miles above Leicester, a distance of upwards of twenty miles. The small river Wreke rises in the eastern part of the county, and passing by Melton-Mowbray, falls into the Soar above Mount-Sorrel. The river Trent bounds this county for the distance of between five and six miles at its north-western extremity, separating it from Derbyshire. The river Avon, for some distance near its source, forms the boundary between the southernmost point of Leicestershire and Northamptonshire; and these counties, further to the east, are separated by the Welland, which rises near Market-Harborough, by which town it passes, and quits the county near Rockingham. The little river Anker rises in the western part of the county, which it soon quits for Warwickshire, as does also the Swift, which flows by Lutterworth. The Ashby canal was first designed to communicate with the navigable channel of the Trent, below Burton, and with that view was constructed so as to be capable of floating barges of sixty tons' burden, but the money which had been subscribed, amounting to £180,000, having been expended, the line from Ashby to the Trent, on which are a tunnel and several locks, was abandoned, and railways substituted upon the high grounds. This canal is navigable from Ashby Wolds to the Coventry canal, in which it terminates, being near thirty miles in length, and cut on a level, without any lockage; it is navigated by boats of from twenty to twenty-four tons' burden, being such only as can float on the Coventry canal; on Ashby Wolds is a reservoir that supplies it with water. The line of the Leicester navigation is down the valley of the Soar, to the Trent, being sometimes along the channel of the Soar, and at others carried from it, by means of locks, into a new channel: it is upwards of twenty miles in length, and is made so as to admit of being navigated by the Trent barges. There is a collateral branch to Loughborough, which is continued over a portion of Charnwood Forest, partly by canal and partly by railway, to Cole-Orton colliery and the Cloud-hill lime-works: this continuation, however, is now out of use, by reason of the coal from Derbyshire being obtained at a cheaper rate at the Leicester and Loughborough markets than that which was brought along this line. The Melton canal is carried from the Leicester Soar navigation, along the valley of the Wreke, to Melton-Mowbray, whence it has been continued to Oakham. The Grantham canal, from the Trent below Nottingham to Grantham, passes through the north-easternmost portion of this county, and is of great advantage to the vale of Belvoir, where there is a large reservoir for its supply. The Union canal, from the navigable channel of the Soar, near Leicester, was designed to pass by way of Harborough, and join the Nene at Northampton, and also to communicate with the Grand Junction canal: its progress towards completion was however arrested by untoward circumstances. The iron railways attached to the Ashby canal extend about twelve miles from that navigation, by the town of Ashby, to the Lount colliery, Cole-Orton, Ticknall, and the Cloud-hill lime-works. On these railways, the construction of which cost £30,000, are various embankments, and deep cuttings, for the purpose of preserving the level, or an uniform ascent or descent, besides a tunnel of about a quarter of a mile long. Pursuant to an act of parliament, obtained in 1830, a rail-road is about to be commenced, extending in a direct line from Leicester to Swannington, &c.

The great road from London to Manchester enters this county, from Northamptonshire, about eighty-three miles from London, at the bridge on the Welland, and passing through Market-Harborough, Leicester, Mount-Sorrel, and Loughborough, quits the county for Derbyshire at Cavendish bridge, on the Trent. The great road from London to Nottingham, Sheffield, and Leeds, branches off from the former at Loughborough, and quits the county for Nottinghamshire at the distance of about five miles from that town. The Leeds mail road from London enters the county from Rutlandshire, about two miles south of Burton-Lazars, and passes through Melton-Mowbray to Nether Broughton, between which and Over Broughton it enters Nottinghamshire.

The ancient Watling-street first touches Leicestershire at Dove bridge, on the Avon, whence it proceeds in a north-easterly direction to the Anker, near Mancetter, not far from Atherstone, where it wholly quits the county for Warwickshire, after having formed the south-western boundary of Leicestershire for a distance of upwards of twenty miles. The Fosse-road, from Lincolnshire, enters this county near the Roman station Vernometum, whence it proceeds by Segg's hill, over Thrussington Wolds, across the Wreke near Syston, and through Thurmaston to Leicester, whence it is continued over King Richard's bridge, having passed which, it turns to the left, over the second branch of the Soar, to the Narborough turnpike-road, along which it continues to the fourth milestone; then leaving it and the town and church of Narborough on the left, it continues to High Cross on the Watling-street. The Via Devana, from Colchester to Chester, enters this county near Cottingham, and, crossing the Welland, passes Medbourne, near Slanston Mill, whence it is continued between the two Strettons to Leicester, where it joins the Fosse, which, however, it soon leaves to proceed to Grooby, whence it is carried by Ashby to Burton upon Trent. The Fosse-way may be distinctly traced, more particularly on the eastern side of the county, and near the village of Narborough. The Via Devana is visible on the hill between the parishes of Cranoe and Glooston, and in different other parts of its course. Another ancient road, which the Rev. T. Leman, in his account of the Roman roads and stations in Leicestershire, calls the "Salt-Way," and considers of British origin, entered this county from Lincolnshire, in its way to the great salt-works at Droitwich: after passing by Croxton, on the north-eastern border of the county, it continued to Segg's hill, and crossing the Fosse, proceeded to Barrow, its course being afterwards seen in some places in Charnwood Forest. The Roman stations within the limits of this county were, Rata, or Ratiscorion, at Leicester; Vernometum, on the northern border, supposed to have been at Burrough hill, or near Willoughby; and Benona, near High Cross; besides which there was the celebrated one of Manduessedum, now Mancetter, situated on the Watling-street, on the borders of this county and Warwickshire. The principal remains of Roman buildings have been found at Leicester; other miscellaneous Roman remains have been discovered at Rothley, Wanlip, Harborough, Burrough, and Calthorpe. The most remarkable ancient churches are, St. Mary's, Leicester, and those of Bottesford, Hinckley, and Melton-Mowbray, to which class of antiquities may be added, the chapel of Market-Harborough. The religious houses, considered with regard to the dimensions of the county, were very numerous; including three colleges, six hospitals, three preceptories of the Knights Hospitallers, and one Alien priory, they amounted to thirty-one: the remains of monastic buildings are few and small; the principal are those of the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis, near Leicester, those of Ulvescroft priory, and those of Grace Dieu nunnery. This county comprises but few remains of ancient castles: there are the picturesque ruins of the castellated mansion of Ashby, the most ancient portions of which are of the reign of Edward IV., and of Kirby castle. Among the numerous elegant seats which adorn the county the most magnificent are, Belvoir castle, the seat of the Duke of Rutland; and Donnington park, that of the Marquis of Hastings. There are medicinal springs at Ashby de la Zouch, Burton-Lazars, Dalby on the Wolds, Gumley, Neville-Holt, Leicester, and Sapcote: the baths at the first of these places constitute a fine Doric edifice, erected within the last six years: the water is strongly impregnated with muriate of soda, containing, by ten or twelve degrees, more salt than sea water, and serviceable in rheumatic complaints.

LEIGH, a tything in the parish of WIMBORNE-MINSTER, hundred of BADBURY, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 1 mile (E.) from Wimborne-Minster, containing 358 inhabitants. There was anciently a chapel at this place.

LEIGH, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of YETMINSTER, Sherborne division of the county of DORSET, 6½ miles (S. by W.) from Sherborne, containing 343 inhabitants.

LEIGH, a parish and sea-port in the hundred of ROCHFORD, county of ESSEX, 17½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Chelmsford, containing 905 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to St. Clement. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. This parish borders upon the Thames, and includes an island called Leigh

Marsh, with the east end of Canvey island, and the famous oyster creek there. In a hollow near the Thames is a small custom-house. About the year 1765, a quantity of Roman coins was discovered, on the fall of a cliff after heavy rain.

LEIGH, a parish comprising the hamlet of Evington, in the lower division of the hundred of WESTMINSTER, but chiefly in the lower division of the hundred of DEERHURST, county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Gloucester, and containing 340 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Deerhurst, within which, however, no ecclesiastical authority is exercised, the parishes being virtually in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester; it is rated in the king's books at £7. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. James. The navigable river Severn and the Coombe Hill canal pass through the parish.

LEIGH, a parish partly in the hundred of SOMERDEN, but chiefly in that of CODSHEATH, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Tunbridge, containing 876 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £9. 18. 9. The Rev. Nathaniel May was patron in 1811. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains some ancient monuments, and considerable remains of richly-stained glass: it had formerly a chantry, which was suppressed by Edward VI. The river Medway bounds the parish on the south; and there are mineral springs possessing properties similar to the water of Tunbridge Wells. A fair for pedlary is held on July 25th.

LEIGH, a parish in the hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, containing 18,372 inhabitants, and comprising the chapelries of Astley and Atherton, and the townships of Bedford, Tyldesley, Pennington, and West Leigh, the two latter including the market town of Leigh, 46 miles (S. S. E.) from Lancaster, and 197 (N. W.) from London, the population of the town of Leigh being included in the return for the respective townships. The name of this place is pure Saxon, and synonymous with the English word Lea, a field or pasture. The manufacture of cambric-muslins and fustians is carried on, that of the former being the more considerable; and the general trade of the place has much improved of late years, chiefly in consequence of advantages derived from a branch of the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, which here forms a junction with the Leeds and Liverpool canal. Packet-boats, for passengers from Liverpool to Manchester, pass by this place every day. Coal and limestone are found in the parish; the latter, when burnt, is used in making a very excellent cement, which is impervious to water. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the 24th and 25th of April, and on the 7th and 8th of December, for cattle, pigs, pedlary, &c. A court baron for the manor of Pennington, and a court for the manor of West Leigh, are held here annually by their respective lords; as are also the petty sessions for the Warrington division of the hundred of West Derby. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £9, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Lilford.

The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient stone edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and two side aisles, terminating in sepulchral chapels. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, Swedenborgians, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school is of uncertain foundation, but was endowed, in 1655, by Piers Rancars, with a rent-charge of £5; in 1681, by Richard Bradshaw, with £6 per annum, which, with subsequent grants, produce an annual income of £25: there are seven free scholars; and the master has a dwelling-house rent-free. Upwards of one thousand children receive instruction in the various Sunday schools in this town. Several sums have been given, by charitable individuals, for distribution among the poor. The manufactures of Lancashire are eminently indebted to the ingenuity of Thomas Highs, a reed-maker at this place, who, in 1764, constructed the first spinning-jenny, and, in 1767, invented the water-frame, which was afterwards improved and extensively introduced by Sir Richard Arkwright.

LEIGH, a tything in the parish of PITMINSTER, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Taunton. The population is returned with the parish. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LEIGH, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Uttoxeter, containing, with the township of Field, 1019 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £14. 0. 5., and in the patronage of Lord Bagot. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient cruciform structure. Stephen Spencer, in 1620, gave land now producing an annual income of £66, for the maintenance of a schoolmaster, who instructs about fifty-five free children.

LEIGH, a parish in the first division of the hundred of REIGATE, county of SURREY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Reigate, containing 453 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £15. 10. 5., endowed with £1200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of R. C. Dendy, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

LEIGH, a chapelry in the parish of ASHTON-KEYNES, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, county of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Cricklade, containing 263 inhabitants.

LEIGH, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Worcester, containing, with the whole of the chapelry of Bransford, which is partly in the parish of Powick, 1810 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £13. 9. $4\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Earl Somers. The church is dedicated to St. Edburgh.

LEIGH (ABBOT'S), a parish in the hundred of PORTBURY, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Bristol, containing 317 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Bedminster, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. This place formerly belonged to the abbot of St. Augustine in Bristol, from which circumstance it derived its prefix. After the battle of Worcester, Charles II. was concealed in the old manor-house, which has since been replaced by an elegant mansion, called Leigh Court, commanding fine views of the Bristol channel, Gloucestershire, and the Welch hills.

LEIGH (HIGH), a chapelry in that part of the parish of ROSTHERN which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 5 miles (N. W.) from Knutsford, containing 854 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £1000 private benefaction, and £3300 parliamentary grant. Egerton Leigh, Esq. was patron in 1826. A school-house was built, at the expense of the inhabitants, in 1717, for the use of poor children of the parish.

LEIGH (LITTLE), a chapelry in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Northwich, containing 359 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Great Budworth. The chapel is an ancient building, repaired in 1664 by the inhabitants, with the assistance of a small sum from the parishioners at large. Here is a place of worship for Baptists. There are some trifling donations for the education of children. The Grand Trunk canal passes in the vicinity.

LEIGH upon MENDIP, a parish in the hundred of MELS and LEIGH, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Frome, containing 666 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Mells, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells. The church is dedicated to St. Giles.

LEIGH de la MERE, a parish in the hundred of CHIPPENHAM, county of WILTS, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Chippenham, containing 125 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £8. H. C. Vince, Esq. was patron in 1786. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. At this place Alfred encamped on the night before his attack upon the Danes at Edindon; and on Clay hill, in the neighbourhood, is a circular double-intrenched camp, to which the Danes fled, and there withstood a siege of fourteen days. Near a field, called Courtfield, is a garden surrounded by a moat, supposed to be the site of a palace of one of the Saxon kings.

LEIGH (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of COLYTON, county of DEVON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Colyton, containing 214 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. 9. 7. James Jenkins, Esq. was patron in 1797. A small Sunday school has been endowed by the Rev. Mr. How.

LEIGH (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Witney, containing 592 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £9. 2., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Ann Perrott, in 1788, bequeathed a small sum for the education of seven children.

LEIGH (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of COLYTON, county of DEVON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Colyton, containing 327 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £11. 8. 9. Charles Gorden, Esq. was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence. The Rev. James How, in 1816, gave £200 stock towards the support of a Sunday school, the dividends arising from which are applied to that purpose.

LEIGH (SOUTH), a chapelry in the parish of STANTON-HARCOURT, hundred of WOOTTON, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Witney, containing 316 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. James.

LEIGH (WEST), a parish in the hundred of FREMINGTON, county of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Bideford, containing 452 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £8. 2. 1., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter.

LEIGH-WOOLEY, a tything in the parish of GREAT BRADFORD, hundred of BRADFORD, county of WILTS, containing 1569 inhabitants.

LEIGHLAND, a chapelry in the parish of OLD CLEEVE, hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, county of SOMERSET, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Watchet. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Old Cleeve. The church is dedicated to St. Giles.

LEIGHS (GREAT), a parish partly in the hundred of CHELMSFORD, but chiefly in that of WITHAM, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Braintree, containing, with the hamlet of Chatley, 667 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £25. 7. 1., and in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows of Lincoln College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has at the west end an ancient circular tower of flint and stone.

LEIGHS (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of CHELMSFORD, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Braintree, containing 160 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £9. Lord and Lady Olmins were patrons in 1795. The church is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist. A priory of Black canons, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. John the Evangelist, was founded here, in the reign of Henry III., the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was estimated at £141. 14. 8.: the gatehouse, which still remains, is in the later style of English architecture.

LEIGHTERTON, a chapelry in the parish of BOXWELL, upper division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S ASH, county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Tetbury. The population is returned with the parish.

LEIGHTON, a township in the parish and hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Nantwich, containing 270 inhabitants.

LEIGHTON, a township in the parish of NESTON, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 1 mile (N.E.) from Parkgate, containing 404 inhabitants.

LEIGHTON, a parish in the hundred of LEIGHTON-STONE, county of HUNTINGDON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Kimbolton, containing 446 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Leighton in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LEIGHTON, a parish in the Wellington division of the hundred of BRADFORD (South), county of SALOP, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Much Wenlock, containing 375 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. Miss Maddocks was patroness in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, a parish in the hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, comprising the market town of Leighton-Buzzard, and the chapelries of Billington, Eggington, Heath with Reach, and Standbridge, and containing 4421 inhabitants, of which number, 2749 are in the town of Leighton-Buzzard, 20 miles (W. S. W.) from Bedford, and 42 (N. W.) from London. The adjunct to the name is either derived from Bosard, the name of a family in the county, who were knights of the shire in the reign of Edward III., or from Beau desert, the prevailing opinion being in favour of the latter. It is believed to be the Lygean burgh of the Saxon Chronicle, which was taken from the ancient Britons in 571, by Cuthwulph, the brother of Ceawlin, King of Wessex. The town is situated on the eastern bank of the river Ouse, and consists of one wide street branching off to the right and left at its upper extremity, and neither paved nor lighted; the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells. Near the market-house is an ancient and elegant cross of pentagonal form, and in the later style of English architecture; the entire height, from the base to the top of the vane, is thirty-eight feet: the upper story is divided into five niches, each of which contains a statue, the most perfect of which are a bishop, Christ and the Virgin, and St. John the Evangelist: this structure, said to have been erected more than five hundred years, was repaired, in 1650, by means of a rate of fourpence levied upon each of the inhabitants.

A considerable trade is carried on in timber, iron, lime, brick, corn, &c.; and several females are employed in making lace and straw-plat. The Grand Junction canal, which passes near the town, and is navigable for vessels of eighty tons, affords the means of communication with the northern counties. The market, which is one of the oldest in the county, is on Tuesday, and is amply supplied with cattle, corn (which is toll-free), lace, straw-plat, &c. Fairs are held, February 5th, the second Tuesday in April, Whit-Tuesday, July 26th, October 24th, and the second Tuesday in December; the first of these is remarkable for an extensive sale of horses. The town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who meet on the market day, in a room over the market-house. Courts leet and baron are held at Whitsuntide and Michaelmas, by the lessee of the manor, under the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Leighton-Buzzard in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £15. The church, which is dedicated to All Saints, was formerly collegiate: it is a large cruciform structure, principally in the early style of English architecture, with various additions and insertions of a later character, and has north, south, and west porches, together with a fine massive tower, surmounted by an octagonal stone spire, rising from the intersection: the western door is a curious specimen of iron-work: within the church are several ancient monuments, and a portion of good screen-work. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyan Methodists. A Lancasterian school, for an unlimited number of children of both sexes, is supported by voluntary contributions. In 1704, the Hon. Charles Leigh bequeathed a rent-charge of £10 for the education of ten poor boys: this benefaction has been long discontinued; but instead of it a commodious brick building was erected, in 1790, at the expense of the Hon. Mrs. Leigh, for the use of a Sunday school, to which she also gave an annual donation of £20, the charity being further supported by subscription. In 1630, almshouses for eight poor women were founded and endowed by Edward Wilkes, Esq., and an additional endowment was bequeathed by Matthew Wilkes, Esq., in 1692: the estates belonging to this charity produce about £200 per annum, from which the alms-women receive weekly stipends of four shillings each, besides money for firing and clothing; and the surplus is bestowed in premiums to poor children, on beginning their apprenticeship, or going to service. In the time of Henry II. there was an Alien priory at Grovebury, in this parish, subordinate to the abbey of Fontevrault in Normandy; also a house of Cistercian monks, a cell to Woburn abbey. About half a mile from the town are the remains of an extensive circular camp, supposed to be of Roman origin.

LEINTHALL (EARLS), a chapelry in that part of the parish of AYMESTREY which is in the hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (S.W.) from Ludlow. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Aymestrey. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. A charity school here is endowed with about £9 a year, and a house and garden for the master. There is also an almshouse.

LEINTHALL-STARKES, a parish in the hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 6 miles (S.W. by W.) from Ludlow, containing 131 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

LEINTWARDINE, a parish in the hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, comprising the townships of Adforton, Brakes, Grange, Heath with Jay, Kinton, Leintwardine, Letton, Marlow, Newton, Payton, Walford, and Whitton with Trippleton, and containing 1277 inhabitants, of which number, 346 are in the township of Leintwardine, 9 miles (W. by S.) from Ludlow. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £7. 15. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. D. Winslow. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is a large structure, once famous for a profusion of stained glass, of which the windows still display some beautiful fragments, representing crowns, lions, fleurs de lis, the arms of Mortimer, &c. Leintwardine is situated near the confluence of the Teme and the Clun, and from the quantity of fine fish, particularly graylings, with which these rivers abound, is much resorted to as a fishing-place. There are quarries of limestone in the parish: a fair is held on the 4th of April. The Rt. Hon. Robert Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, founded, in the reign of Anne, a free school, and endowed it with land now producing an annual income of about £45. The ancient forest of Mocktree, which has been long disafforested, is in this parish.

LEIRE, a parish in the hundred of GUTHLAXTON, county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (N.N.W.) from Lutterworth, containing 435 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 14. 9½., and in the patronage of the Countess de Grey. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. A school-room has been erected by a subscription entered into by the parishioners, to celebrate the peace in 1814: it is a good brick building, covered with slate, and capable of accommodating seventy children. Leire is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

LEISTON, a parish in the hundred of BLYTHING, county of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Saxmundham, containing, with the hamlet of Sizewell, 954 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, and in the alternate patronage of the Governors of Christ's Hospital, and the Master and Wardens of the Haberdashers' Company, London. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. An abbey of Premonstratensian canons, in honour of the Virgin Mary, was built and endowed by Ranulph de Glanvill, in 1182, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £181. 17. 1.

LELANT (UNY), a parish in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, 3 miles (S.E.) from St. Ives, containing 1271 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of St. Ives, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £22. 11. 10½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church, dedicated to St. Ewny, is surrounded by banks of sand. There are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parish is bounded on the north by St. Ives' bay, and on the east by Hayle harbour and the river of that name, which is crossed by a bridge. A considerable quantity of granite is raised here, and there are several tin mines in the neighbourhood, the principal of which are Wheal Reath and Wheal Speed. A fair for cattle is held on August 15th.

LELLEY, a township in the parish of PRESTON, middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 8 miles (E. N. E.) from Kingston upon Hull, containing 119 inhabitants.

LEMINGTON (LOWER), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, though locally in the upper division of that of Westminster, county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Moreton in the Marsh, containing 67 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Redesdale. The ancient Fosse-way passes through this place, which seems to have been a Roman station, from the coins frequently discovered here.

LEMMINGTON, a township in the parish of EDLINGHAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Alnwick, containing, with Battle-Bridge and Lemmington-Mills, 123 inhabitants.

LENBOROUGH, a hamlet in the parish, hundred, and county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 miles (S.) from Buckingham, containing 75 inhabitants.

LENCH (ATCH), a hamlet in that part of the parish of CHURCH-LENCH which is in the lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, 5½ miles (N.) from Evesham, containing 63 inhabitants.

LENCH (CHURCH), a parish comprising the hamlets of Atch-Lench and Sheriff's Lench, in the lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, and partly in the upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, 5¾ miles (N. by W.) from Evesham, and containing 342 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. 10½., and in the patronage of the Crown. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LENCH (ROUSE), a parish in the middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Alcester, containing 258 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £9. 0. 5., and in the patronage of Sir W. E. R. Boughton, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LENCH (SHERIFF'S), a hamlet in that part of the parish of CHURCH-LENCH which is in the lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, 4½ miles (N. by W.) from Evesham, containing 76 inhabitants.

LENCH-WICK, a chapelry in the parish of NORTON, lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, 2¾ miles (N.) from Evesham. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel, which was dedicated to St. Michael, has been demolished.

LENHAM, a parish in the hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Maidstone, containing 1959 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £13. 15. 2½. T. F. Best, Esq. was patron in 1827. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure, having at the west end a tower steeple, containing a good set of chimes; in it are sixteen elegant stalls, a stone confessional, and other relics of antiquity. There is a place of worship for Independents. Lenham possesses a charter for a weekly market, but it has been long disused. Fairs are held on June 6th and October 23rd, for horses and cattle. John Foord, in 1766, founded a free school for ten poor boys, and endowed it with £300, which produces an income of about £12 per annum.

LENTON, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, county of NOTTINGHAM, 1 mile (W. S. W.) from Nottingham, containing 1240 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £9. 2. 5½, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The village of Lenton has recently increased in importance, several new streets, and many elegant mansions having been erected, and manufactories for lace and extensive bleaching-works established. The Nottingham canal passes through the parish. A fair for cattle, sheep, and hogs, is held on St. Martin's day, and another on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week. The Peverel court, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £50, the jurisdiction of which extends over parts of the counties of Derby, Nottingham, and Stafford, is held here every Tuesday: the charter for holding this court was granted by William the Conqueror to his son, William Peverel, and confirmed by others subsequently granted by Charles II. and Anne; the officers constituting the court are, a steward, deputy steward, and judge, prothonotary, and capital bailiff. Here is a prison for debtors, of which the bailiff is gaoler. There are some remains of a Cluniac priory, founded, in the reign of Henry I., by William Peverel, in honour of the Holy Trinity; it was subject to the great foreign abbey of Cluny, but, on the suppression of other Alien priories, the monks here procured it to be made denizen, and thus it survived till the general dissolution, when its revenue was estimated at £417. 19. 3. Here was also a house of Carmelite friars, and, in the church-yard, an hospital dedicated to St. Anthony.

Seal and Arms.

LEOMINSTER, a parish in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, comprising the borough of Leominster, having separate jurisdiction, the chapelry of Ivington, and the township of Broadward, and containing 4646 inhabitants, of which number, 3651 are in the borough of Leominster, 13½ miles (N.) from Hereford, and 137 (W. N. W.) from London.

This place, according to Leland, partly derives its name from a minster, or monastery, founded here by Merewald, King of West Mercia, about 660; and that Saxon prince is said to have had a castle, or palace, about half a mile eastward of the town. A fortress was standing on the same spot in 1055, when it was seized by the Welch chieftains, and fortified. At the time of the Norman survey, the manor, with its appurtenances, was assigned by Edward the Confessor to his queen, Editha: in the reign of William Rufus, the fortifications were strengthened, to secure it against the incursions of the Welch: in the reign of John, the town, priory, and church, were plundered and burned by William de Braose, Lord of Brecknock: in the time of Henry IV. it was in the possession of Owen Glyndwr, after he had defeated the Earl of March. In the next century, the inhabitants of the town took a decisive part in the establishment of Mary on the throne, for which service she granted their first charter of incorporation, about the year 1554. The monastery founded by Merewald having been destroyed by the Danes, a college of prebendaries, and, subsequently, an abbey of nuns, were established here; but these institutions were destroyed previously to the time of Edward I., who endowed the abbey of Reading with the monastery of Leominster, to which it afterwards became a cell: its revenue, at the dissolution, was £660. 16. 8.

The town is situated in a rich and fertile valley, on the banks of the river Lugg, which bounds it to the north and east, the Kenwater and Pinsley, two smaller streams, passing through the town itself, and three other rivulets within half a mile: the streets are indifferently paved and lighted, but considerable improvements are in contemplation: several of the houses are in the ancient style of timber and brick, the beams being painted black, and ornamented with grotesque carvings; and the inhabitants are well supplied with water from springs. A neat stone bridge has been lately erected across the Kenwater, at the estimated expense of £500, towards which, £100 was given by Lord Hotham, one of the representatives of the borough, and the remainder by the corporation. There are, a public reading-room, or subscription library, and a theatre recently erected. Near the town is a good race-course, where races are held about the end of August. An agricultural society holds its meetings here. The manufactures chiefly consist of gloves and flannel: the wool produced in the neighbourhood is proverbially excellent; and the cider and hops are held in high estimation. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on February 13th, the Tuesday after Mid-Lent Sunday, May 2nd, July 10th, September 4th, and November 8th; to each of which is attached a court of pie-powder: there is also a great market on the Friday after the 11th of December. A neat market-house, for the sale of grain, was erected in 1803. The charter of incorporation received from Queen Mary was confirmed and extended by subsequent sovereigns; the last was by Charles II., in 1665, under which the corporation consists of a bailiff, chief steward, recorder, and twenty-four capital burgesses, with a chamberlain, town clerk, two serjeants at mace, and other officers: the bailiff, the late bailiff, the recorder, and two aldermen elected annually by the corporation, are justices of the peace. A court of record is held every Monday, before the bailiff, or two of the burgesses, for the recovery of debts to the amount of £100 within the borough; quarter sessions for the borough are held in January, April, July, and October; and petty sessions, for the lower division of the hundred of Wolphy, are held here: there is also a court leet annually. This borough has sent two members to parliament since the 23rd of Edward I.: the right of election is vested in the bailiff, capital burgesses, and other inhabitants paying scot and lot: the number of voters is about seven hundred, and the bailiff is the returning officer. The town-hall, or butter-cross, is a singular building of timber and brick, supported by curiously-carved pillars of oak; it was built in 1633. A new gaol was erected in 1750.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £10. 3. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is a spacious and irregular structure, exhibiting specimens of every style of Norman and English architecture: the tower stands at the north-west angle, and with other parts of the western front, is of Norman character at the base, in the pointed style above, and embattled at the top: the western doorway, which is extremely beautiful, is ornamented with pillars and receding arched mouldings; the windows are in the decorated and later English styles: the massive pillars in the north aisle, supporting round arches surmounted by Norman arcades, are particularly curious. The south side, which is modern, is appropriated to the performance of divine service: the expense of its erection amounted to upwards of £16,000: the altar-piece is a painting of the Last Supper, from Rubens. The length of the church within is one hundred and twenty-five feet, and its breadth one hundred and twenty-four feet. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Moravians, and Unitarians. The free grammar school was founded by Queen Mary, and the master, who must be a member of one of the Universities, receives £20 per annum from the corporation. There is a National school, for children of both sexes. An almshouse for four poor widows was founded and endowed by Hester Clark, in 1735, the inmates of which receive £5 per annum each. A spring has lately been discovered at the west end of the town, the water of which is impregnated with carbonate of soda, lime, and magnesia, and sulphate of lime, with sulphuretted hydrogen and iron, in minute proportions. This place confers the title of baron upon the Earl of Pomfret, who styles himself Baron Lempster, that having been the ancient name of the town.

LEOMINSTER, a parish in the hundred of POLING, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Arundel, containing, with the tything of Warnincamp, 675 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, annexed to that of Arundel, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £9. 1. 3., and in the patronage of Eton College, on the nomination of the Bishop of Chichester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. The river Arun bounds the parish on the west. A priory of Benedictine nuns, a cell to the nunnery of Almenesche in Normandy, was founded here by Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Arundel, in the time of William the Conqueror, and dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene; after the suppression of Alien houses, its possessions were granted by Henry VI. to Eton College. At Pynham, in this parish, was a priory of Black canons, founded by Adeliza, second wife of Henry I., and dedicated to St. Bartholomew: at its suppression, in the 17th of Henry VIII., its revenue, valued at £43, was given to Cardinal Wolsey, towards the endowment of his intended colleges.

LEONARD (ST.), a chapelry in the parish of ASTON-CLINTON, hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Wendover, containing 185 inhabitants.

LEONARD (ST.), a parish in the hundred of WONFORD, county of DEVON, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (S. E.) from Exeter, containing 206 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £4. 19. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir Thomas Baring, Bart. In the churchyard there was formerly a hermitage, in which several females successively secluded themselves as anchorites. The mansion called Mount Radford, erected in the sixteenth century, was garrisoned during the parliamentary war.

LEONARD (ST.), SHOREDITCH, county of MIDDLESEX.—See SHOREDITCH.

LEPPINGTON, a chapelry in the parish of SCRAYINGHAM, wapentake of BUCKROSE, East riding of the county of YORK, 8 miles (S. by W.) from New Malton, containing 129 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with an estate vested in ten trustees, who appoint the minister. The chapel was originally a chantry chapel belonging to the abbey of Missenden.

LEPTON, a township in the parish of KIRK-HEATON, upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Huddersfield, containing 2729 inhabitants. A considerable quantity of woollen cloth, and some fancy goods, are manufactured here. Richard Beaumont, Esq., in 1703, left £10 for apprenticing poor children.

LESBURY, a parish comprising the townships of Alemouth, and Lesbury with Hawkhill, in the southern division of BAMBROUGH ward, and the townships of Bilton and Wooden, in the eastern division of COQUET-DALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, and containing 982 inhabitants, of which number, 576 are in the joint township of Lesbury with Hawkhill, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Alnwick. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £8. 2. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The river Alne is here crossed by a bridge, and discharges itself into the North sea at Alnmouth, where a great quantity of grain is shipped for London, and other markets. A schoolroom and a house for the master have been given by the Duke of Northumberland, Mr. Henry Strother having, in 1718, bequeathed a piece of land, now producing about £10. 10. a year, for teaching poor children.

LESKEARD, county of CORNWALL.—See LISKEARD.

LESNEWTH, a parish in the hundred of LESNEWTH, county of CORNWALL, 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Camelford, containing 123 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of — Glynn, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Knet.

LESSINGHAM, a parish in the hundred of HAPPING, county of NORFOLK, 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from North Walsham, containing 195 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Hempstead, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Here is a small endowment for a school, bequeathed by Jonathan Challenor, in 1727. An Alien priory, subordinate to that of Okeburn in Wiltshire, the chief of all the houses in England belonging to the abbey of Bec in Normandy, was founded here in the time of William Rufus, and, at the suppression, was given to Eton College, but afterwards to King's College, Cambridge.

LESSNESS, a chapelry in the parish of ERITH, hundred of LESSNESS, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Crayford. The population is returned with the parish. An abbey for Black canons, in honour of St. Mary and St. Thomas the Martyr, was founded here, in 1178, by Richard de Lucy, Chief Justice of England, and sometime regent of the kingdom, who assumed the habit, and shortly after died in this house; its revenue, at the dissolution, was estimated at £186. 9., and the site was granted to Cardinal Wolsey, towards the endowment of his colleges. There is a place of worship for Baptists on Lessness heath.

LETCHWORTH, a parish in the hundred of BROADWATER, county of HERTFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Hitchin, containing 76 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of John Williamson, Esq.

LETCOMB-BASSETT, a parish in the hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Wantage, containing 280 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £15. 0. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The ancient Ikniel-street crosses the Vale of White Horse, in this parish. Dean Swift, during his residence at the rectory in 1714, wrote his pamphlet entitled "Free Thoughts on the Present State of Affairs," but it was not printed till 1741.

LETCOMB-REGIS, a parish in the hundred of KINTBURY-EAGLE, county of BERKS, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Wantage, comprising the chapelries of East Challow and West Challow, and containing 800 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 7., endowed with £300 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. Here is a school, endowed, in 1730, by George Fettiplace, with £8 per annum, for teaching twenty poor children to read. On the summit of the chalk hills to the south of the village is a very large quadrangular intrenchment, called Letcombe Castle, with single earth-works; about a mile north of which, the Roman Ikniel-street crosses the Vale of White Horse. A branch of the river Ock, and the Wilts and Berks canal, also run through the parish.

LEATHERINGHAM, a parish in the hundred of LOES, county of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (N. W.) from Wickham-Market, containing 175 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Sarah Reynolds. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The river Deben runs through the parish. Here was a small priory of Black canons, a cell to the monastery of St. Peter in Ipswich: it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and at the dissolution had a revenue of £26. 18. 5. The remains have been converted into a farm-house.

LEATHERINGSETT, a parish in the hundred of

HOLT, county of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by N.) from Holt, containing 251 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £12. Mrs. Burrell and another were patrons in 1826. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. The river Glarvin runs through the village, and there is a brewery on its banks.

LETTON, a parish comprising the township of Letton in the hundred of STRETFORD, and the township of Hurstley in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, and containing 163 inhabitants, of which number, 95 are in the township of Letton, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Weobly. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £6. 15. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Representatives of John Freeman, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LETTON, a township in the parish of LEINTWARDINE, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Knighton, containing, with the townships of Newton and Walford, 208 inhabitants.

LETTON, a parish in the hundred of MITFORD, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from East Dereham, containing 127 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Cranworth, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 14. 7. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LETWELL, a chapelry in the parish of LAUGHTON en le MORTHEN, partly within the liberty of St. Peter of York, and partly in the southern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Tickhill, containing 135 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Chancellor of the Cathedral Church of York. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LEVAN (ST.), a parish in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, 9 miles (S. W.) from Penzance, containing 490 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Rector of St. Burian. Overhanging the sea, at the western extremity of the parish, are the celebrated rocks, or lofty piles of granite, called Castle Treryn, on the pointed summit of one of which the remarkable block, termed the Logan, or Rocking Stone, supposed to weigh about ninety tons, is so nicely balanced, as to be moved to and fro by a single individual. In 1820, though considered almost the greatest curiosity in Cornwall, some sailors dislodged this immense mass, and precipitated it into the abyss below; but this mischievous act exciting a general feeling of indignation throughout the country, steps were shortly afterwards successfully taken to replace it in its old position. There are a well, called St. Levan's, and an ancient oratory in the parish.

LEVEN, a parish comprising the townships of Hempholme and Leven, in the northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESSE, East riding of the county of YORK, and containing 751 inhabitants, of which number, 658 are in the township of Leven, 7 miles (N. K in 1815. The church is dedicated to St. Faith. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists.

LEVENS, a chapelry partly in the parish of HEVERSHAM, and partly in that of KENDAL, KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Kendal, containing, with Beathwaite-Green, Sizergh-Fell-side, and part of Brigsteer, 765 inhabitants. A handsome chapel, with a low tower surmounted by an octagonal spire, was erected, in 1828, at an expense of £2000, defrayed by the Hon. Fulk Greville Howard, who also built the parsonage-house; he appoints the minister, and allows him an annual stipend of £200. A school for forty poor girls was established, in 1810, by Lady Howard, who pays for their education, and partly clothes them. Another school was erected, in 1825, by Colonel Howard, and is supported at his expense: it is conducted on the Madras system, and is attended by about one hundred and forty children. On the eastern bank of the river Kent, which is crossed by a bridge on the Kendal road, is Levens hall, the venerable mansion of the Howards, embosomed in a fine park, and crowned with towers, which, overtopping the highest trees, command extensive prospects on every side: the entrance hall contains various relics of ancient armour. One of the apartments is hung with splendid gobeline tapestry, and most of the other rooms are decorated with oak wainscoting exquisitely carved, and costly hangings of the richest colours. In the park are the ruins of an ancient circular edifice, called Kirkstead, said to have been a Roman temple dedicated to Diana. There is also a petrifying spring, termed the Dropping Well. Levens Force is a celebrated waterfall of the river Kent. An iron manufactory was established in the neighbourhood about the year 1750.

LEVER (DARCY), a chapelry in the parish of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Great Bolton, containing 956 inhabitants. Coal is obtained here. There is an aqueduct of three arches across the Irwell at this place.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £1300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Bolton. The chapel is dedicated to St. Matthew the Evangelist. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school and a dwelling-house were erected, by subscription, in 1736, which are held by the schoolmaster, in consideration of his teaching six children free. Coal is obtained here. Lever hall, an ancient building within the chapelry, was formerly occupied by Bishop Bridgeman.

LEVERINGTON, a parish in the hundred of WISBEACH, Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 2 miles (N. W.) from Wisbeach, containing, with the chapelry of Parson-Drove, 1523 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Ely, rated in the king's books at £25. 0. $7\frac{1}{2}$. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard and St. John the Baptist. There is a school for teaching poor children, endowed with £20 per annum, paid out of the produce of lands supposed to have belonged to the hospital of St. John the Baptist, which existed here before the Reformation. At Fitton, in this parish, there was, in 1389, a chantry chapel, dedicated to St. Mary.

LEVERSDALE, a township in the parish of IRTHINGTON, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 7 miles (N. E.) from Carlisle, containing 450 inhabitants.

LEVERTON, a parish in the wapentake of SKIRBECK, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Boston, containing 544 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £16. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Helen. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £7. 18. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

Seal and Arms.

LEWES, a borough and market town, chiefly in the hundred and rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, of which it is the chief town, 7 miles (N.E. by E.) from Brighton, 38 (E. by N.) from Chichester, and 50 (S. by E.) from London, containing, with the parishes of St. Thomas in the Cliffe and St. John the Baptist Southover, the former in the hundred of RINGMER, and the latter in the hundred of SWANBOROUGH, 7083 inhabitants. The most probable of the various etymologies assigned to Lewes, and which are respectively deduced from the Britons, Romans, and Saxons, seems to be that alluding to its peculiar situation, Leaw-Esc (or Lew-ys, as it is engraved on the town seal), Leaw meaning an arm, and Isca, or Isca, water; i. e. the arm (of land) in the water. The remote origin of this town is proved by its being surrounded by earthworks, tumuli, &c., and the discovery of coins and other antiquities renders it probable that it was a Roman station, though the precise name appears uncertain. It was very early a demesne of the crown, having appertained to the South Saxon kings, next to those of Wessex, and afterwards to the Saxon and Danish monarchs of all England. During the Danish ravages, from the close of the eighth to the beginning of the eleventh century, Lewes was rendered, both by nature and art, the most eligible place of refuge for the inhabitants of the adjacent country. In the reign of Athelstan it was so considerable, as to be allowed by that sovereign two mint-masters, and was then the chief town and market of half the shire. A merchants' guild was established here so early as the reign of Edward the Confessor; on whose death the barony of Lewes devolved on Earl Harold, and was, on his defeat at Hastings, bestowed by William the Conqueror on his son-in-law, William de Warren, Earl of Surrey, who made it his chief residence, and rebuilt the castle, which is said to have been originally founded by Alfred the Great. Henry III. and his brother Richard, Earl of Cornwall, were confined in this fortress, after being taken prisoners in the great battle fought between the king and the barons under Simon Montfort, Earl of Leicester, in 1264, on an eminence adjoining the town. A treaty, or convention, was subsequently concluded between the king and the insurgent barons, which is distinguished in history by the appellation of the "Mise of Lewes."

The principal part of the town occupies a declivity on the western bank of the river Ouse, over which is a stone bridge of one arch, built in 1727, the former wooden bridge having been swept away by a flood; this river, being navigable from the sea to the distance of a few miles above the town, commands the trade of the surrounding district. It is extensive and well built, and contains some good streets and many handsome houses; it is well paved, and lighted with gas, pursuant to an act of parliament obtained in 1806, under the direction of commissioners, and supplied with water for ordinary purposes by pumps or draw wells. On the west side of the town is Southover; and on the east side of the river, under a lofty and impending chalk cliff, from which it receives its name, is the town of Cliff, the site of which is supposed to have been anciently covered by the sea. About the year 1821, considerable improvement was made in the White Hill road, which passes through a valley near the town, by lowering the hill on each side, and filling up the valley with the materials, thus forming a causeway between thirty and forty feet high. The environs extend to the South-Downs, a chain of chalk hills, rising like an amphitheatre to the mean elevation of about five hundred feet, and covered with the fine rich herbage which gives to the South-Down mutton its admired flavour. There is a small theatre in West-street. The race-course is one of the finest four-mile courses in the kingdom, and has a commodious stand, erected in 1772: the races take place annually in March and August; the former, called Hunters' races, were established in 1828. A book society was established in 1785, and now possesses several thousand volumes, many of them scarce works; and there is a Literary Society, consisting of about one hundred members, with a president, two vice-presidents, a secretary, an inspector, and a librarian: they hold quarterly meetings, at which subscribers are balloted for, and are admitted on paying £6. 6., and £1. 5. annually. A mechanics' institute was established in 1825: the building adjoins the theatre, and contains a reading-room, committee-room, and other apartments: the society has a library of about seven hundred volumes, and a respectable philosophical apparatus. The head office for stamps and legacy duties for the eastern district of Sussex, is at Lewes, and also the bishop's registrar-office for marriage licenses, probates of wills, letters of administration, &c., within the archdeaconry of Lewes. The trade of the town, which was anciently very extensive in wool, at present consists principally of various kinds of grain and malt, and almost every species of the ordinary articles of consumption: the latter are imported at Newhaven, about seven miles off, and sent up the Ouse for the supply of the neighbouring parts. There is also a paper manufactory. Daily markets for provisions are established by act of parliament; that for corn is held every Tuesday, and for live stock every Tuesday fortnight: the present market-house was completed in 1793, on a more convenient site. There are five fairs; viz., May 8th, for cattle and pedlary, July 26th, for wool, Whit-Tuesday, for cattle, and September 21st, and October 2nd, for sheep, the number of which brought for sale at each of these fairs exceeds fifty thousand. A shew of fat cattle, takes place annually about Christmas. License was granted, in the 11th of Henry IV., for a market to be held at Cliff, on Wednesday, which has nearly fallen into disuse; and the fairs formerly held there, with the exception of a small fair for pedlary, are now held at Lewes.

Lewes is a borough by prescription, having formerly had a separate shrievalty, but not incorporated: its principal officers are two constables and two headboroughs, who are chosen annually, by a jury of burgesses, at the court leet of the lord of the manor, which was anciently a regality, with separate jurisdiction extending to capital offences; but the town is now under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates. The summer and winter assizes for the county are held here, as are also the general quarter sessions for the eastern division of the county, which comprises the three rapes of Lewes, Pevensey, and Hastings: there are likewise adjourned annual sessions for the county at large. It has a sheriff's court for the recovery of debts under 40s., the jurisdiction of which extends over the three eastern rapes, but which has no power of imprisonment on non-payment. The borough sends two members to parliament, who are elected by the inhabitant householders paying scot and lot, in number from six hundred to seven hundred: the constables are the returning officers. In 1812, a commodious and handsome assize hall was erected for the eastern district of the county, the expense of which, including the purchase of the ground and other property, was £15,500: it is eighty feet in length, and seventy-six in breadth, and comprises an extensive entrance-hall with record-rooms, a room for the petty sessions, two courts of judicature, civil and criminal, and a room for the judges and magistrates: above these is a spacious and elegant room for the grand jury (which is occasionally used as a county ball-room), also a council-chamber and other apartments. In 1793, the house of correction for the eastern district was built, on Mr. Howard's plan, to which a southern wing was added in 1817: it is well adapted to its purpose, and contains a chapel and an infirmary; the southern wing is occupied by male, and the northern by female, prisoners. The prison contains seventy cells, each being nine feet by seven, of which fourteen are solitary: each division has five classes. There are two tread-mills for male prisoners; the females are employed in needle-work, &c. A constable and headborough for the adjoining parish of Cliff are chosen annually at the court leet of the Duke of Dorset.

There were anciently eleven parish churches within the borough, but these have been reduced to four. In the 37th of Henry VIII., the parishes of St. Andrew, St. Mary in Foro, St. Martin, and St. Michael, were united, and now form the parish of St. Michael, the living of which is a discharged rectory, with the rectory of St. Andrew annexed, rated together in the king's books at £17. 5. 10., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which was partially rebuilt and modernised in 1755, retains some portions of good later English architecture: it contains, among other mural monuments, a splendid one to the memory of Sir Nicholas Pelham, Knt., and Anne, his wife. St. Anne's consists of the united parishes of St. Peter within, and St. Mary West-out, (the latter being without the borough boundaries, the line of demarcation passing through the chancel of the church of St. Mary,) and that part of the parish which is westward of the borough, being within the hundred of Swanborough. Although the parochial church is dedicated to St. Anne, the parish, in all law proceedings, is denominated St. Peter's and St. Mary's West-out. The living is a discharged rectory, rated for both in the king's books at £19. 13. 6½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is ancient, being partly of Norman, and partly of early English, architecture: it contains a curious font. St. John's under the Castle is a rectory, to which that of St. Mary Magdalene was annexed in 1539, rated in the king's books at £3. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the Rev. Peter Crofts. Various parts of the church are of great antiquity, the nave resembling the Norman architecture of the castle, near which it stands; other portions of the structure are modern: in the churchyard are the remains of a monument ascribed to Magnus, son of Harold II., with an inscription chiefly in Anglo-Saxon characters. This parish extends beyond the boundaries of the borough, into the hundred of Swanborough, and is intersected by a part of the parish of Hamsey. The living of All Saints' is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £7, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Charles Goring, Esq. The church, with the exception of the steeple, which is of later English character, was begun in 1805, on the union of the parishes of the Holy Trinity, St. Peter the Less, and St. Nicholas. All the preceding parishes are in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester. The precinct of the castle is extra-parochial, and is not rateable within the borough, nor subject to any ecclesiastical jurisdiction. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians.

The parishes of St. Thomas in the Cliff, and St. John, Southover, although without the limits of the borough, may be considered as forming part of the town of Lewes. The living of St. Thomas's is a discharged rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, contains a fine altar-piece, also an organ of superior workmanship, formerly in the chapel of the Duke of Chandos. Baptists, Independents, and Huntingdonians, have each a place of worship in this parish: William Huntington, the founder of the last sect, was interred here. The living of the parish of St. John, Southover, is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £6. 12., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a spacious edifice: in 1698 the old steeple fell down, and the present square tower was begun in 1714, but the progress of its erection having ceased for some years, it was not completed before 1738. In ancient records Southover is called a borough, having enjoyed a separate jurisdiction. The manor was an appendage of the monastery, on the dissolution of which it came into the possession of the crown, and was given to Cromwell: after his attainder it again reverted to the crown, and was granted by Henry VIII. to his divorced queen, Anne of Cleves, who, according to tradition, took up her residence here, in a very ancient building situated on the south side of the street. There is a place of worship in Southover for General Baptists.

The free grammar school was founded originally at Southover, by Agnes Morley, in 1512, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £20, vested in trustees, together with a house and garden, for a master and an usher: this endowment was subsequently increased by various legacies, particularly that of Mrs. Mary Jenkins, in 1709, who left a house, gardens, and appurtenances for the master, and the sum of £1533. 16. 1. for providing instruction for whatever number of boys the trustees should think fit, the present number being twelve: the school was removed into St. Anne's parish in 1714. Belonging to the borough is an exhibition to either University for four years, left by the Rev. George Steere, "to a poor scholar, the son of parents residing in or near Lewes," the annual value of which is about £35: the scholar is chosen by the constables and four of the most respectable inhabitants in succession. Sir John Evelyn, author of "Sylva," and John Pell, the celebrated mathematician, were educated here. There is also a school for boys and girls, supported by voluntary subscriptions; and schools for infants of both sexes are supported in like manner. A bank for savings was established in 1816.

There are many interesting antiquities in and near Lewes. The Castra, or earth-works, still remaining on the summits of the Downs, may be reckoned amongst those of most remote date, but of what precise period it is difficult to determine: tumuli are also scattered in various parts, in which have been found skeletons, urns, ashes, amber beads, and occasionally warlike instruments. The numerous Roman coins found round the town, even of late years, form nearly a regular series from Tiberius to Constantine, Constans, and Magnentius; and a Roman ford has been discovered at Glynde. The castle is supposed to have been originally erected by Alfred, about the year 890, and rebuilt by William de Warren. It is distinguished from every other in the kingdom by having an artificial mound of earth raised at each extremity of the base court: the ruins of the keep are still visible at the western mound, and other traces at the eastern, which probably corresponded; the western keep was evidently of a quadrangular form, with an hexagonal tower, narrowing from the base to the summit, and was probably the prison. The gateway is supposed to have been built at two periods, by the first and eighth earls of Warren and Surrey; it has an inner arch of Anglo-Norman masonry, of the thirteenth century, and was defended by two machicolated towers and two portcullises. In 1774, the site and ruins of the castle were leased to Mr. Thomas Friend, and are now possessed by Thomas Read Kemp, Esq., by whom the keep has been repaired. Of the once extensive priory of St. Pancras, founded in 1072, and said to have covered an area of forty acres, but a very small portion remains: it was the first and chief of the Cluniac monasteries established in England, and at the dissolution possessed a revenue of £1091. 9. 6. The eastern part of the church is faced with Caen stone; on the left is a gothic window, in tolerable repair, although scarcely a trace of the ornamental carving is left. The gate-house, the arch of which is supported by clustered columns of Sussex marble, is in better preservation than any other part of this dilapidated pile, and, being nearly overgrown with ivy and weeds, presents a highly romantic appearance. A portion of the walls of St. Nicholas' hospital is still standing; and also part of the exterior walls of an hospital dedicated to St. James, which has been converted into a barn. Here was also a monastery of Grey friars, of which there are no vestiges, the site being occupied by a private dwelling-house. The town walls were erected during the residence of the Earls of Warren and Surrey, and may still be accurately traced: a great part of the western portion is standing, and vestiges of all the other parts are visible. Among the distinguished natives of Lewes may be mentioned Richard Russel, Esq., F.R.S., M.D., who, by his writings on the efficacy of the sea water at Brighton, laid the foundation of the subsequent prosperity of that fashionable bathing-place. Thomas Paine, the notorious deistical writer, resided for some time at Lewes, in the capacity of an exciseman. A great variety of mineral substances, vegetable fossils, and organic remains, has been found in the chalk formation of the vicinity. There are several mineral springs within a few miles of the borough, which it is in contemplation to bring into use for medicinal purposes.

LEWISHAM, a parish in the hundred of BLACKHEATH, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E.) from London, on the road to Tunbridge and Hastings, containing 8185 inhabitants. The name is a slight corruption of the Saxon Lewesham, or, "the dwelling among the meadows," and anciently written Levesham. The village, which is situated on the river Ravensbourn, extends about a mile along the Tunbridge road, and consists principally of one street, which is neither paved nor lighted; the inhabitants are supplied with water from a stream rising at the upper end of the village, and flowing through it. The Surrey canal passes through the parish. The county magistrates hold a weekly session here on Mondays; and the parish is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests at Greenwich, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, to which the vestry here sends twelve commissioners. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £23. 19. 2., and in the patronage of the Earl of Dartmouth. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was rebuilt in 1774, and is a handsome edifice with a square tower at the west end: a portico on the south side is supported on four Corinthian columns, and the altar is placed in a circular recess. There are episcopal chapels at Blackheath, Southend, and Sydenham; the last was formerly a meeting-house for Presbyterians, of which, Dr. John Williams, author of the Greek Concordance, was many years minister. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. Abraham Colfe, in 1656, devised in trust to the Leathersellers' Company certain estates for the foundation of two schools, one for the classical instruction of thirty-one sons of the laity in the several parishes in the hundred, and one son of each incumbent in this and the hundred of Chiselhurst; the other for the education of thirty-one boys of Lewisham, in reading, writing, and arithmetic. A classical master is appointed by the Company, who superintends the tuition of the thirty-one boys in English, under his usher: the master receives about £40 per annum, and resides in the school-house (which is situated on Blackheath) rent-free, having also the privilege of taking boarders. According to the commissioners' report in 1818, the total income of the estates was £342. 15. 6., out of which the Company pay £50 per annum to six almswomen, agreeably to the will of the donor. A school for girls was instituted in 1699, to which Dr. George Stanhope, Dean of Canterbury, bequeathed £150, and Mrs. Stanhope £50, which sums, with subsequent benefactions, produce a salary for the mistress of £20 per annum. Here was formerly a Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of St. Peter at Ghent: it was suppressed in the time of Henry V., and the site granted to the prior and convent of Shene. Dr. Stanhope, who distinguished himself as a theological writer, was presented to this vicarage in 1689, and was buried here in 1728. Lewisham confers the inferior title of viscount on the Earl of Dartmouth.

LEWKINOR, a parish partly in the hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKS, but chiefly in the hundred of LEWKINOR, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Tetsworth, containing, with the chapelries of Potscombe, Ashamstead, and Uphill, 691 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £11. 17., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

LEWSTON, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of the county of DORSET, 4 miles (S.) from Sherborne, containing 8 inhabitants.

LEWTRENCHARD, a parish in the hundred of LIFTON, county of DEVON, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Launceston, containing 344 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 9. W. B. Gould, Esq. was patron in 1786. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LEXDEN, a parish in the liberties of the town of COLCHESTER, county of ESSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W.) from Colchester, containing 932 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £12. — Papillon, Esq. was patron in 1804. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, has lately received an addition of three hundred and fifty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £500 towards defraying the expense.

LEXHAM (EAST), a parish in the hundred of LAUNDITCH, county of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Swaffham, containing 186 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united with that of Litcham in 1742, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 6. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

LEXHAM (WEST), a parish in the hundred of LAUNDITCH, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Swaffham, containing 92 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5. 11. 8., and in the patronage of Lord Wodehouse. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

LEY (UPPER), a township in that part of the parish of AYMESTREY which is in the hundred of STRETFORD, county of HEREFORD. The population is returned with the parish.

LEYBOURN, a market town in the parish of WENSLEY, western division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, 46 miles (N. W. by W.) from York, and 236 (N. N. W.) from London, containing 810 inhabitants. This town is pleasantly situated in a fertile and picturesque district; adjacent to it, along a continued ridge of rocks, is Leyburn Sparol, one of the finest natural terraces in the kingdom. It is well built, and consists principally of an oblong square, which forms the market-place. The mineral productions in the vicinity are lead, coal, and lime. The market is on Friday: fairs are held on the second Fridays in February, May, October, and December, and are noted for large sales of cattle. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists, also a Roman Catholic chapel. A school is supported by voluntary contributions; and various benefactions have been made for apprenticing poor children, and other charitable purposes.

LEYBOURNE, a parish in the hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Maidstone, containing 300 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £17. 13. 4. Sir Henry Hawley, Bart. was patron in 1798. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. The Rev. Edward Holme, in 1775, conveyed to trustees a school-room and a dwelling-house, in this parish, with the interest of £1000 four per cent. consols., for the education of fifty poor children. Here are considerable remains of an ancient castle, consisting of a gateway, flanked by circular towers, various arches, walls, &c., and traces of the moat by which it was surrounded: part of the ruins has long been converted into a dwelling-house.

LEYLAND, a parish in the hundred of LEYLAND, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the chapelries of Euxton, Heapey, Hoghton, and Whittle le Woods, and the townships of Clayton le Woods, Cuerden, Leyland, Wheelton, and Withnell, and containing 12,959 inhabitants, of which number, 3173 are in the township of Leyland, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Chorley. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £11, and in the patronage of Thomas James Baldwin, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, like Westminster and many other ancient halls, was originally erected without a single pillar; it was rebuilt and enlarged in 1817, and contains several marble monuments: adjoining the chancel is an ancient chapel belonging to the Faringtons, beneath which is the burial vault of that family. A place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists was erected in 1814. The petty sessions for the division are held here once in five weeks, on Monday. A considerable manufacture of cotton is carried on in the parish. Near the churchyard a free grammar school was founded by Queen Elizabeth, with an endowment of £3. 18. per annum, in aid of which the Rev. Thomas Armetriding, in 1718, bequeathed £250, in support of the master and an usher; the annual income, with subsequent benefactions, amounts to about £27, for which thirty children are taught to read only. Another school was erected, in 1785, by the late Mr. Balshaw, and endowed by him with lands now producing an annual income of £180, in which one hundred and ten boys and seventy girls are instructed on the National system, and are gratuitously supplied with books, stationery, &c. There is also a small endowment left by the late Samuel Crook, Esq., for the education of children. An almshouse for six poor persons was founded, in 1607, by William Farington, Esq., and further endowed, in 1665, by John Osbaldeston, Esq., the inmates of which receive each about £2 per annum, in money and fuel. A savings bank was established in 1821. There are at Shawe hall, the seat of William Farington, Esq., a choice museum of natural curiosities, and a collection of valuable paintings, some of which were found in the ruins of Herculaneum.

LEYSDOWN, a parish in the liberty of the ISLE of SHEPPY, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Queenborough, containing 132 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 10., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Clement, is a neat modern edifice, erected near the site of a more ancient and spacious one, the ruins of which are still visible.

LEYTON (LOW), a parish in the hundred of BECONTREE, county of ESSEX, 6 miles (N. E.) from London, containing, with the chapelry of Leytonstone, 3374 inhabitants. This place derives its name, which appears to be a contraction of Lee town, from its situation on the river Lee: it is supposed by Camden and others to be the site of the ancient Durolitum; but whether or not, it is evident that here was a Roman station: various pavements, foundations of buildings, coins, both consular and imperial, and other Roman antiquities having been repeatedly discovered, particularly near the manor-house. At a place called Ruckholt are vestiges of an old intrenchment, now nearly covered with trees. The village is situated on a gentle ascent, rising gradually from the western bank of the river Lee, and continuing to the Forest of Waltham, eastward of which is the hamlet of Leytonstone, now so populous as to comprise nearly one-half of the inhabitants of the whole parish; the single street of which it consists extending nearly from the forest to Stratford, in the direct road from Epping to London, and lighted with gas: here are several good houses, and some large mansions. The living of Low Leyton is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of London, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop, rated in the king's books at £7. 12., and in the patronage of J. Pardoe, Esq. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, is a plain brick edifice, with a tower at the west end: it was repaired and enlarged in the seventeenth century, and again in 1822: the chancel contains some elegant monuments of the family of Hickes, with marble effigies, and of that of Sir Robert Beachcroft, lord mayor of London in 1721, and a liberal benefactor to Christ's and St. Thomas's hospitals; also one of Mr. John Wood, who travelled over several parts of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America: there is likewise one to the memory of the antiquary and biographer, the Rev. John Strype, who was vicar of Leyton, from 1669, till his death, which took place in 1737, at the great age of ninety-four; he rebuilt the vicarage-house, and was a liberal contributor to the church and parish. A chapel of ease was erected at Leytonstone, in 1750, by subscription. Within the parish are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. In 1697, Robert Ozler bequeathed £300 for the erection, and a rent-charge of £12 for the endowment, of a free school, for a certain number of children of Leyton and Walthamstow: the school was built here, and the present number of boys is fourteen. There are National schools for boys, in connexion with schools of Industry for girls at Low Leyton and Leytonstone. Almshouses for eight poor widows were founded, in 1653, by John Smith, who endowed them with £20 per annum, to which, in 1747, Charles and John Phillips added the respective rent-charges of £12 and £6, for their further support: they were repaired in 1789, at the expense of William Bosanquet, Esq. In addition to the antiquities above-mentioned, an arched gateway, ten feet in height, and six feet wide, ornamented with mouldings, was discovered near the manor-house, several years ago; and numerous urns have also been dug up near Ruckholt: in the year 1783, whilst some workmen were employed in digging a channel at the Temple Mills, in this parish, a stone coffin, in which were various pieces of armour, was discovered. The celebrated Sir Thomas Rowe, or Roe, ambassador to the great Mogul in the reign of Charles I., was a native of Leyton; and Lady Margaret Brian, governess to Edward VI., and the princesses Mary and Elizabeth, resided here in 1551. Edward Rowe Mores, Esq., a distinguished antiquary of the last century, long lived in a house of singular construction, built by himself, in this parish, now called Etloe place.

LEZANT, a parish in the northern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Launceston, containing 853 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £32, and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. Breock. At Trecarrel in this parish are the remains of an ancient chapel.

LEZIATE, a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (E.) from Lynn-Regis, containing 123 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, not in charge, with that of Ashwicken, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich.

LIBBERSTON, a township in that part of the parish of FILEY which is in PICKERING lythe, North riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (N.) from Hunmanby, containing 143 inhabitants.

Arms.

LICHFIELD, a city and county of itself, under the designation of the city and county of the city of Lichfield, though locally in the county of Stafford, $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Stafford, and 118 (N. W. by N.) from London, containing 6075 inhabitants. This place, called by Bede Licidfeld, and by Ingulphus and Henry of Huntingdon Lichfeld, both implying the field of the dead, is supposed to have derived its name from the traditionary martyrdom of more than one thousand Christians, who are said to have been massacred here in the reign of the Emperor Dioclesian: an allusion to this event appears in the heraldic bearings of the city; and a spot within its precincts, in which they are said to have been interred, still retains the appellation of the Christian field. During the Octarchy, it appears to have been distinguished by the Kings of Mercia, of whom Piada, son-in-law of Osweo, King of Northumbria, having been converted by the preaching of Cedd, a hermit, who had a cell near the site of St. Chad's church, is said to have erected the first Christian church here in honour of that recluse, who had been assiduous in his efforts to convert the Mercians to Christianity, and afterwards became their bishop. In the reign of Offa, this see not only obtained the precedence of all the Mercian bishopricks, but, through the interest of Offa with Pope Adrian, was made the archiepiscopal see, and invested with the greater part of the jurisdiction of Canterbury; Eadulph was made Archbishop of Lichfield in 789, and had for his suffragans the Bishops of Worcester, Hereford, Leicester, Sidnacester, Elmham, and Dunwich; but, in 803, Leo succeeding to the pontificate, restored the primacy to Canterbury, and Eadulph, stripped of his supremacy, died in 812. At the time of the Conquest, Lichfield, notwithstanding the distinction which it enjoyed under the Saxon kings, was but an inconsiderable place; and in 1075, when the council decreed that episcopal sees should no longer remain in obscure towns, Peter, Bishop of Licedfeld, transferred his see to Chester, where it continued till it was removed by his successor, Robert de Limsey, to Coventry, whence it was, in 1148, restored to Lichfield, by Roger de Clinton, who began the church and fortified the castle, of which latter there is not the slightest vestige. At what time, or by whom, the castle was originally built, has not been clearly ascertained; but it is, upon very good authority, asserted that Richard II., after his deposition from the throne, was detained here as a prisoner, on his route to the Tower of London. During the parliamentary war, Lichfield embraced the royal cause, and Charles I., after the battle of Naseby, slept for one night in the cathedral close, which, in 1643, Sir Richard Dyot, with some of the principal gentlemen of the county, under the command of the Earl of Chesterfield, fortified against the parliamentary forces by which the town was besieged, under Lord Brooke and Sir John Gell; the former of whom, having stationed himself in the porch of an adjoining house, was shot, by a member of the Dyott family, from the battlements of the cathedral: the attack being continued by Sir John Gell, the garrison surrendered on honourable terms, and the parliamentarians retired, leaving a body of troops to defend this post, who, in the following month, were repulsed by Prince Rupert, who marched hither after the reduction of Birmingham; the royalists retained possession of the town till its final surrender to the parliament. During these conflicts the cathedral suffered material injury; its rich sculptures were destroyed, it was converted into stables by the parliamentary troops, and, in 1651, it was set on fire, and, by order of parliament, stripped of its lead, and left to neglect and decay.

The city is built in a pleasant and fertile vale, within two miles of the Roman station Etoctum, and about the same distance from Offlow Mount, another station at Swinfen. The houses in the principal streets are handsome and well built; the streets in general are well paved; and the town is lighted with oil, and amply supplied with water, and is characterised by a prevailing appearance of cleanliness and respectability. In the environs, which abound in varied scenery, are numerous handsome seats and elegant villas. A permanent library, established within the last twenty years, is liberally supported by subscription: a small theatre, in which Mrs. Siddons made her first appearance after her marriage, is opened during the races, and occasionally at other times: an amateur concert, called the Cecilian Society, has been established nearly a century. The races take place in March and September; the former are principally supported by the members of the Anson Hunt, and at the latter a king's plate of one hundred guineas is run for on the first day; the course is on the road to Tamworth, about two miles from the city. Lichfield is not a place of much trade: there are an extensive carpet-factory, and a small manufactory for spinning cotton thread. The Birmingham canal passes within a quarter of a mile of the city, and within the distance of a mile and a half joins the Wyrley and Essington canal. The market is on Friday: and the fairs are, January 10th, Shrove-Tuesday, and Ash-Wednesday, for cattle, sheep, bacon, and cheese, and the first Tuesday in November for geese and cheese: the market-house is a light and commodious building of stone, occupying the site of the ancient market-cross.

Corporate Seal.

The city received a charter of incorporation from Edward VI., which was confirmed and extended by Mary and Elizabeth, the former of whom erected it, with a district of sixteen miles in circuit, into a county of itself; in 1623, the charter was renewed by James I., and confirmed with additional privileges by Charles II.: the government is vested in two bailiffs and twenty-one brethren (one of whom is town clerk and coroner), a recorder, steward, and sheriff, assisted by a sword bearer, two serjeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The bailiffs are appointed on St. James' day; the senior bailiff is selected by the Bishop of the diocese, from two nominated by the corporation, who themselves appoint the junior bailiff: the recorder, steward, and town clerk, are appointed by the corporation, subject to the approval of the king; and by their charter, any of the citizens, not being one of the bailiffs or twenty-one brethren, is chosen sheriff by the corporation, who have power to fine him at their discretion for refusing to serve the office: two chief constables are chosen by a jury of burgage tenants, at their court leet, held on St. George's day, and several petty constables at the great portmote court, held on the 22nd of July. The bailiffs, the late bailiffs, the recorder, and the steward, are justices of the peace within the city and county of the city, but their jurisdiction does not extend over the Close of the cathedral, which possesses exclusive privileges, and is under the sole jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter. The freedom of the city is inherited only by the eldest sons of freemen, and acquired by purchase, or servitude in one of the trading companies, of which there are seven, viz., the Curriers, Smiths, Saddlers, Bakers, Dyers, Tailors, and Butchers. The corporation hold assizes for the city and county of the city, as occasion may require, for the trial of capital offenders, quarterly courts of session, and a petty session every week; they hold also a court of record weekly, for the recovery of debts to any amount above 40s.; and a sheriff's court is held every month, for the recovery of debts under that amount. The guildhall is a neat edifice of stone, ornamented with a pediment in front, in the tympanum of which are the city arms: the hall is spacious, and well adapted to the purposes of the several courts, and behind it are apartments in which the public business of the corporation is transacted; underneath is the common gaol for the city, containing rooms and cells for the confinement of debtors and felons. The city first exercised the elective franchise in the 33rd of Edward I., and continued to make regular returns till the 27th of Edward III., from which period it ceased till the time of its incorporation by Edward VI., who restored that privilege, and since then it has returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the bailiffs, magistrates, burgage tenants, freeholders to the amount of forty shillings per annum, and freemen enrolled and paying scot and lot, in all about eleven hundred: the sheriff is the returning officer. An annual fête, called the Court of Array, takes place on Whit-Monday in the guildhall, whence it is immediately adjourned to an eminence called Greenhill, in the parish of St. Michael, where a temporary bower is erected for the occasion: it was formerly given by the corporation, but is continued by voluntary contributions. Upon this occasion, the city officers, attended by a large concourse of the inhabitants, with music and banners, after visiting the different wards of the city, adjourn to the guildhall, where they are treated with wine and refreshments; they then proceed to the market-place, where the town clerk delivers an oration, exhorting them to "perform their duty to the king and to their fellow citizens, and to pursue the paths of industry and virtue." This ceremony is supposed by some to have been instituted by King Osory, to commemorate a victory obtained by him over Penda; but others, with more probability, ascribe it to an act passed in the reign of Henry II., and confirmed in succeeding reigns, ordaining that the high constables in each town should frequently inspect the arms of the inhabitants within their franchise.

Vol. III.

Arms of the Bishoprick.

Lichfield, jointly with Coventry, is an episcopal see, and since the demolition of the abbey and conventual buildings at Coventry, has become the sole seat of the diocese: the jurisdiction of the see extends over the counties of Derby and Stafford, and a considerable part of the counties of Warwick and Salop. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, the four archdeacons of Coventry, Stafford, Salop, and Derby, twenty-seven prebendaries, five priest-vicars, seven lay-clerks, eight choristers, and other officers; at the dissolution the revenue was £795. 17. 6. The cathedral, which had been reduced during the parliamentary war to a state of extreme dilapidation, was restored, by Dr. Hacket, on his preferment to the united sees of Lichfield and Coventry, in 1661, to its original state of splendour and magnificence: various improvements have subsequently been made, and the choir has been greatly enlarged, under the superintendence of Mr. Wyatt, by the removal of the screen in front of the lady chapel, the expediency of which alteration is very questionable, with regard to its influence on the proportion of its several parts. The prevailing character of the edifice is that of the early English, approaching very nearly to the decorated style of English architecture: the west front is magnificently rich, and the spires of the western towers, each one hundred and eighty-three feet in height, are in beautiful combination with the lofty central spire, which is two hundred and fifty-eight feet high: the east end is hexagonal, and the whole exterior is highly ornamented in various parts with statuary and sculpture of exquisite design and elaborate execution: the interior presents various styles, with several later insertions: the transepts display considerable portions in the Norman character, and the choir, which deviates from the line of the nave, is in the decorated style of English architecture; it is richly ornamented, and lighted with windows of beautiful tracery: the bishop's throne, and the prebendal stalls, are fine specimens of tabernacle-work: St. Mary's chapel, built by Bishop Langton, is an edifice of elegant design; it is lighted with nine lofty windows, of which, the three at the east end are more rich in their tracery, and are ornamented with stained glass brought by Sir Brooke Boothby from the dissolved abbey of Herckenrode, in the bishoprick of Leige; in the central window on one side is a painting of the Resurrection, by Eggington, from a design by Sir Joshua Reynolds: in this chapel was the rich shrine of St. Chad, which was demolished at the dissolution. The whole length of the cathedral, from west to east, is four hundred and eleven feet, and the breadth, along the transepts, one hundred and fifty-three feet. Among the monuments which escaped the ravages of the parliamentary troops are, those of Bishops Hacket, Langton, and Pattishul. There is a monument to Doctor Samuel Johnson; a bust of Garrick; a mutilated statue of Captain Stanley; and a monument of exquisite beauty by Chantrey, to the memory of the infant children of Mrs. Robinson: this monument, which is considered as a masterpiece of sculpture, is unrivalled for beauty of design, intensity of feeling, and force of expression. A passage from the north aisle leads to the chapter-house, a decagonal building of great beauty, of which the finely-vaulted roof is supported on a clustered central column. Above it is the library, instituted by Dean Heywood, in which are the gospels of St. Chad, an Alcoran taken at the siege of Buda, and a folio edition of Chaucer, richly illuminated. The bishop's palace, on the north-east side of the Close, is a spacious edifice.

The city comprises the parishes of St. Mary, part of which is in the southern division of the hundred of Pirehill; St. Chad, part of which is in the northern division of the hundred of Offlow; and St. Michael, part of which is in the northern, and part in the southern, division of the hundred of Offlow; and the liberty of the Cathedral Close, which is extra-parochial; all in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield. The living of St. Mary's is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield: the church is a modern edifice, erected on the site of an ancient structure described by Leland as "right beautiful." The living of St. Chad's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of St. Mary's. The church, by far the oldest in Lichfield, was rebuilt, on the site of an ancient church erected by Bishop Headda, in honour of St. Chad, and near his hermitage. The living of St. Michael's is also a perpetual curacy, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of St. Mary's: the church, a plain edifice in the later style of English architecture, is situated on an eminence called Green-hill; it contains a tablet, with an inscription by Dr. Johnson, to the memory of his parents: the church-yard comprises from six to seven acres, and is the principal cemetery of the city. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Kilhamites, and a Roman Catholic chapel.

The free grammar school appears, from a small endowment payable out of the Exchequer, to have been founded by Edward VI.: its annual income arises from the said grant from the Exchequer, a small sum paid out of the revenue of St. John's hospital, a contribution from the feoffees of the Conduit Lands, and a stipend paid by the corporation: the present master of St. John's hospital, the Rev. Mr. Chancellor Law, subscribes £75 annually towards the salary of the second master. The school-house was erected, in 1692, at the joint expense of the corporation and the feoffees of the Conduit Lands; there are only six free scholars on the foundation, each of whom receives an annuity of £1. 6. 8., granted by Dean Walker to six scholars of the former school, in St. John's hospital, now transferred to this school; the other scholars pay £2. 2. per quarter to the head master, who has also a house rent-free and the privilege of taking boarders; and those who attend the lower school pay £1. 1. per quarter to the second master. An English free school was founded, in 1677, by Mr. Thomas Minors, who endowed it with a messuage for the school-house, and rents amounting to about £30 per annum. Andrew Newton, Esq., in 1801, bequeathed in aid of this charity the reversion of the dividends on £3333. 6. 8. three per cent. consols., after the decease of the then legatee. Humphrey Torrick, Esq., in 1652, bequeathed a messuage, the rental of which, amounting to £9 per annum, is appropriated to the instruction of five poor boys; and in the parish of St. Michael's are donations of houses and land, producing £129 per annum, for the support of a schoolmaster and chaplain, and for other charitable uses: there are also a National and a British school for boys, supported by subscription.

St. John's hospital was founded, in the reign of Henry III., by one of the bishops of the diocese, and, in 1252, Radulph de Lacock, canon of Lichfield, endowed it with lands at Elmhurst and Stitchbrook, for the maintenance of a priest, and the support of the poor and infirm in this hospital, which was visited by the Bishops of Lichfield for many years, but fell into neglect and decay, from which it was retrieved by Bishop Smyth, who was translated to the see in the reign of Henry VII.: that prelate rebuilt the premises in 1495, and formed the statutes by which it is at present governed. The establishment consists of a master, or warden, in priest's orders (appointed by the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry), a schoolmaster, also in priest's orders, an usher, and chaplain (appointed by the warden), thirteen almsmen, (who have each three shillings and sixpence per week, with other advantages), and a matron: the revenue is about £350, of which, after paying the annual expenses, which amount on an average to about £200, the remainder is paid to the master: the premises comprise thirteen almshouses, apartments for the master and other officers, and a chapel: the school formerly attached to the hospital has been superseded by the free grammar school. An hospital for women was originally founded, in 1424, by Bishop Hayworth, and endowed, in 1504, by Thomas Milley, one of the canons residentiary, with tenements and lands producing, together with subsequent benefactions, an income of about £370, for the maintenance of fifteen aged women, who receive each a weekly allowance of seven shillings and sixpence, including a benefaction by Mr. John Fecknam: the inmates are appointed by the trustees, and it is in contemplation to add a number of out-pensioners to the charity, the funds having accumulated, from the excess of the income above the annual expenditure. A dispensary, supported by subscription, was established in 1829. The Conduit Lands, producing an income of about £580, were devised to trustees, in 1546, by Henry Beane, master of the guild of St. Mary, for the repair of the conduits and water courses of the city. There are numerous donations and bequests, amounting to more than £1000 per annum, for distribution among the poor.

Among the monastic establishments was a convent of Grey friars, founded in 1229, by Alexander, Bishop of Lichfield; it was burnt down in 1291, and being rebuilt, subsisted till the dissolution: the remains are now let on lease, and the rents appropriated to charitable uses. Several relics of antiquity are preserved in Mr. Green's museum, among which is the wooden lintel of a doorway, pierced by a ball which killed Lord Brooke, the parliamentary officer, during the siege of the cathedral. There is a chalybeate spring; and some fine specimens of agate, in a state of decomposition, are found in the vicinity, where a fine sort of clay for pottery is also met with. Elias Ashmole, the antiquary, and founder of the Ashmolean museum at Oxford; Dr. George Smalridge, and Dr. Thomas Newton, both distinguished as theological writers; and the celebrated Dr. Samuel Johnson, were natives of this place: and among the residents were, Garrick, Dr. Darwin, author of "the Botanic Garden," and his ingenious biographer, Miss Seward.

LIDBROOK, a hamlet in the parish of ENGLISH-BICKNOR, hundred of ST. BRIAVELLS, county of GLOUCESTER. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Iron and tin works furnish employment to about one hundred and twenty individuals: they are said to be the first that were established in the kingdom. Coal is brought from the Forest of Dean, by means of a railroad constructed from the Wye to the Severn.

LIDDIARD-MILLICENT, a parish in the hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, county of WILTS, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Wootton-Basset, containing 391 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £17. 4. 4½. S. W. Warneford, Esq. was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LIDDIARD-TREGOOZE, a parish in the hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, county of WILTS, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Swindon, containing 717 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 5. 5. G. Watson Taylor, Esq. was patron in 1780. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LIDDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Uppingham, containing 594 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Liddington in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 2., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. At Caldecott, in this parish, is a chapel of ease. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In 1721, Mary Parnham bequeathed £200 to be laid out in land, desiring the rental to be applied in educating five poor children of this parish, and five of Lavington; the proportion of income to each school is £9. 16. 10. per annum. A palace, formerly belonging to the Bishops of Lincoln, a fine structure in the early style of English architecture, and consisting of a large hall with painted windows, has been converted into an hospital for a warden, twelve brethren, and two nurses, which charity was founded, in 1600, by Sir Thomas Cecil, Knt., Lord Burghley, and called Jesus' Hospital.

LIDDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, county of WILTS, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Swindon, containing 409 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £17, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector: the rectory is a sinecure, rated in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of the Duke of Marlborough. The church is dedicated to All Saints. On Beacon hill, in this parish, was a large circular work, called Liddington Castle.

LIDGATE, a parish in the hundred of RISBRIDGE, county of SUFFOLK, 6¾ miles (S. E. by E.) from Newmarket, containing 389 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £15. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Duke of Rutland. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Here was an ancient castle, called King John's Castle, of unknown origin. Lydgate the poet, who was also a monk of Bury, was born here.

LIDLINGTON, or LITLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of REDBORNESTOKE, county of BEDFORD, 3½ miles (W. by N.) from Amphill, containing 739 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Duke of Bedford. The church, dedicated to All Saints, contains an ancient tomb, with a brass effigy in armour of one of the Goldingtons, who possessed the manor of Goldington, in this parish, in the fifteenth century. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LIDNEY, or LYDNEY, a market town and parish in the hundred of BLIDESLOE, county of GLOUCESTER, 19 miles (S. W. by W.) from Gloucester, and 123 (W. by N.) from London, containing, with the chapelry of Aylburton, 1393 inhabitants, of which number, 1040 are in the town of Lidney. This place is thought by some to have been the Roman station Abona, which, however, is very doubtful. In Lidney park are the remains of a Roman villa, and two Roman camps, the largest of which is of an oblong form, about eight hundred and thirty feet in length, and three hundred and seventy in breadth, surrounded by a single ditch, except at the east end, where it is double: near the western border of this intrenchment is a Roman bath, still tolerably perfect: in other parts are traces of ancient buildings; and fragments of tessellated pavements, urns, and statues, have been found, also coins of Adrian and Antoninus, and a silver one of Galba. An old mansion, called Whitecross, was erected by Sir William Winter, Vice Admiral of England in the reign of Elizabeth; and it was fortified and garrisoned during the civil war in the reign of Charles I., by Sir John Winter, a distinguished royalist officer, who defended his house against repeated attacks of detachments from the parliamentary forces stationed at Gloucester. The parish is bounded on the eastern side by the river Severn: a rail-road from the Severn to the Wye runs parallel with a canal from Lidney dock to the wharf, whence the former passes northward, intersects the town, and continues its course through the parish. Veins of coal have been found here, forming part of the great coal field in the Forest of Dean; but none are now worked to any extent. The market is on Wednesday: fairs are held on the 4th of May and the 8th of November. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of St. Briavell's and Huelsfield, in the archdeaconry of Hereford, and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £24. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Some small benefactions have been made for distribution among the poor. There are some chalybeate springs in the parish.

LIDSING, or LIDGEN, a vill in the parish of GILLINGHAM, hundred of CHATHAM and GILLINGHAM, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Chatham, containing 42 inhabitants.

LIDSTONE, a hamlet in the parish of CHURCH-ENSTONE, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. N. W.) from Neat Enstone, containing 146 inhabitants.

LIFTON, a parish in the hundred of LIFTON, county of DEVON, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Launceston, containing 1214 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £31. 2. 11., and in the patronage of Harris Arundel, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Two schools are supported by voluntary contributions: there are mines of manganese in this parish. The rivers Tonkay and Lyd flow in the vicinity. Cattle fairs are held on the 2nd of February, on Holy Thursday, and October 28th. There is a medicinal spring near Lifton bridge.

LIGHTCLIFFE, a chapelry in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Halifax, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £600 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Halifax. There is a place of worship for Independents.

LIGHTGRAVE, or LEEGRACE, a hamlet in the parish of LUTON, hundred of FLITT, county of BEDFORD, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Luton, containing 282 inhabitants.

LIGHTHORNE, a parish in the Kington division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Kington, containing 316 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £14. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$. Lord Willoughby de Broke was patron in 1787. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence.

LILBOURN, a parish in the hundred of GUILSBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Rugby, containing 264 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The village is situated on the line of the ancient Watling-street, and is supposed to have been the Tripontium of the Romans: vestiges of an ancient castle are still visible. At Roundhill, about half a mile from the town, bones and skulls have been found; tradition states it to have been the scene of an engagement between the Danes and the Saxons. The river Avon passes on the east of the parish.

LILBURN (EAST), a township in the parish of EGLINGHAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wooler, containing 97 inhabitants. In 1768, on the removal of a heap of stones, superstitiously believed to have been raised by the devil, and called "the Apronful of stones," the base and fragments of a cross, with four rows of steps, were discovered beneath.

LILBURN (WEST), a township in the parish of EGLINGHAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Wooler, containing 171 inhabitants. At the west end of the village there are some remains of an ancient mansion and tower, likewise of a chapel of ease.

LILFORD, a parish in the hundred of HUXLOE, though locally in that of Polebrook, county of NORTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Oundle, containing, with Wigsthorpe, 130 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the rectory of Thorpe-Achurch, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. $3\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Lord Lilford. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Lilford confers the title of baron on the family of Powys.

LILLESALL, a parish in the Newport division of the hundred of BRADFORD (South), county of SALOP, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Newport, containing 3143 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 17. 11., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Marquis of Stafford. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. About 1145, an abbey, for regular canons of the order of St. Augustine, was founded here: at the dissolution the revenue was valued at £327. 10. A branch of the Donnington Wood, or Marquis of Stafford's, canal terminates in the northern part of this parish.

LILLEY, a parish in the hundred of HITCHIN and PIRTON, county of HERTFORD, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Hitchin, containing 427 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £19. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LILLIFFEE, a hamlet in the parish of HEDSOR, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Great Marlow. The population is returned with the parish.

LILLINGS-AMBO, a township in the parish of SHERIFF-HUTTON, wapentake of BULMER, North riding of the county of YORK, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from York, containing 208 inhabitants.

LILLINGSTONE-DAYRELL, a parish in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Buckingham, containing 127 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 9. 7., and in the patronage of Richard Dayrell, Esq., whose ancestors have been patrons upwards of five hundred years, and have resided here for eighteen generations. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

LILLINGSTONE-LOVELL, a parish in the hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, though locally in the hundred and county of Buckingham, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Buckingham, containing 160 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £8. 9. $4\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LILLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of the county of DORSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Sherborne, containing 185 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 12. $3\frac{1}{2}$. Mr. and Mrs. Gordon were patrons in 1798. The church is dedicated to St. Martin.

LILLINGTON, a parish in the Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Warwick, containing 226 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 13. 4. Matthew Wise, Esq. was patron in 1795. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

LILLISDON, a tything in the parish and hundred of NORTH CURRY, county of SOMERSET, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Taunton. The population is returned with the parish.

LILLY, a hamlet in the parish of CATMERE, hundred of COMPTON, county of BERKS, 5 miles (W. by S.) from East Ilsley. The population is returned with the parish.

LILSTOCK, a parish in the hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, county of SOMERSET, $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Bridg-water, containing 71 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Stoke-Gursey, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. This parish is bounded on the north by Bridg-water bay, in the Bristol channel.

LIMBER (MAGNA), a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Caistor, containing 421 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to St. Peter, was given, in the time of Henry II., by Richard de Humet, constable of Normandy, to the Cistercian abbey of Aulnay, or Aveny, in Normandy, the abbot and convent of which established a cell here; this cell, at the suppression of Alien priories, was sold to the Carthusians of St. Anne, near Coventry. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LIMBER (PARVA), a hamlet in the parish of BROCKLESBY, eastern division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N.) from Caistor. The population is returned with the parish.

LIMBURY, a hamlet in the parish of LUTON, hundred of FLITT, county of BEDFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Luton, containing, with Biscott, 276 inhabitants.

LIMEHOUSE, a parish in the Tower division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 2 miles (E. by S.) from London, containing 9805 inhabitants. This place, which is situated on the north bank of the Thames, was formerly a hamlet belonging to Stepney, from which parish it was separated in 1730. It consists principally of a number of narrow streets and irregular buildings, diverging from the principal thoroughfare. There are several respectable houses; and among the numerous shops, warehouses, and manufactories, are some spacious and well-built structures, though many of the buildings are of an inferior description. The streets are partly paved, and are lighted with gas. There are several rope-walks, the principal of which was established by the late Captain Huddart, F.R.S., who, about twenty-five years since, obtained a patent for a machine for twisting ropes for cables of the largest dimensions: it is worked by a steam-engine of thirty-horse power: the number of persons employed during the late war was nearly three hundred, now about one hundred and fifty. The proprietors have likewise a machine for making flat rope: the walks, four hundred yards in length, are sheltered from the weather, and are lighted with gas made on the premises. In connexion with the above are a manufactory for sail-cloth, and an extensive bleaching ground: the yarn is washed in a reservoir supplied by the waste water from the steam-engine. Here is also a very extensive establishment for the manufacture of patent chain cables, anchors, and various kinds of iron-work. Ship-blocks are made here, and there is a variety of other trades connected with the shipping. Ship-building is carried on extensively at Limehouse Hole. At the eastern extremity of the parish, are the West India Docks, which extend across the river to Blackwall. The northern dock, for unloading ships, covers thirty acres, and is capable of accommodating three hundred West Indiamen; the southern is for loading outward-bound vessels: it covers twenty-four acres, and will admit two hundred ships. The former was opened in 1802, and the latter in 1805: they have extensive ranges of building, in which foreign goods are deposited previous to the payment of the duty. A canal from the river Lea, called the New Cut, crosses this parish and joins the Thames, superseding the circuitous navigation round the Isle of Dogs. The Regent's canal likewise passes through the parish, on the line of which, just before its junction with the Thames, is a basin, capable of admitting vessels of from two to three hundred tons' burden. On the south side of the Commercial road is a tram-road, from the West India Docks to Whitechapel, constructed, at an expense of nearly £20,000.

The living is a rectory not in charge, within the jurisdiction of the Commissary of London, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop, and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Anne, is a massive structure, with two angular turrets at the east end, and a square tower at the west end, erected after a design by Nicholas Hawksmoor, one of the pupils of Sir Christopher Wren: it is one of the fifty churches erected pursuant to an act passed in the reign of Queen Anne. A place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists is now being erected. A charity school for boys was established by subscription about the middle of the last century, and Limehouse having been constituted a distinct parish, the school, in 1737, was united with one for the hamlets of Poplar and Blackwall, situated at Poplar, and again separated from it in 1807. In 1779, a school for girls was established by subscription, and in 1806 a school-house was erected: in 1811 the two schools were united. The endowment belonging to this establishment consists of £1300 three per cent. stock, producing £39 per annum; £10. 10. per annum from a bequest by Captain Lovelace; £10 per annum from the Ironmongers' Company; £130 per annum arising from landed property; and about £400 per annum, from subscriptions, contributions, &c. About three hundred and fifty boys, and one hundred and fifty girls, are now educated, on the National plan, of whom fifty of each sex are clothed: the master has a salary of £80, and the mistress and her assistant £70, per annum, the former two having each a house rent and tax free, and allowance for coal. The charity is under the superintendence of a committee of the subscribers.

LIMINGTON, a parish in the hundred of STONE, county of SOMERSET, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (E.S.E.) from Ilchester, containing, with the tything of Draycott, 268 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £21. 6. $5\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Wadham College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains the effigy of Sir Richard Gyverney, founder of a chantry here, and others of the family, but the figures are much mutilated. On a pew in the chancel is the cipher of Cardinal Wolsey, who was sometime rector of this parish.

LIMPENHOE, a parish in the hundred of BLOFIELD, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Acle, containing 142 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Southwood, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4. The Rev. John Love was patron in 1803. The church is dedicated to St. Botolph.

LIMPSFIELD, a parish in the first division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, county of SURREY, 4 miles (E.N.E.) from Godstone, containing 918 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £20. 0. 5. Mr. and Mrs. Gower were patrons in 1806. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LINACRE, a township in the parish of WALTON on the HILL, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Liverpool. The population is returned with the chapelry of Bootle.

LINBRIGGS, a township in the parish of ALLENTON, western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11 miles (W. by N.) from Rothbury, containing 70 inhabitants. The river Coquet, near where the Ridlee bourne empties itself into it, is crossed by a bridge: several fine brooks run through the glens in this neighbourhood, and terminate in the river.

LINBY, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Nottingham, containing 439 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 9. $9\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Andrew Montague, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. This parish is bounded on the east by the small river Seen.

LINCH, a parish in the hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Midhurst, containing 77 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £3. 12. $8\frac{1}{2}$, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Mr. and Mrs. Poyntz.

LINCHMERE, a parish in the hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Midhurst, containing 282 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, endowed with £10 per annum and £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant. James Baker, Esq. was patron in 1814.

LINCOLN, a city and county of itself, locally in the county of Lincoln, of which it is the chief town, 132 miles (N. by W.) from London, containing, with the parishes of Bracebridge, Branston, Canwick, and Waddington, which constitute the liberties of the city, and exclusively of the parishes of St. Mary Magdalene and St. Paul in the Bail, and part of the parish of St. Margaret in the Close, which are in the wapentake of Lawress, 10,367 inhabitants. This place was founded by the ancient Britons, on the summit of a hill near the river Lindis, now the Witham, from which it derived its name, and has been distinguished, from the most remote period of British history, as a city of considerable importance. After the invasion of Britain by the Romans, that people made it one of their principal stations in this part of the island, and established here a colony, which, in reference to the ancient British name of the place, they called Lindum Colonia, to which, through all the variations and contractions in its orthography by the Saxons, Danes, and Normans, the present appellation, Lincoln, may be distinctly traced. The Roman city was in the form of a parallelogram, four hundred and thirty yards in length, and four hundred in breadth, defended by strong walls, and intersected at right angles by two streets, at the extremities of which were four gates, of which the northern, now called Newport gate, partly remaining, forms one of the most interesting relics of Roman architecture in the kingdom: it consisted of three arch-ways: the central arch is sixteen feet in span, and twenty-two and a half in height above the ground, and is formed of large rough stones apparently laid without mortar; one of the lateral arches is built up, and the other open. To the south-west of the gate is a considerable angular fragment of a Roman building, supposed to have been the mint; and there are various portions of the original fortifications, besides the remains of a bath and a sudatorium.

After the departure of the Romans from Britain, Lincoln was made the capital of the kingdom of Mercia by the Saxons, in opposing whom, Vortimer, who had greatly signalized himself, was slain, and interred here. During the repeated encounters which had previously taken place, the city had suffered great injury, and, for the security of its new inhabitants, it was substantially repaired; that part without the gate of Newport, which had been originally occupied by the Britons, was entirely rebuilt, and fortified with walls and a moat. In 786, the Danes took the city by assault, but it was retaken by the Saxons; and during these conflicts, which were resumed with extreme obstinacy, the northern suburb was completely destroyed. At length, on the subjugation of the Danes by Alfred the Great, tranquillity was restored; but under his successors the invaders renewed their attacks, and ultimately, in the partition of the kingdom between the contending parties, Lincoln, with the rest of the kingdom of Mercia, came into the possession of Canute. At the time of the Conquest, a castle was erected here by William the Conqueror, which occupied nearly one-fourth part of the Roman city, and to make room for the erection of which, not less than two hundred and forty mansions were taken down. In Domesday-book the city is stated to have contained fifty-two parishes; and it became the residence of a succession of monarchs, who contributed greatly to adorn it with a variety of splendid buildings, the numerous vestiges of which, in various parts of the town, convey but a faint idea of its former grandeur and importance. In 1140, the castle was surprised by the forces of a party in the interest of the Empress Matilda, and subsequently besieged by Stephen, aided by the inhabitants; but the Earl of Gloucester coming to its assistance with a powerful army, Stephen was made prisoner; and being afterwards exchanged for the earl, who was subsequently captured, he regained his liberty, and after his restoration to the throne, celebrated the festival of Christmas here, in 1144. Henry II., on the death of Stephen, after being crowned King of England in London, underwent the ceremony of coronation a second time at Wigford, a little to the south of this city. John, in the 3d year of his reign, received here the homage of David, King of Scotland, and, during his struggle with the barons, the inhabitants remained steadily attached to his cause, and withstood the attempts of the opposing army for a considerable time; but the city was taken at last by Gilbert de Gaunt, afterwards created Earl of Lincoln. The castle was retaken by a party of royalists, after having been defended for nearly twelve months; but falling again into the hands of the barons, John, while marching to attack it, with a powerful army, lost all his carriages in crossing the washes. After the death of this monarch, his son, Henry III., assisted by the inhabitants of Lincoln, who adhered firmly to the royal cause, continued the war with the barons, who, assisted by Louis, the Dauphin of France, laid siege to the city, but were vigorously repulsed by the inhabitants; many, endeavouring to escape, were drowned in the river Witham, and several others were taken prisoners. The castle, after remaining for a considerable length of time in the possession of the Crown, came into that of the celebrated John of Gaunt, who made it his summer residence, and is said to have erected a palace here. Edward I. held parliaments in Lincoln, in 1301 and 1305; Edward II. in 1316, and the year following; and Edward III. in the first of his reign: it was also visited by Henry VI., who held his court in the bishop's palace; and Henry VII., after the battle of Bosworth Field, spent three days here, where he made a splendid procession, and offered up public thanksgiving for his victory over Richard III.

During the parliamentary war, the inhabitants embraced the royal cause, and the city was alternately in the possession of the contending parties, from both of whom it sustained considerable injury, more especially in its ecclesiastical edifices, which, during their occupation of the city, were converted into barracks, by the soldiers of Cromwell's army. Among the disastrous events which have befallen Lincoln may be recorded the great storm in 701, which occasioned the destruction of one hundred and twenty houses, and many public buildings. In 1110, an accidental fire nearly consumed the whole city; and in 1185 it was greatly damaged by an earthquake. It may also be mentioned that, on the 27th of July, 1255, eighteen Jews were executed, for the alleged crime of crucifying a child, and many more were murdered by the enraged mob.

The city is pleasantly situated on the summit and declivities of an eminence rising from the river Witham, the suburbs extending for a considerable distance along the vale to the north and south: in the upper part the streets are narrow, and the buildings, with the exception of those connected with the cathedral, are of somewhat mean appearance; the lower part consists principally of one spacious street, and, under an act of parliament recently obtained, many judicious alterations and improvements have been effected. It is paved, and lighted with gas, by a special act, and is supplied with water from three public conduits, of which that near St. Mary's church, Wigford, is an elegant building in the later style of English architecture, decorated with a pierced parapet; and that near the High Bridge is ornamented with a handsome obelisk, erected in 1763. The air has been rendered more salubrious by the draining of the fens, a large tract of ground on both sides of the river, consisting of one hundred thousand acres, for which an act of parliament was obtained in 1762. The city library, established in 1812; the new permanent library; and St. Martin's parochial library, established in 1822; and the medical library, instituted in 1825, are well supported; and there are two news-rooms and several book societies in the town. The theatre is opened annually in September, October, and November; and assemblies are held in the city and county assembly-rooms. The races take place in September; a handsome stand has been recently erected on the course. In various parts of the town are the remains of the numerous monastic and other establishments which formerly flourished here; of these, the remains of John of Gaunt's palace are distinguished by a beautiful oriel window of fine composition; and a building, said to have been the stables belonging to the palace, has a finely-enriched Norman arch, with some interesting details of early English architecture: of the castle, which occupied the south-eastern angle of the Roman city, very little remains, except part of the outer walls, which were seven feet thick, and the gateway tower; the site has been appropriated to the erection of the county gaol and other buildings.

At the time of the Norman survey Lincoln was distinguished for its commercial importance, and Edward III. granted a charter to the weavers, prohibiting the exercise of that trade within twelve leagues of the city, but this decree, in 1351, was abolished by another, called the statute of cloths, and in the following year, on the removal of the staple of wool from Flanders, it was established in this town, to which was also granted the staple of lead and leather. From the time of Edward III. till the commencement of the eighteenth century the trade of the town declined: there are now no manufactures, and the trade is principally in corn and wool. The Fosse dyke, a Roman work of considerable importance to the interests of Lincoln, by means of which a communication was obtained with the river Trent, and which Henry I. cleared out and deepened, had again become innavigable, from the accumulation of sand in its channel, and, in 1741, a lease of two-thirds of it was granted, for nine hundred and ninety-nine years, at a rent of £50 per annum, and of the remaining third, for ninety-nine years, at £25 per annum, by the corporation, to Mr. Ellison of Thorne, by whose spirited exertions this canal was cleared from its obstructions and re-opened in 1745: it was subsequently widened and made deeper in 1826, and at present forms a line of communication, twelve miles in length, from the Witham to the Trent, completing the navigation from Boston and the eastern coast to the Humber, the Ouse, and to the several canals in the counties of Derby, Nottingham, Stafford, and York. The market, on Friday, is held for corn in a spacious square, called Corn Hill, in the parish of St. Mary; for butter and poultry, in a neat building near the church of St. Peter at Arches, erected in 1736; for butchers' meat, in a building erected by the corporation in 1774, adjoining Butchery-lane, and divided into convenient shambles; for fish, at the High bridge; and for cattle, in the Beast-square, on the south of the city gaol. The Spring markets are on the Thursday before the fifth Sunday in Lent, and every alternate Thursday till the April fair (which commences on the third Tuesday in that month, and continues four days), the Friday in Easter week, July 5th, the Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday after Sept. 12th, October 6th, and November 28th; a market for fat cattle is held every other Wednesday, and there are statutes for hiring servants, on the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Fridays after old May-day.

Lincoln has, from an early period, enjoyed many privileges by prescription, and was formerly governed by a portreeve: under the charter granted by Charles I., in 1628, by which the government is vested in a mayor, twelve aldermen, two sheriffs, four coroners, twenty-six common council-men, and four chamberlains, assisted by a recorder, town clerk, steward of the borough-mote courts, sword bearer, mace bearer, and subordinate officers. The city, with a district of twenty miles around it, was erected into a county in the 3d of George I., under the designation of the City and County of the City of Lincoln. The mayor is annually elected on the 14th of September, when the senior alderman, who has not previously served, is usually appointed to that office: one of the sheriffs is appointed by the mayor, and the other is chosen by the corporation, from those who have filled the office of chamberlain: the chamberlains are appointed by the mayor from among the freemen, at a court leet on the Monday after the festival of St. Michael, and are liable to fine or imprisonment for refusing to serve. The mayor, and the aldermen who have passed the chair, are justices of the peace for the city and county of the city. The freedom of the city is inherited by all the sons of a freeman, or acquired by servitude, purchase, or gift of the corporation; among the privileges is that of depasturing a greater number of cattle on the common lands than a non-freeman. The justices for the city hold quarterly courts of session, for all offences not capital; a court of petty sessions weekly, for the city and liberties; and a court of record every alternate week, at which the sheriffs preside, for the recovery of debts to any amount, but which has nearly fallen into disuse. A court of requests is held by commissioners appointed by an act passed in the 24th of George II., for the recovery of debts under 40s. The guildhall is an ancient embattled structure, rebuilt in the reign of Richard II.: the south front consists of a fine arched gateway, flanked with two round towers: in a niche in the eastern tower is a statue of the angel Gabriel holding a scroll, and in a corresponding niche in front of the western tower is a statue of the Virgin Mary treading on a serpent; above the gateway, and in front of the towers, are the city arms and others, finely sculptured. The sessions-house for the city is a neat brick edifice, erected in the New road, in 1809; and behind it is the city gaol and house of correction, containing six day-rooms, six airing-yards, in one of which is a tread-wheel, and three solitary cells, the whole adapted to the classification of prisoners, and surrounded by a lofty brick wall. The assizes for the county are held in the new county hall, an elegant structure erected, in 1823, after a design by Smirke, at an expense of £40,000; and the petty sessions for the parts of Kesteven are held here, on the first Friday in every month, at the Rein Deer inn: those for the parts of Lindsey are held every Friday, at the Judges' lodgings, an elegant mansion erected on the Castle hill, at the expense of the county, for the accommodation of the judges of assize. The county gaol stands on the south side of the area enclosed within the castle walls: it is a spacious structure of brick, containing, in addition to the keeper's house and apartments for the confinement of debtors, twelve day-rooms, and eight airing-yards: the privilege of walking in the castle grounds is occasionally allowed to prisoners whose health may require that indulgence, and the airing-yard, appropriated to the use of the debtors, comprehends an area of more than two acres: the buildings are constructed on the plan of Mr. Howard, and are in every respect well adapted to the classification of prisoners, and capable of being enlarged to an almost indefinite extent. The city first exercised the elective franchise in the 49th of Henry III., since which time it has continued to return two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the freemen generally, whether resident or not, of whom more than one thousand two hundred polled at the last contested election: sheriffs are the returning officers.

Arms of the Bishopric.

Lincoln was first erected into a see in the reign of William Rufus, when, in pursuance of the decree of a synod held at London, for the removal of all episcopal sees to fortified places, Remigius, Bishop of Dorchester, fixed upon this city as the seat of that diocese, and purchased lands for the erection of a church, an episcopal palace, and other requisite buildings: having built the church, Remigius died previously to its consecration, and his successor, Robert Bloet, completed his design, beautified the cathedral, and increased the number of prebends. The diocese, which was originally very extensive, was, in the reign of Henry II., curtailed by the separation of a part, to form that of Ely; and, in the reign of Henry VIII., it was still further diminished, by the separation of those districts which constitute the sees of Oxford and Peterborough. It is still one of the most extensive and valuable in the kingdom, and comprehends six archdeaconries, fifty-seven deaneries, and one thousand three hundred and eighty parishes; and at the Reformation its revenue was £2065. 12. 6. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, subdean, six archdeacons, fifty-two prebendaries, four vicars, eight vicars choral, organist, seven poor clerks, eight choristers, seven Burghurst chaunters, &c. The cathedral, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is situated on the summit of the hill, near the castle, and, from its commanding station, forms a conspicuous and magnificent object, of which the stately towers are seen from a distance of twenty miles, in almost every direction: the original buildings, soon after their completion by Bishop Bloet, were greatly injured by an accidental fire, and repaired by his successor, Bishop Alexander, who, to prevent the recurrence of a similar calamity, covered the aisles with a vaulted roof of stone, the pressure of which being too great for the strength of the walls, St. Hugh, a subsequent bishop, rebuilt the church in the reign of Henry II., upon a plan then newly introduced, and greatly enlarged it by taking down the east end, and rebuilding it upon a more extensive scale, and it has been subsequently embellished and increased by various succeeding bishops. The prevailing character of this noble building is the early style of English architecture, of a peculiarly rich kind, intermixed occasionally with the decorated and later styles; the form is that of a double cross: the west front is partly in the Norman style, intermixed with the richest character of the early English: the doorways are richly moulded and decorated with sculpture and statuary; over the central entrance are statues of several of the kings of England, and above is a noble window, highly enriched with tracery: the western towers are of the Norman character in the lower stages, and of the early English in the upper; they are one hundred and eighty feet high, and at each angle of the front are octagonal turrets, crowned with pinnacles. A lofty and magnificent tower rises from the intersection of the nave and the principal transepts, to the height of two hundred and seventy feet, formerly surmounted by a spire, which, in 1547, fell down, and greatly damaged the roof: there were also spires on the western towers, which were taken down in 1807. The length of the building is five hundred and twenty-five feet; the breadth, measuring along the principal transepts, two hundred and twenty-two feet, and along the eastern transepts, one hundred and seventy feet. The nave, of which the roof, as well as those of the aisles, is finely vaulted, and supported on piers of peculiar richness, and arches of graceful form, is spacious, and lighted by a range of clerestory windows: at the end of the north transept is a fine circular window of the early English character, and at the extremity of the south transept is one of the most beautiful specimens of a decorated circular window now extant. The choir, which is separated from the nave by an elaborately-carved stone screen, is remarkably rich in its decorations, and beautiful in its style; the east window, of eight lights, is a fine composition of flowing tracery, of the decorated character; and over the altar is a good painting of the Annunciation, by the Rev. W. Peters, R. A.: the piers and arches which support the roof are in the richest character of the early English style; and the bishop's throne and the prebendal stalls are beautiful specimens of tabernacle-work, highly enriched. The Lady chapel, and some smaller chapels adjoining it, are peculiarly elegant; and in various parts of this magnificent structure are features of uncommon interest and impressive beauty. Among the numerous monuments are some of exquisite design; under an arch to the south of the Lady chapel, and in the south aisle, are those of Bishops Russell and Longland, whose effigies are finely sculptured: in the north-west tower is the celebrated bell, called Tom of Lincoln, the weight of which is nearly five tons, and the tone peculiarly fine. Prior to the Reformation the cathedral was distinguished for its immense wealth, and the sumptuous costliness of its decorations: Henry VIII. is said to have taken from its treasury two thousand six hundred and twenty-one ounces of pure gold, and four thousand two hundred and eighty-five ounces of silver, exclusively of two gorgeous shrines, one of St. Hugh, of gold, the other of St. John de Alderby, of massive silver, and numerous pearls and precious stones of the most costly description. Three sides of the cloisters are yet remaining in their original state, and exhibit a fine specimen of the decorated style; and on the fourth side is the library, of later erection, containing an extensive collection of books, and some curious Roman antiquities: in the centre of the quadrangle, and at some depth below the surface, a beautiful tessellated pavement was discovered a few years since, over which a covering has been placed, to protect it from injury. On the east side of the cloisters is a passage leading to the chapter-house, an elegant building in the form of a decagon, of which the finely-vaulted roof is supported on a single pillar in the centre. There are some remains of the episcopal palace, and of the conventual buildings connected with this extensive establishment, which, in grandeur, beauty, and antiquity, holds a prominent rank among the ecclesiastical edifices in the kingdom.

VOL. III.

Lincoln formerly contained fifty-two parish churches, of which number, thirty-four were destroyed prior to the time of Edward VI.: it comprises at present the parishes of St. Benedict, St. Botolph, St. John Newport, St. Margaret in the Close (part of which is in the wapentake of Lawress), St. Mark, St. Martin, St. Mary le Wigford, St. Mary Magdalene in the Bail and Close, (part of which is in the wapentake of Lawress), St. Michael on the Mount, St. Nicholas Newport, St. Paul in the Bail, St. Peter at Arches, St. Peter in East-gate, St. Peter at Gowts, and St. Swithin; and the parishes of All Saints Bracebridge, All Saints Branston, All Saints Canwick, and St. Michael, Waddington, which are within the county of the city; all of them being within the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln. The living of St. Benedict's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of North Kelsey in the Cathedral Church: the church is an ancient building retaining some portions of Norman architecture. The living of St. Botolph's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of St. Botolph's in the Cathedral Church. The living of St. John's Newport is a vicarage not in charge, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Dunholme in the Cathedral Church: the church has been demolished. The living of St. Margaret's in the Close is a perpetual curacy, united with that of St. Peter's in Eastgate, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of the Precentor and the Prebendary of Haydor in the Cathedral Church: the church was taken down in 1778, and soon afterwards rebuilt. The living of St. Mark's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Precentor of the Cathedral Church. The living of St. Martin's is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £8 per annum private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of St. Martin's in the Cathedral Church. The living of St. Mary's Wigford is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £5. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Gretton in the Cathedral Church: the church retains considerable portions of its ancient Norman character. The living of St. Mary Magdalene's in the Bail and Close is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter. The living of St. Michael's on the Mount is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor of the Cathedral Church: the church is of comparatively modern erection. The living of St. Nicholas' Newport is a vicarage not in charge, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter: the church has been demolished. The living of St. Paul's in the Bail is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £2. 5. 10., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Lincoln. The living of St. Peter's at Arches is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. 8½., endowed with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church has been elegantly rebuilt as the corporation church, and is fitted up in an appropriate style. The living of St. Peter's in Eastgate is a perpetual curacy, united with that of St. Margaret's in the Close in 1778, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of the Precentor and the Prebendary of Haydor in the Cathedral Church: the church has been rebuilt. The living of St. Peter's at Gowts is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor of the Cathedral Church: the church is an old edifice, and has considerable vestiges of its ancient Norman character. The living of St. Swithin's is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor of the Cathedral Church: the church is of late erection. There are places of worship for general and particular Baptists, the Society of Friends, the late Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians, and a Roman Catholic chapel.

The free grammar school was founded, in 1567, by Robert Monson, Esq.: a school, formerly supported by the Dean and Chapter, in the Cathedral Close, has been united with it, and is supported jointly by the Dean and Chapter, who appoint the head master, and pay two-thirds of his salary, and by the corporation, who pay the remainder, and the salary of the usher, each amounting to £50 per annum: there are about twenty-five boys, who are taught gratuitously in this school: the premises form a part of the old Franciscan priory, which was fitted up for that use in 1583, by the founder of the school. The Blue-coat school was founded, in 1602, by Richard Smith, M. D., who endowed it with the manor and some lands at Potter-Hanwarth, for the maintenance, education, and clothing of twelve poor boys, which number, in consequence of the improvement in the funds, the governors have augmented to fifty, who are admitted from the age of seven till eight, and after remaining in the school until fourteen years of age, are apprenticed, with a premium of £16, and two suits of clothes each: the governors consist of the mayor, a gentleman resident in the city, another resident in the Close, the junior residentiary canon of the Cathedral Church, the senior alderman, the recorder, and the town clerk. The Jersey school was founded, in 1693, and endowed with £700, bequeathed by Henry Stone, of Skellingthorp, Esq., for maintaining a master to teach children to spin jerseys, and afterwards to employ and pay them for their work; but the introduction of machinery has diminished the value of this institution. A free school in the Bail was endowed with lands producing £12 per annum, by Mr. Wilkinson, for the instruction of twelve poor boys, and placed under the direction of the Governors of the Blue-coat school. The National school, established in 1813, and supported by subscription, affords instruction to three hundred boys and two hundred girls, to whom articles of clothing are distributed at Christmas. The county hospital, a spacious and handsome brick building, erected in 1769, and supported by voluntary subscription, has been productive of much benefit to the city and its neighbourhood: it is under the direction of a committee, and is attended by three physicians and four surgeons: the average expenditure is about £1300 per annum. The general dispensary was established in 1826, and is supported by subscription: the poor who require attendance at their own houses, are visited by the house surgeon, and by the dispensing apothecary, who supplies them with medicines. The lunatic asylum is a spacious handsome edifice, two hundred and sixty feet in length, and having a portico of the Ionic order in the centre, erected in 1820, from a design by Mr. Ingleman, at an expense of £15,000, and containing apartments for fifty patients, with warm and cold baths, and every requisite accommodation: the building and the grounds occupy three acres and a half: the establishment is under the direction of a president vice-president, and a committee of governors, who are chosen from the principal subscribers: it is open to patients of every class, who are expected to contribute towards the expense in proportion to their ability. The lying-in hospital was instituted in 1805, and is supported by subscription. The Dorcas Society is also supported by subscription, and has been found to contribute material assistance in supplying the poor with articles of clothing. There are various other establishments, and numerous charitable benefactions for the relief of the poor, among which may be noticed a bequest by John Smith, Esq., of lands now producing £600 per annum; a legacy by Lady Margaret Thorold of Marlston, in 1731, of £1500 South Sea annuities, for the purchase of lands now producing £60 per annum; the great tithes of Glenham, bequeathed by T. Sutton, Esq., founder of the Charter-house, London, and various others.

Among the numerous monastic establishments which anciently existed here were, a nunnery founded prior to the erection of the cathedral, the site of which is occupied by the Dean's house; an hospital for lepers, near the city, founded by Remigius, first bishop of Lincoln, or, according to other authorities, by Henry I., of which, in the reign of Edward III., the revenue was £30; a priory of Gilbertine canons, founded by Robert, second bishop of Lincoln, and dedicated to St. Catherine, of which, at the dissolution, the revenue was £270. 1. 3.; a priory of Benedictine monks, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, and a cell to the abbey at York, founded prior to the reign of Henry II., of which the remains, now called Monks' house, about half a mile to the east of the city, consist of the walls of several apartments and a small chapel; a house of Franciscan friars, the foundation of which is uncertain; houses of Carmelite and Augustine friars, the former founded in 1269, and the latter in 1291: within the Close was founded, in 1355, by Sir Nicholas de Cantelupe, a college of priests to officiate at the altar of St. Nicholas, in the cathedral; besides various others, of several of which, traces may be distinctly perceived in various parts of the city and its environs. The Jews' house is an ancient edifice of curious design, and belonged to Belaset de Wallingford, a jewess, who was hanged in the reign of Edward I., for clipping the coin. Near Brayford water are some vestiges of a fort called Lucy Tower, between which and the castle was a subterraneous communication; and in the city is a chalybeate spring of considerable strength. Lincoln gives the inferior title of earl to the Duke of Newcastle.

LINCOLNSHIRE, a maritime county, bounded on the north by the broad æstuary of the Humber, on the east by the German ocean, and by the wide arm of it called the Wash, on the south by the counties of Cambridge, Northampton, and Rutland, and on the west by those of Leicester, Nottingham, and York: it extends from 52° 38' to 53° 44' (N. Lat.), and from 18' (E. Lon.) to 1° 3' (W. Lon.); and contains two thousand seven hundred and forty-eight square miles, or, one million seven hundred and fifty-eight thousand seven hundred and twenty acres. The population, in 1821, amounted to 283,058. This portion of the territory of the Coritani was included, on the Roman division of Britain, in the province called Britannia Prima; and, from the Roman remains still existing here, it is evident that those conquerors not only considered this district of great importance, in the state in which they found it, but also made some considerable efforts towards that removal of its natural disadvantages which in latter ages have been prosecuted with such signal success. Of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom of Mercia this shire formed an important part; its northern portion, the division of Lindsey, having been wrested from that kingdom by Edwin of Northumbria. Christianity seems to have been first introduced into Lincolnshire, soon after the conversion of that sovereign, by the Romish missionary, Paulinus. We are told by Bede, that Paulinus, after converting the Northumbrians, came into the northern part of the kingdom of Mercia; that he converted Blecca, then Governor of Lincoln, and baptized many people of this district in the river Trent. The see of Sidnacester, which is known to have comprised the district or province of Lindsey, (although the site of Sidnacester itself, which appears to have been somewhere in that district, is a subject of controversy among antiquaries,) was established in 678, and continued until the latter part of the eleventh century, when St. Remigius, the nineteenth bishop, transferred the see to Lincoln. In 827, at Caistor in this county, Egbert, King of Wessex, defeated Wiglaf, King of Mercia, who fled to Croyland, where he was concealed for three months; when, by the mediation of its abbot, Siward, he was restored to his kingdom, on paying homage and becoming tributary to Egbert. This part of the English territory was particularly exposed, by its locality, to the incursions and ravages of the Danes; so that their sanguinary fury was wreaked upon it with especial frequency and violence. Early in the year 870, having landed at Humberston, in Lindsey, they destroyed the ancient and famous monastery of Bardney, and, after wasting all the country around it with fire and sword, they came, about Michaelmas, into Kesteven, which they devastated in like manner. At that time Algar, Earl of Mercia, and his two seneschals, or lieutenants, Wibert and Leofric, assembled all the youth of the parts of Holland, with a body of two hundred men belonging to Croyland abbey, and about three hundred more from Deeping, Langtoft, and Boston: they were also joined by Morkar, Lord of Brunne, with his numerous retainers, and by the sheriff of Lincoln, with the Lincolnshire forces, five hundred in number; and the whole being mustered together in Kesteven, on St. Maurice's day, gave the Pagans battle, and routed them with great slaughter, and the death of three of their kings, pursuing them to their camp, where finding a very obstinate resistance, night at length parted the combatants, and the earl drew back his army. The Danes were joined in the night by other princes of their nation, who had distributed themselves over the neighbouring country for the purpose of plunder, and in the morning, the English, notwithstanding their inferior forces, again engaged them, and, by keeping themselves in a compact body, maintained the conflict the whole day, until, deceived in the evening by a feigned flight of the enemy, they quitted their ranks, when the Danes, turning upon them, made dreadful slaughter. The Christian combatants were thus nearly annihilated, a few youths of Gedney and Sutton alone escaping to Croyland abbey, whereupon the monks immediately employed themselves in secreting and sending away their relics and other things valuable; but the barbarians, after burning the villages on their way, soon reached the monastery, made a general massacre of its inhabitants, and committed the whole monastic buildings to the flames: next day they marched, with an immense spoil of cattle, &c., to Medeshamsted, now Peterborough. In 873 the Danes wintered at Torksey, and were there visited by Burhred, King of Mercia, who purchased from them a short peace. On the tranquil settlement of these invaders in this part of England, Lincoln and Stamford were two of the five principal towns which they occupied, and from them they were not expelled until the year 941, in the reign of Edmund the Elder.

From this period until the Norman Conquest the transactions of the episcopal church and see of Lincoln form the principal subjects of historical narrative. In the war between Stephen and the Empress Matilda, Lincoln and its vicinity were the scene of some of the most interesting events, that city having been twice besieged by the king, who captured it on the first occasion; but on the second, the siege being raised by the arrival of the Earl of Gloucester and his army, the king, after fighting with desperate valour, was made prisoner. In 1174, the Isle of Axholme, being at that period surrounded by water, and consequently a position of considerable strength, Roger de Mowbray, Constable of England, one of the adherents of Prince Henry in his rebellion against his father, Henry II., maintained himself there until compelled to surrender by the Lincolnshire men, who razed his castle. The year 1216 is memorable for King John's disastrous march into Lincolnshire; when, after losing all his baggage in the washes, and narrowly escaping with his life, he first rested at Swineshead abbey; whence, being attacked by dysentery, he was removed in a litter to Sleaford, and thence to Newark, where he died. On the 4th of June in the following year, the associated barons under Gilbert de Gaunt, Earl of Lincoln, and the French under the Count of Perche, were defeated at Lincoln, by the Earl of Pembroke, regent for the young king, Henry III., when the French commander and most of his men were slain, and the principal barons and four hundred knights made prisoners. At a later period of the same reign, the Isle of Axholme afforded a retreat to many of the disaffected nobles, after the battle of Evesham. In 1536, at Barlings, commenced an insurrection of the Lincolnshire men, in consequence of the suppression of some religious houses: the insurgents were headed by Dr. Mackerel, abbot of Barlings, under the assumed name of Captain Cobler; but, on receiving the king's promise of pardon, they dispersed, and Mackerel was taken and hanged at Tyburn.

This county was the theatre of some considerable military transactions in the last general civil war. In the year 1643, by an ordinance of both houses, it was added to the Eastern Association. On March 22nd of the same year, Grantham and its garrison were captured for the king, by Col. Charles Cavendish; and shortly afterwards, near that town, twenty-four troops of royalist cavalry were defeated by Oliver Cromwell, at the head of his own regiment. On May 11th, at Ancaster, the parliamentarians, under the younger Hotham, were defeated by Col. Cavendish. On the 30th of July, Gainsborough was taken by the parliament's forces, under Lord Willoughby of Parham, and its governor, the Earl of Kingston, made prisoner, who, in his passage down the Humber to Hull, was, in a mistake, shot by the royalists: soon afterwards, near Gainsborough, the royalists were defeated by Cromwell, and their commander, General Cavendish, slain; and on October 11th of the same year, at Horncastle, Lord Widrington, at the head of a detachment of the Marquis of Newcastle's army, was defeated, five hundred royalists slain, and eight hundred taken prisoners, by the Earl of Manchester, who, on May 6th, 1644, stormed Lincoln, and captured its governor, Col. Francis Fane, with about eight hundred men.

This county is included in the diocese of Lincoln, and province of Canterbury, and forms the two arch-deaconries of Lincoln and Stow; the former, comprising the deaneries of Aswardhurn cum Lafford, Aveland, Beltisloe, Bolingbroke, Candleshoe, Calceworth, Gartree, Grantham, Graffo, Grimsby, Hill, Holland, Horncastle, Lincoln, Longobovey, Lovedon, Louth-Eske, Ness, Stamford, Walshcroft, Wraggöe, and Yarborough; and the latter, the deaneries of Aslaoe, Corringham, Lawress, and Manley. The number of parishes is six hundred and nine, of which, three hundred and five are rectories, two hundred and forty-four vicarages, and the remainder perpetual curacies. Lincolnshire consists of three grand divisions: namely, Lindsey, which is much the largest, including nearly one-half of the county, and extending from the German ocean to the borders of Nottinghamshire, and from the river Witham to the Humber; Kesteven, which forms the south-western portion of the county; and Holland, the south-eastern. The division of Lindsey comprises, exclusively of the city of Lincoln, the hundreds, or wapentakes of Aslaoe (East and West), Bradley-Haverstoe, Calceworth (Marsh and Wold divisions), Candleshoe (Marsh and Wold divisions), Corringham, Gartree (North and South), Hill, Lawress, Louth-Eske (Marsh and Wold divisions), Ludborough, Manley (East, North, and West), Walshcroft (North and South), Well, Wraggöe (East and West), and Yarborough (East, North, and South); and the soke of Bolingbroke (East and West), and Horncastle: that of Kesteven, exclusively of the town and soke of Grantham, and the town of Stamford, comprises the wapentakes of Aswardhurn, Aveland, Beltisloe, Boothby-Graffo (High and Low), Flaxwell, Langoe (First and Second divisions), Lovedon, Ness, and Winnibriggs and Threo; and that of Holland, exclusively of the town of Boston, the wapentakes of Elloe, Kirton, and Skirbeck. The county contains the city of Lincoln; the borough and market towns of Boston, Grantham, Grimsby, and Stamford; and the market towns of Alford, Barton upon Humber, Bolingbroke, Bourne, Caistor, Donington, Epworth, Falkingham, Gainsborough, Glandford-Bridge, Holbeach, Horncastle, Kirton, Louth, Market-Deeping, Market-Rasen, Sleaford, Spalding, Spilsby, Long Sutton, Swineshead, Tattershall, Wainfleet, and Wragby. Two knights are returned for the shire, two citizens for the city of Lincoln, and two burgesses for each of the boroughs. Lincolnshire is within the Midland circuit: the assizes are held at Lincoln, where is the county gaol: quarter sessions are held at Boston, for the parts of Holland; at Bourne and Falkingham, for the parts of Kesteven; and at Kirton, Louth, and Spilsby, for the parts of Lindsey: there are one hundred and ten acting magistrates. The houses of correction are at Bourne and Falkingham, for the parts of Kesteven; at Kirton, Louth, and Spilsby, for the parts of Lindsey; at Spalding, for the parts of Holland, with the exception of the wapentakes of Kirton and Skirbeck, the house of correction for which is at Skirbeck. The rates raised in the county, for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £214,750, the expenditure to £214,368. 7., of which £167,987. 12. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The discriminative features of Lincolnshire are strongly marked by nature: these consist of the low-land tracts, comprising about seven hundred and seventy-six thousand nine hundred and sixty acres; the heaths, extending to a great distance both north and south of Lincoln, the breadth of which, however, is not very great, and containing one hundred and eighteen thousand four hundred acres; and the Wolds in the north-eastern part of the county, which extend in length from Spilsby to the immediate vicinity of the Humber, and include about two hundred and thirty-four thousand eight hundred and eighty acres. Contiguous to the sea, in the southern part, spreads an immense extent of low land, much of which was once marsh land, but is now become, by means of the exertions made during a period of almost two hundred years, one of the richest tracts in the kingdom: it is a region of fertility, without beauty, in a climate which is not salubrious to the human constitution. Advancing northward, along the sea-shore, this tract becomes narrower, but is, however, continued to the Humber, on the margin of which it contracts to a mere stripe of marsh land, separated by the cliffs, which rise near the mouth of the Trent, from a nearly similar tract occupying all that part of the county lying on the left side of that great river. The heaths to the north and south of Lincoln, and the Wolds, are calcareous ranges of hills, commanding many fine views over the lower tracts. The remaining large portion of the county has no distinguishing feature, nor is it, on the whole, remarkable for superior fertility; yet from different situations in it are obtained beautiful and extensive views over the richer adjoining districts, more especially about Belton, and the cliff towns to the south of Lincoln, from the Cliff road to the north of that city, and in the vicinities of Gainsborough, Knaith, and Burton. The whole line of the Humber is included in the view from the higher Wolds, the surface of which is very uneven, in the neighbourhood of Louth, and more especially at Tathwell: there are also some very beautiful scenes in the neighbourhood of Thurgandy and Stainton.

The climate has been greatly improved in salubrity by the drainage of the vast tracts of marshes; as a proof of which, upon the completion of the great Witham drainage, agues have been much less prevalent than before. The ague was formerly a common malady upon the margins of the Trent and Humber, but it disappeared in a great measure at the time of the draining of Wallin fen in Yorkshire. Along the whole coast the land is greatly exposed to the keen north-east winds; and in the months of March, April, and May, equally ungenial easterly winds are severely felt in the neighbourhood of Barton: this latter district also, at the time of the equinoxes, experiences extremely violent westerly winds, in consequence of which, the trunks of the trees are usually inclined towards the sea. The soils, besides other varieties in different situations and under various circumstances, include clay, sand, loam, chalk, and peat, which are all found in extensive districts: nearly all the variations extend in length from north to south. The heath, a high tract of land now enclosed, and from which the streams flow both eastward towards the ocean, and westward towards the Trent, has a soil of a good sandy loam, intermixed with a very small portion of clay; it is excellent turnip and barley land, and rests on a bed of limestone, its usual depth being from nine to eighteen inches. This high ground declines suddenly towards the west, the soil, on the declivity and for some distance into the lower tract, continuing much the same; at the first line of villages, which extends in the same direction as the soil, from north to south, it is a rich loam, affording good pasturage. Beyond this is a tract of strong clay, which is harsh, stubborn, and unprofitable, very difficult to convert into good permanent grass; and next to this lies the immediate line of the Trent, which, like the borders of most rivers that pass through a flat country, has a soil of very rich warp loam of various descriptions. Returning to the heath hill, eastward of it, the country slopes gradually into a vale of soils too various for description, but not generally good. Half-way across this, towards the Wolds, is a narrow tract of good rising ground, extending in an irregular line, on which the villages are built; the whole district between the heath and the Wolds forming first the narrow ridge on which the villages are built, then the Ancholme flat, beyond which comes the ridge of pasture land; and lastly a bad flat moor, which is immediately succeeded by the Wolds. Between Gainsborough and Newark in Nottinghamshire, for the distance of twenty-five miles along the western border of this county, the whole is sand, with a flat marshy tract next the river Trent, which, however, is sometimes extremely narrow: eastward of this sand, which is good and in tillage, is a tract of cold wet clay, that becomes rich and makes excellent bean land, in the vicinity of Claypole, though much of it is subject to floods. A considerable tract about Grimsthorpe, Tromestead, Edenham, Swayfield, Bytham, Witham, &c., consists of sand, crech, and clay, the first being of a whitish, or light red, colour; the crech loam, the best arable land of the three; and the clay for the most part wet and poor. At Scott-Willoughby, Osbournby, and the neighbourhood of Falkingham, are three soils, viz., strong clay on a bottom resembling mortar, a wet crech loam, and rich hazel loam: from Belton to Normanton extends a remarkably rich tract of reddish-coloured land. The soil of the Isle of Axholme, lying to the west of the Trent, is among the finest in England, and comprises black sandy loams, warp land, brown sands, and rich soapy and tenacious loam: the understratum, in many places, is an imperfect plaster stone. In that corner of the county included between the Trent and the Humber are sand, cold clay, and various loams; the substratum of the whole being limestone at different depths. Barton Field, a tract containing six thousand acres, is a good dry turnip loam, upon chalk at various depths, fit for all ordinary crops. The soil of the great tract of the Wolds is a sandy loam on a chalk understratum, the quality of which greatly varies, from a poor sand to rich, deep, and fertile loams, that produce excellent crops of barley and wheat, and some even of beans. Between the eastern boundary of the Wolds and the sea is a tract divided into the Marsh and the Middle Marsh; the former consisting of a rich salt marsh, the soil of which is a fertile adhesive marine clay, and a very rich loam, while the latter is a line of strong land, the soil much resembling that of the marsh called "the Clays," extending from Beelsby towards Grimsby, and consisting of a strong brown loam much superior to real clay. To the west of Caistor is a barren moor, for some miles in extent, which consists of a peaty sand on a poor reddish sand-stone. The soil of the wapentake of Skirbeck is very various: in that part near Boston, and some others, the surface is a rich loam resting upon a bed of clay, underneath which is found generally, at a certain level, the silt, which is a porous sea-sand, deposited many ages ago, and, when a surface soil, becomes hardened by the rain, but is not fertile: near the sea is a thin surface of this resting upon clay; and near the fens a very stiff blue clay, the grass upon which is almost always mown: the richest pastures are upon a black mould or mass of vegetable particles. A large tract of sandy soil prevails from Spilsby to Revesby, and wholly, or partly, includes a great number of parishes. The fen lands consist of a heavy deep sandy loam, which makes very rich breeding pastures for sheep, but not feeding pastures: some also consist of a rich, soapy, blue clay; and others of black peat, which is formed of decayed vegetable substances, and, when drained, are considered to be the best for the purposes of tillage. The whole of the south-eastern portion of the county, extending along the coast from near Wisbeach, northward, to Frieston beyond Boston, is of peat of great depth and extreme richness: the understratum at Boston, when reached in boring, was found to consist of blue marl, the colour of Westmorland slate, and one hundred and fifty yards deep, with intervals of only a few inches. There is a fen below Bourne and Morton, which joins the great tract to the Isle of Ely, and to Boston.

The extreme flatness of the Lincolnshire coast, together with the slight fall and consequent sluggishness of the lower part of the course of the rivers, which terminate in æstuaries at its two extremities, have occasioned the formation, in remote ages, of a very large tract of marshes, occupying the whole eastern side of the present county, and forming upwards of a third of its superficies. The extent of these fens, and the practicability of reclaiming some portion of them from their natural state of unproductiveness and insalubrity, seem to have attracted the attention of the Roman possessors of Britain, to whom is attributed the construction of the large drain called the Car-Dyke, signifying the fen dike, which extends from the river Witham, near Lincoln, to the river Welland, on the southern side of the county, the object and the use of which have been to receive the waters from the high grounds, which intersect that part of the county, running on the western side of the dyke, and so prevent them from inundating the low grounds immediately contiguous to it, on the east. The Old Sea Bank, as it is commonly called, which, though now running parallel with the shore, at a considerable distance from the sea, has anciently protected the district of South Holland from inundation, is also considered to be a Roman work. Of the tracts thus brought into cultivation, Deeping fen, on the banks of the Welland, appears to have received the earliest attention; for, at the beginning of Edward the Confessor's reign, a road was made across it, by Egebric, Bishop of Durham; and in the reign of William the Conqueror, Richard de Rulos, that monarch's chamberlain, enclosed this part of the fen country, from the chapel of St. Guthlake (now Market-Deeping) to the Car-Dyke, and beyond to Cleilake, near Cranmore, excluding the river Welland by a strong and extensive bank of earth. As property became subdivided, greater attention was paid to the improvement of the soil; and various presentments were made, and grants obtained, for scouring the rivers, and draining off the superfluous waters. The great trench, called the Foss-Dyke, extending about seven miles from the great marsh near Lincoln, to the river Trent, in the vicinity of Torksey, was made, or materially altered, by Henry I., in 1121, as a general drain for the adjacent level, and also for the purpose of bringing up vessels from the Trent to Lincoln. The cleansing of the channel of the Ancholme, with the like double object, first took place about the 18th of Edward I., and in succeeding reigns various statutes were enacted, for the more effectual drainage of this part of the county. The Isle of Axholme was formerly one continued fen, owing to the silt, or sea-sand, washed up the channel of the Trent by the tides in the Humber, which, obstructing the waters of the Don and the Idle, forced them back over the circumjacent lands, so that their central parts, being the highest, formed a real island, the district still retaining the name of one, though no longer insular. About the reign of Edward I., however, the draining of this tract appears to have commenced; and subsequently various commissions were granted for rendering it more effectual.

In the beginning of the reign of Charles I., that important work was commenced, which embraced not only the marshes of Axholme, but all the adjacent fens, called Dikesmersh and Hatfield Chase, in the county of York. These belonging chiefly to the crown, Charles II., under the Great Seal of England, contracted with Cornelius Vermuyden, Esq., of the city of London, by articles dated the 24th of May, in the second year of his reign, that the latter should, at his own charge, drain the lands specified, in consideration of which, he and his heirs for ever, should hold of the king one-third of the surrounding grounds; on the completion of the work, a corporation was to be formed of such persons as Vermuyden, or his heirs, should nominate, to make acts and ordinances for their preservation. This great work was accordingly begun, and proceeded so successfully, that, at an expense of about £55,825, it was finished, within five years; the waters, which had usually overflowed the whole level, having been conveyed into the river Trent, through Snow sewer and Althorpe river, by a sluice, which excluded the flow of the tide, and discharged the drained water at every ebb. It is traditionally affirmed, that large vessels could formerly sail up the river Witham, from Boston to Lincoln, which report seems to be corroborated by the fragments of vessels that have frequently been found near its channel: at present, however, this river is navigable only for barges, and its current is so slow, that it does not clear away the accumulating mud. The first notice of the inundations and other inconveniences arising from the obstruction of its waters, appears in the sixth year of Edward III., when commissioners were appointed for surveying it, between Lincoln and Beckingham: other parts of the river were in like manner surveyed in subsequent reigns, and various regulations made for keeping its waters within due bounds, and conducting the land floods speedily to the sea. In the reign of Henry VII., however, more effectual measures for the same purpose were found necessary, the most important of which was the construction of Boston sluice, to execute which a Flemish engineer, named Hake, was brought over and employed: for defraying the expense, a rate was levied upon the lands lying in the contiguous wapentakes. To the north-east of the Witham, extending from that river nearly to Wainfleet, a distance of about twenty miles, lie large fenny tracts, called Wildmore fen, West fen, and East fen. Upon a writ of Ad quod damnum, issued in the 41st of Elizabeth, concerning the draining of these, it appears, that in East fen five thousand acres were under water, half of which was then considered drainable; and that the commons and severalties on the borders of the same fen contained about three thousand four hundred acres, the whole of which was surrounded: and in the sixth of Charles I., at a session of sewers, held at Boston, it was decreed that the outfall at Wainfleet haven should be deepened and enlarged, and all other necessary works done for draining the said lands: each person receiving benefit was to pay ten shillings to the undertakers. Down to the latter part of the last century however, notwithstanding the repeated exertions made in this branch of agricultural improvement, the success had scarcely been answerable to the amount of labour and expense employed; but since then, other undertakings of the same kind have been carried on with increased skill and spirit, and with far greater success. Deeping fen, which extends for nearly the whole of the eleven miles between Market-Deeping and Spalding, was drained towards the close of the last century: it comprises about fifteen thousand acres, two-thirds of which are taxable under commissioners. Alnwick fen, containing one thousand and ninety-seven acres; and Holland fen, twenty-two thousand acres, have also been drained: the very existence of the latter tract, as firm land, depends upon the security of its banks. In that long reach of fen extending from Lincoln to Tattershall a vast improvement has been made, by embanking and draining, the first act for which purpose was obtained in 1787, or 1788, and between twenty and thirty square miles of country have been enclosed and cultivated in consequence.

In the northern part of the county, the important drainage of the Ancholme Level was completed, in the latter part of the last century, by carrying the drain in a straight line through the low lands, of which those taxed to the drainage amount to seventeen thousand one hundred and ninety-seven acres, and are now chiefly pasture and meadow. The drainage of the Isle of Axholme, too, is one of very great importance. Since the year 1630, ten thousand acres have been secured from the sea, by means of embankment, in the parish of Long Sutton; and a new tract has been taken in, according to act of parliament, at Winteringham. At Humberston is a large piece of land fenced in from the sea by means of a low bank; and great tracts of valuable land yet remain to be secured from the sea, about North Somercoates, and other places on that part of the coast: the distance between high water mark and low water mark is there as much as two miles. In the reparation of the banks that secure the marsh land from the sea, the towns next the coast, called Frontage towns, defray the expense; but in case of such a breach as renders a new bank necessary, the expense is assessed, according to the highest tides ever known, by level, over all the country below such level of high water, under the direction of the commissioners of sewers; the distance from the sea subject to taxation for drainage will, therefore, vary according to the level of the country. An act of parliament was obtained, in 1792, for embanking and draining certain salt marshes and low lands in Spalding, Moulton, Whaplode, Holbeach, and Gedney, containing in all five thousand three hundred and thirty-nine acres. South Holland, grossly estimated at one hundred thousand acres, has long been an object of embankment; of the banks that have been formed upon this tract, at various periods, the Old Seadyke bank is unquestionably Roman: the New Seadyke bank, which is two miles nearer to the sea than the old one, still remains, but it is unknown when, or by whom, it was made. In taking the levels for making the new drain, it was found that the surface, on advancing to the Roman bank from the land, suddenly rose six feet, and continued on that level towards the sea, such being the depth of warp, or silt, deposited by the sea, since that bank had been made. In 1792, the act was obtained for the formation of the new embankment, a work of profit to the public, as well as to the proprietors.

In 1794, an act was passed for improving the outfall of the river Welland, and for better draining the low grounds, and discharging their waters into the sea, which object was to be effected by cutting an immense canal, from the reservoir below Spalding, capable of conducting the whole waters of the river Welland into the Witham, below Boston. About the year 1799, it was estimated that the total amount of land in Lincolnshire, which, at various periods, had been made available by drainage, was not less than one hundred and fifty thousand acres. Since that calculation was made, acts of parliament, for the better drainage of East, West, and Wildmore fens, amounting to upwards of thirty thousand acres, were passed in the 41st and 43rd years of the reign of George III.: the expenses amounted to about £400,000, and the value of the land recovered to about £2,000,000: the drainage was complete, and the land under cultivation, so early as the year 1808. In the fens of Lincolnshire, the soak is often spoken of; by which expression is meant the subterraneous water found at various depths, usually at only a very few feet below the surface: this rises and sinks according to the season, and is supposed, from its saline quality, to be the sea-water filtered through a stratum of silt, which, more especially in Holland fen, seems to be very general, and at no great depth from the surface. It has also been remarked of this district, that, although retaining its ancient name of fen, it is now, on the whole, more in danger of suffering from want of water in summer, than from a superabundance of it in winter; for, in case of drought, the great drains become very shallow, and the water retained in the earth passes off, in a great measure, through the filtering stratum of silt, so that it is necessary to dig deep, in that season, to obtain water for the cattle.

On the arable lands no particular rotation of crops is observed, as they vary still more than the soils; in the fens, however, they always commence the course with paring and burning. Rape is very extensively cultivated in almost every part of the county, more especially in the fens and low lands: its chief application is for feeding sheep. The woad grown is upon the deep rich loams, and frequently in the saline maritime levels; grass land, upon the soil of which this plant is found to flourish best, is very commonly broken up for its cultivation: the crop is regularly gathered twice, and in favourable seasons a third is wholly or partially collected; this third crop is of an inferior kind; when properly prepared, it is shipped chiefly into Yorkshire and Lancashire. The artificial grasses mostly cultivated are, red clover and white, trefoil, lucerne and sainfoin, with various kinds of hay-seeds. Many onions are cultivated in the Isle of Axholme. The rich grazing lands of Lincolnshire are its distinguishing feature, in an agricultural point of view: they are to be found on a rich loamy clay, sometimes very stiff, but of uncommon fertility. The quantity is extremely great, the finest being in the vicinities of Boston, Algarkirk, Fosdyke, Sutterton, Kirton, Frampton, Wyberton, and Skirbeck; and these during the summer will feed a bullock and a half, besides four sheep, per acre, and two sheep per acre during the winter. The marsh pastures, which lie between the Wolds and the sea, are for the most part of excellent quality; the best are used for feeding, those of inferior quality for breeding and keeping stock in common order. Hanworth, to the north of Lincoln, is principally grass land; and there is a fine tract of second-rate pasture land, lying in the vale, between the heath and the Wolds. The marsh grass lands, on the Trent produce from a ton to a ton and a half of hay per acre: on the hilly Wolds are some valuable pastures. About two-thirds of the wapentake of Skirbeck is under grass, part of which is mown: the best pasture is chiefly stocked with shearling wethers, bought in the spring, which, having yielded two fleeces, are sold the next year; and with cattle, during the summer, which are sold in the autumn: the second best is grazed by young beasts and sheep, and a few breeding sheep; the worst is chiefly mown. The marshes near the sea-shore, from Wrangle northward to Sutton, are separated from the higher part of the county by the fens, and the parishes situated on the clays. From Tealby, on the edge of the Wolds, to Wragby, is a constant succession of grass lands, with hardly any tillage; and from Semperingham down to Deeping is a line of rich grazing land, two or three miles broad. One of the most powerful of manures known in this county is the fish called Stickleback; it is extremely abundant in the east and west fens, and also comes from the sea into Boston haven. Lime, and white, blue, and red marl are also used; and to these may be added a singular practice which subsists on the Wolds, of manuring by spreading dry straw on the land and then burning it there. The water of the tides that run up the Trent, Ouse, Don, and other rivers that fall into the Humber, is muddy to an excess; and the peculiar custom of warping, which is very extensively followed, is by letting in the tide over the level lands on their banks, at high water, to deposit the muddy particles it contains, provincially called warp, and then permitting the water to run off again as the tide falls, for which purpose canals are made, joining the river, and having sluices at their mouths, which may be opened or shut at pleasure. Around the fields to be warped, to prevent the water flowing over contiguous lands, are raised banks of from three or four, to six or seven feet high, according to circumstances: one-eighth of an inch, on an average, is deposited by each tide that is let in upon the land.

The live stock of this county are very numerous: the two principal breeds of cattle are the Lincolnshire short-horned, and the Leicestershire long-horned, the former of which seems to be most generally preferred. In the vicinity of Falkingham is found a dun-coloured breed, said to have been originally brought from the Isle of Alderney: there are also a few cattle of the several breeds of Devon, Teeswater, Holderness, Durham, and Alderney, and crosses between the long-horned and the short-horned breeds, between that of Devonshire and that of Lincolnshire, and between the Lincoln and the long-horned Craven. There are no dairies except for private use and the supply of the neighbouring markets with butter, the chief objects of the agriculturists being breeding and feeding. About Normanby, Burton, &c., great numbers of cattle are bred: but few are fed here, as they are generally sold to the graziers in the marshes. Oxen are very frequently worked, more especially on the Wolds, and in the tract of country extending from Barton, by Grimsby, to Louth. The two principal breeds of sheep are, the native Lincoln and the Leicester, the latter of which has become very general: it is computed that there are usually not less than two million four hundred thousand sheep in the county. The hogs common in Holland fen, about Boston, and its vicinity, are of inferior mongrel sorts, which, however, have been latterly improved. Many thousand acres are occupied as rabbit-warrens in different parts of the county, the rabbits being of the silver and common grey kinds, with some black and some white ones. Great quantities of geese are still kept in the low fenny tracts, though not to the same extent as formerly. A considerable number of horses is bred in this county: in Holland fen the number of breeding mares is very great; and about Normanby, Burton, &c., are bred, from mares universally black, many saddle and coach horses, some of which are sold at Howden in Yorkshire, and the rest at the celebrated Horncastle fair. Numerous cart-horses are bred in the marshes about Saltfleet. On the Wolds some of the finest blood horses in the kingdom are bred, and greater attention is paid to them here even than in Yorkshire, or Durham. A society, called the Lincolnshire Agricultural Society, was established at Falkingham, in 1796, being the earliest of the kind in the county.

Very little of any kind of manufacture is carried on: about Normanby and Burton, however, a good deal of flax is spun and woven into linen: the woollen manufacture is conducted on a very small scale at Boston. At the port of Gainsborough, besides the ship-building, which is an important branch of business, a considerable quantity of rope and coarse hemp sack-ing is made. In Holland fen the women spin flax, and about Falkingham they spin flax and hemp.

The principal rivers are the Trent, the Welland, the Witham, and the Ancholme. The Trent first touches Lincolnshire at North Clifford, from which place to Stockwith, a few miles below Gainsborough, it forms its western boundary, separating it from the county of Nottingham: at this latter point it begins to form the eastern border of the Isle of Axholme, which it separates from the rest of the county, until it has received the waters of the Don, opposite Aldborough, soon after which it joins with the Ouse to form the great æstuary of the Humber. It is navigable as high as Gainsborough for merchant vessels of considerable burden, and for barges in all the rest of its course on the border of this county. The Welland first reaches the county near Stamford; forming its southern boundary, and separating it from Northamptonshire, it flows by that town to Market-Deeping, where it enters the fens, and between that place and Crowland wholly enters Lincolnshire, and divides into two branches, one of which proceeds south by east to Wisbeach, apparently in the natural course of the stream, while the other continues its sluggish course through an artificial channel to Spalding, below which town, having been enlarged by the waters of the Glen, it empties itself into Foss-dyke wash, to the south of Boston. The Witham, the whole course of which river is in this county, rises near South Witham, about ten miles north of Stamford, whence it proceeds due north to Grantham, below which, having run some distance in a westerly direction, it again assumes a northerly course, through a wide sandy valley, to Lincoln: hence it flows in an easterly direction to Grubhill, where it turns to the south-east, and passing near Tattershall, proceeds to Boston, below which town it falls into the ocean at Boston Deep: from Boston upwards towards Lincoln much of the present channel of this river is artificial, having been made for the purpose of improving the navigation, and better draining the contiguous fens. The Ancholme is a small river, which, rising in the Wolds near Market-Rasen, takes a northerly course, by Glandford-Bridge, to the Humber, from which it has been rendered navigable as high as Bishop-Bridge. The large bay, or æstuary, called the Wash, into which the rivers passing through the immense tracts of fen land in the south-eastern portion of the county are disembogued, is for the most part extremely shallow, and full of shifting sands.

An artificial navigation has been cut along the course of the Witham, from Boston to Lincoln, whence it is continued by the Foss-dyke canal to the Trent: the act for the formation of this navigation was obtained in 1788, in which year also it was completed, to the great benefit of Lincoln, and of the whole country through which it passes. A canal from the river Witham, at Sleaford, to Boston, was completed in 1796. The Grantham canal extends from that town, through the north-easternmost part of Leicestershire, to the Trent, near Holm-Pierrepont: it was completed in 1796, is thirty-three miles in length, and cost £100,000: it passes near some fine beds of plaster; and lime, in large quantities, is brought along it from Crich in Derbyshire. The Ancholme cut, which drains the Ancholme level, is navigable from Bishop-Bridge to the Humber, at Ferraby sluice. A navigable canal has also been formed, extending from Horncastle to the river Witham, at Dog-dyke, near Tattershall, and another from Louth to the sea, at Tetney.

The great road from London to Edinburgh, after crossing the south-western corner of this county, for the space of about two miles, at Stamford, re-enters it about ten miles beyond that town, and, passing through Grantham, finally quits it for Nottinghamshire at Shire Bridge, about four miles south of Newark. The great road from London to Hull enters at Market-Deeping, and runs the whole length of the county, passing through Bourne, Falkingham, Sleaford, Lincoln, and Glandford-Bridge, to Barton, where is the great ferry across the Humber to Hull: the road from London to Grimsby branches off from the Hull and Lincoln road just within the northern verge of Northamptonshire, and, entering this county at St. James', Deeping, passes through Spalding, Boston, Spilsby, and Louth.

VOL. III.

The Roman stations within the county were, Ad Abum, supposed to have been at Winterton; Aquis, at Aukborough; Bannovallium, at Horncastle, or Ludford; Causennæ, at Ancaster, or Great Ponton; Crococolana, at Brough; Lindum, at Lincoln; and Vainona, at Wainfleet. The principal ancient roads are as follows: the British Ermin-street, afterwards adopted by the Romans, first enters the county to the west of Stamford; then running by Great Casterton, in Rutlandshire, it proceeds by Ancaster and Lincoln to near the banks of the Humber. A branch of this road diverges from it about five miles north of Lincoln, and crosses the Trent, near Littleborough, proceeding in a north-westerly direction to Doncaster. Another branch left the Ermin-street, about six miles north of Stamford, and ran by Stainby, Denton, and Bottesford, towards Ad Pontem, in its way to Southwell and Bawtry. The Fosse-way, beginning on the coast, not far from Ludborough, is visible from Ludford to Lincoln, and forward to Brough, and beyond that place in its course towards Newark. The British road, called the Salt-way, branched from the Ermin-street, near Ponton, and ran by Denton into Leicestershire. There are remains of other British trackways, particularly of one running from Horncastle towards Caistor and the Humber. The Car-Dyke, already mentioned, and believed to have been of Roman construction, extends from the river Welland, on the southern side of the county, to the river Witham, near Lincoln, being sixty feet wide, with a broad flat bank on each side. It has also been mentioned that the innermost of the great embankments of South Holland, called the Old Sea Bank, was also constructed by the Romans. Remains of Roman buildings, and various miscellaneous relics of that people, have been found on the sites of the different stations above-mentioned. Some of minor importance have also been discovered at Scampton, Torksey, Stow, Gainsborough, Caistor, Well, Gedney Hill, Whaplode, Pinchbeck, Sleaford, Little Ponton, and Denton.

The ecclesiastical edifices in the division of Lindsey, excepting the cathedral of Lincoln, are inferior to those in the other parts of the county; they are of various periods, from the reign of Edward III., down to that of Henry VII. The division of Kesteven abounds with churches, both magnificent in plan and rich in decoration; the greater portion of them having lofty central spires. Those of Sleaford, Leasingham, Heckington, Threckingham, Horbling, and Grantham, with St. Mary's, St. John's, and All Saints', in Stamford, are particularly deserving of notice, as excellent specimens of ancient English architecture; and, from their height, form prominent objects from various distant points in the county. The date of the churches in this division, excepting those of Semperingham, and St. Leonard (Stamford), is in few instances earlier than the thirteenth century; and scarcely any of them having been rebuilt, few will be found of a more recent date than the reign of Henry VII. It is principally, however, in the division of Holland that Lincolnshire exhibits superior excellence in ecclesiastical architecture: among the numerous fine edifices of this kind which adorn this naturally unpicturesque district, may be specified the churches of Boston, Gosberton, Pinchbeck, Holbeach, Gedney, Spalding, Long Sutton, and Crowland; of these, the five first afford excellent specimens of the architecture of the fourteenth century. This division has few churches of a later date than the reign of Edward III.: the stone of which they are built is invariably found to be of an excellent and durable quality: some of them are cruciform; many have spires like those in Kesteven; and the rest have an embattled tower at the west end. At the period when most of them were erected, the parts of Holland being one extensive fen, it was necessary to make artificial foundations; which was done so skilfully that few of the churches have swerved from their perpendicular. Specimens of Anglo-Saxon, or early Norman, architecture are to be found in parts of the churches of Stow, Clee, Crowle, Washingborough, Fiskerton, St. Peter at Gowts (Lincoln), and a few others. The religious houses were particularly numerous, amounting to no fewer than one hundred and eight, in which number are included five Alien priories, five houses of the Knights Templars, five colleges, and fourteen hospitals: the principal remains of monastic buildings are those of the abbeys of Bardney, Barlings, Crowland, and Swineshead, of Semperingham priory, and of Thornton college. The most remarkable ancient castellated buildings which remain, either wholly or in part, are the castles of Tattershall, Torksey, Lincoln, and Falkingham; there are similar remains at Horncastle, Caistor, Somerton, Stamford, Scrivelsby, Bolingbroke, Pinchbeck, and Pilham; to which may be added Moor, Kyme, and Hussey towers: of the castles of Bourne and Sleaford only the earthworks now exist. There are ancient encampments near Brocklesby, Hibalston, Broughton, Roxby, Winterton Cliffs, Aukborough, Yarborough, South Ormsby, Burwell, Stamford, Gainsborough, Winteringham, Humington, Ingoldsby, Castle-Carlton, Burgh, Brough, and Barrow. In the low districts of this county the water is almost every where brackish. In the parishes of Tetney, Fulstow, and that vicinity, are some blow-wells, being flowing pits of clear water, about thirty feet in depth, the discharge of which is very powerful: there is one of these wells at Bourne, the water of which turns a mill at a very short distance from its source: at Louth is a spring which always runs in summer but never in winter. The division of Lindsey gives the title of earl to the family of Bertie; and the division of Holland that of baron to the family of Fox.

LINDALE, a chapelry in the parish of CARTMEL, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (N.E. by E.) from Cartmel. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord G. H. Cavendish.

LINDETH, a joint township with Warton, in the parish of WARTON, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Burton in Kendal. The population is returned with Warton.

LINDFIELD, a parish in the hundred of BURLEY-ARCHES, or BURARCHES, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Cuckfield, containing 1410 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, which is dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is in the decorated and later styles of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Independents. A school of industry was founded, by William Allen, Esq., of London, for the instruction of children of both sexes in the art of agriculture, and various trades: the building is of clay covered with cement, so as to give it the appearance of stone. Fairs are held on April 1st and May 12th, for sheep and cattle, and on the 5th of August for lambs. The river Ouse is navigable for barges to this place.

LINDLEY, a hamlet in the parish of HIGHAM on the HILL, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Hinckley. The population is returned with the parish. Here are the ruins of an ancient chapel. Mr. William Burton, the Leicestershire antiquary and historian, and his brother Robert, author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, were natives of this place, the former born in 1575, and the latter in 1576.

LINDLEY, a chapelry in the parish of HUDDERSFIELD, upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N.W. by W.) from Huddersfield, containing 2040 inhabitants. A new church, or chapel, has recently been erected in this chapelry by the parliamentary commissioners, capable of accommodating eight hundred and sixty-seven persons; four hundred and fifty of the sittings are free: the estimated expense was £2615. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Lindley school was rebuilt by subscription in 1817: the site was given, in 1706, by Thomas Thornhill, Esq., and in 1767, Samuel Haigh devised £100 to trustees, the interest of which is paid to the master, who teaches about sixty scholars on moderate terms. A considerable woollen manufacture is carried on here.

LINDLEY, a township in that part of the parish of OTLEY which is in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Otley, containing 178 inhabitants.

LINDON, a hamlet in the parish of ROCK, lower division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, county of WORCESTER. The population is returned with the parish.

LINDRICK, an extra-parochial liberty, in the lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ripon, containing 62 inhabitants.

LINDRIDGE, a parish comprising the chapelries of Knighton upon Teme and Pensax, and the hamlet of Newnham, in the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, though locally in the upper division of that of Doddington, county of WORCESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Tenbury, containing 1735 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £26. 12. 11., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A court leet is held annually. The river Teme runs through the parish.

LINDSELL, a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, 4 miles (S.E. by S.) from Thaxted, containing 353 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £8. The Earl of Guilford was patron in 1821.

LINDSEY, a parish in the hundred of COSFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (W.N.W.) from Hadleigh, containing 232 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. This place was formerly celebrated for the manufacture of an article which has received the name of "Linsey Woolsey." On a farm, called the Chapel farm, are the remains of an old chapel, now used as a barn; and on the same estate there is a Danish encampment.

LINEHAM, a parish in the hundred of KINGSBRIDGE, county of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Wootton-Basset, containing 910 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, endowed with £1400 parliamentary grant. H. Long, Esq. was patron in 1815. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. Ralph Broome, in 1715, bequeathed £450, the income to be applied in teaching thirty children. In the vicinity is a farm-house, which occupies the site of Bradenstoke priory, founded, about 1142, by Walter de Evreux, on de Saresbiæ, for Augustine monks, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin.

LINESIDE, a township in the parish of ARTHURET, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (E.S.E.) from Longtown, containing 210 inhabitants. This township lies at the confluence of the Esk and Line rivers, and is intersected by the Hallburn rivulet.

LINFORD (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W.S.W.) from Newport-Pagnell, containing 408 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £20. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$. Lord Bagot and others were patrons in 1786. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew; the porch of the north door has a groined roof, with foliage in the centre. In 1702, Sir William Pritchard bequeathed a rent-charge of £24 in support of an almshouse for six poor persons, likewise another of £10 for the instruction of children. Lady Pritchard subsequently bequeathed a sum of money for apprenticing poor boys, and clothing the inmates of the almshouse. Dr. Richard Sandy, otherwise Napier, presented to this rectory in 1589, was held in superstitious reverence for his skill in the sciences of physic and astrology, and is said to have died in the posture of prayer, at a very advanced age.

LINFORD (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Newport-Pagnell, containing 73 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. The Rev. P. Knapp was patron in 1815. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, was formerly a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Newport-Pagnell: the inhabitants bury at Haversham.

LING, a parish in the hundred of ANDERSFIELD, though locally in that of Taunton and Taunton-Dean, county of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Bridgewater, containing, with part of the hamlet of Boroughbridge, 335 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £10. 8. 4. endowed with £600 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant. Hill Dawes, Esq. was patron in 1806. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. Between the hamlet of Boroughbridge, part of which is in this parish, and the parish church, is the isle of Athelney, an elevation whereon is Alfred's monument, having been the noted retreat of that Saxon monarch during one of the Danish invasions. Here, about 888, Alfred founded a Benedictine abbey, and dedicated it to Our Saviour and St. Peter, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, amounted to £209. 0. $3\frac{1}{4}$.: many architectural remains, bones, and other ancient relics, have been dug up on the site of the conventual buildings, which appear to have been both extensive and magnificent. The navigable river Parret runs on the north-east, and the Tone on the south-east, of the parish, over which latter river is a bridge.

LINGARTHS, a township in the parish of ALMONDBURY, upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Huddersfield, containing 809 inhabitants.

LINGEN, a parish in the hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 4 miles (E.N.E.) from Presteigne, containing 284 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Thomas Wynn. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

LINGFIELD, a parish in the first division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, county of SURREY, 6 miles (S.S.E.) from Godstone, containing 1684 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, endowed with £1000 parliamentary grant. Robert Ladbroke, Esq. was patron in 1819. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. Here is a place of worship for Baptists. A small sum is paid by the parish annually for the instruction of children. A collegiate church was founded here by Reginald, Lord Cobham, in the reign of Henry VI., and dedicated to St. Peter: at the dissolution the revenue was valued at £79. 15. 10.

LINGWOOD, a parish in the hundred of BLOFIELD, county of NORFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Acle, containing 292 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £1000 royal bounty. The Rev. E. Goddard was patron in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LINKENHOLT, a parish in the hundred of PASTROW, Kingsclere division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.E.) from Great Bedwin, containing 73 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £7. 0. 5. Mrs. Worgan was patroness in 1801. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LINKINHORNE, a parish in the northern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (N.W.) from Callington, containing 1080 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. Miss Hewish was patroness in 1780. The church is dedicated to St. Mellor. A free school for all the children of the parish was founded and endowed with the interest of £705, by Charles Roberts; two-thirds of this sum are paid to the schoolmaster, and the remainder to a schoolmistress. On Caernadon, or Car-raton, downs, in this parish, Charles I. drew up his forces, in 1644, the day after he had entered Cornwall, and here he was joined by Prince Maurice. Here are the remarkable rocks called the Cheese-wring and the Hurlers; as also Sharp Tor, from which is a very fine view.

LINLEY, a parish within the liberty of the borough of WENLOCK, county of SALOP, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Bridgenorth, containing 96 inhabitants. The living is a rectory not in charge, united to that of Broseley, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

LINMOUTH, a township in the parish of WOODHORN, eastern division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N.E.) from Morpeth, containing 22 inhabitants. This township derives its name from being situated near the river Line, at its confluence with the ocean: in 1822, a spermaceti whale, sixty one feet in length, and thirty-seven feet four inches in circumference, came on shore at the mouth of the river, and was harpooned; it produced nine tons and one hundred and fifty-eight gallons of oil, which was claimed by the Admiralty as a droit of the crown.

LINOP, a joint township with Ingram and Greenside-hill, in the parish of INGRAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.S.W.) from Wooler, containing, with Ingram and Greenside-hill, 74 inhabitants. In this township is Linop Spout, a cataract, the precipice of which is forty-eight feet, and the basin seven feet in diameter, and fifteen feet in depth; it has also the appellation of Roughting Linn. About three miles to the north-west are the Cardlaw cairns, some sepulchral monuments of the earliest inhabitants of the island. In the vicinity are foundations of an ancient British town, the area measuring two hundred and forty feet on the north side, and three hundred and two on the west. A British road passes near this place, in its course to Langley ford.

LINSHEELES, a township in the parish of HALLYSTONE, western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Rothbury, containing 97 inhabitants.

LINSLADE, a parish in the hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Leighton-Buzzard, containing 370 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of A. Corbett, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. In the thirteenth century this place was noted for the resort of pilgrims, and frequent processions, to a holy well here, until they were prohibited, in 1299, by Oliver Sutton, Bishop of Lincoln, who cited the vicar to appear in his court, for having encouraged these pilgrimages to his own emolument. A market on Thursday, and a fair, to be held for eight days at Lady-day, were granted, in 1251, to William de Beauchamp.

LINSTEAD, a parish in the hundred of TEYNHAM, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.E.) from Sittingbourne, containing 890 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. $11\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, has lately received an addition of one hundred and fifty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £15 towards defraying the expense. A fair for horses and cattle is held at Green-street, in this parish, on May 12th. Bartholomew Fowle, the last prior of St. Mary Overie, was a native of this place, and received from it the additional name of Linstead.

LINSTEAD (MAGNA), a parish in the hundred of BLYTHING, county of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Halesworth, containing 103 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Huntingfield. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LINSTEAD (PARVA, or LOWER), a parish in the hundred of BLYTHING, county of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Halesworth, containing 164 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Huntingfield. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

LINSTOCK, a township in that part of the parish of STANWIX which is in ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Carlisle, containing 231 inhabitants. Here was anciently a castle, which, till 1229, was the only palace of the bishops of Carlisle; about 1293, Bishop Halton entertained Johannes Romanus, Archbishop of York, in it, with a suite of three hundred persons, during his visitation; and, in 1307, Edward I. kept his court here for six days: this edifice was repaired and modernised in 1768; the ancient square tower is still remaining. A little north-eastward of Linstock is Drawdykes castle, originally built with the materials of the Roman wall, which crossed its site, and partially rebuilt in the seventeenth century, by John Aglionby, Esq., recorder of Carlisle, who placed on the battlements three Roman stone busts, which yet remain: this ancient seat is now used as a farm-house; the Drawdykes estate is toll-free of the city of Carlisle.

LINTHORP, a township in the parish of MIDDLESBOROUGH, western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Stockton upon Tees, containing 196 inhabitants.

LINTHWAITE, a chapelry in the parish of ALMONDBURY, upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (S.W. by W.) from Huddersfield, containing 2127 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Here is a considerable woollen manufacture.

LINTON, a market town and parish, in the hundred of CHILFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Cambridge, and 48 (N. by E.) from London, containing 1519 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the high road from Cambridge to Colchester, is very indifferently built; the streets are neither lighted nor paved, but the inhabitants are well supplied with water from springs. The market, granted in 1245, to William de Lay, is on Thursday; and there is a fair on July 30th, for sheep. A court leet is held occasionally by the lord of the manor. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has a fine embattled tower; in the interior are several monuments, especially one of marble, erected by Peter Standley, Esq., to the memory of his sister. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Independents. An Alien priory, subordinate to the abbey of St. Jacutus de Tusula in Brittany, was founded in the time of Henry III.; at the suppression, its revenue was valued at £23. 8. 10., and it was granted by Henry VI. to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. At Barham, in this parish, a priory of Crouched friars, a cell to the monastery of Welnetham in Suffolk, was established in the reign of Edward I.: the hall, chapel, and cloisters of the convent are still remaining, and form part of the mansion called Barham hall. Several Roman coins have been dug up in this parish.

LINTON, a township in the parish of CHURCH-GRESLEY, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Burton upon Trent, containing 241 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Linton is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

LINTON, a parish including the sea-port of Linmouth, in the hundred of SHERWILL, county of DEVON, 14 miles (E. by N.) from Ilfracombe, containing 632 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the most northerly point of the Devonshire coast, comprises two manors, the lords of which had the power of inflicting capital punishment in the time of Edward I. The village of Linton is situated on an eminence westward of an opening towards the Bristol channel, and is separated from the adjoining parish by the river Lyn, over which is a bridge of one arch. Within a short distance to the east, by the sea side, near the junction of the East and West Lyn rivers, is Linmouth, formerly a fishing town of some consequence, but now possessing only about a dozen fishing-boats. Turbot, soles, cod, herrings, and oysters, are still caught upon the coast, and shipped to Bristol and elsewhere: several sloops, of from fifty to one hundred tons, are employed in the coasting trade; limestone, coal, and culm, are the principal articles of importation; bark and grain the chief exports. Here is a small pier, erected by the lord of the manor, which has afforded shelter to vessels of two hundred tons' burden. Both at Linton and Linmouth there are numerous lodging-houses for the accommodation of visitors; and in the neighbourhood are some elegant private residences. Here is a plentiful supply of excellent water; and the river Lyn abounds with trout. The lord of the manor holds a court leet and baron at Linton, soon after Easter, when a portreeve, tythingman, and ale-taster are appointed.

The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Countisbury, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon. The church is dedicated to St. Mary; and the prospect from the churchyard, embracing the rocky coast, the Bristol channel, and the Welch mountains, is singularly grand and beautiful. There is a place of worship for Independents. The scenery in this parish is of an Alpine character, and comprises every variety of form and colouring; the views are extensive, being terminated in the distant horizon by the shores of South Wales. About a mile westward of Linton is the Valley of Rocks, presenting a forcible contrast to the general views: the bed of this valley is about three quarters of a mile in length, but not above one hundred yards in width. The acclivities on each side exhibit huge masses of fixed and detached rocks; and at the western extremity of the valley, which is terminated by a cove, or inlet, there is an isolated mass of great magnitude, somewhat in the form of a cone, partly intercepting the view of the channel. The chain of rocks forming the northern side of the valley fronts the sea, and along this stupendous declivity is a path on the same level with the bed of the valley, leading from its north-west extremity to the village of Linton.

LINTON, a hamlet in that part of the parish of CHURCHAM which is in the lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by N.) from Gloucester, containing, with Higham and Over, 252 inhabitants.

LINTON, a township in the parish of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (S. E.) from Bromyard, containing 565 inhabitants. A court leet was formerly held here, but has been discontinued for some time.

LINTON, a parish in the hundred of GREYTREE, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Ross, containing 630 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £8. 10., and in the patronage of the Representatives of J. Matthews, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A court leet is held once in three years.

LINTON, a parish in the hundred of MAIDSTONE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 4 miles (S.) from Maidstone, containing, with Crockhurst, 686 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Earl Cornwallis. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. In 1813, John Bowles bequeathed £200, the interest to be applied for the instruction of four children: the income is £10. 17. 11., which is paid to a schoolmistress, who instructs sixteen children in reading and sewing. This village is situated near the great range of hills which bounds the Weald on the north. About half a mile from it is Coxheath, an extensive plain, well watered and highly salubrious, on which have been several large encampments; in the year 1778 fifteen thousand men encamped on this heath.

LINTON, a hamlet in the parish of WINTRINGHAM, wapentake of BUCKROSE, East riding of the county of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from New Malton. The population is returned with the township of Wintringham.

LINTON, a township in the parish of SPOFFORTH, upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by S.) from Wetherby, containing 167 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LINTON, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Grassington, Hebden, Linton, and Threshfield, and containing 1910 inhabitants, of which number, 313 are in the township of Linton, 9 miles (N.) from Skipton. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, in medieties, each rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, contains two reading-desks, the duty being performed alternately by the two portionists, between whom the tithes of the parish are equally divided, each having also a parsonage-house. The free school was founded and endowed with a rent-charge by the Rev. Matthew Hewitt; £20 per annum is paid to the master, and £10 to the usher: there are four exhibitions, of £12 per annum each, to St. John's College, Cambridge, and the school is open to all applicants, for instruction in Latin and English grammar. In 1721, Richard Fountain devised a rent-charge to trustees, among other charitable purposes, for apprenticing four boys annually, and for the foundation and support of an almshouse for six poor persons, each of whom receive £10 annually: there are at present six poor widows.

LINTON (WEST), or LEVINGTON, a township in the parish of KIRK-LINTON, or KIRK-LEVINGTON, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (S.) from Longtown, containing 623 inhabitants.

LINTON upon OUZE, a township in the parish of NEWTON upon OUZE, wapentake of BULMER, North riding of the county of YORK, 9 miles (S.S.W.) from Easingwold, containing 268 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Roman Catholics; also a school with a small endowment.

LINTZ-GREEN, a township in the parish of CHESTER le STREET, middle division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 8 miles (S.W. by W.) from Gateshead, containing, with part of Tanfield colliery, 714 inhabitants.

LINWOOD, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Market-Rasen, containing 138 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £16. 4. 2., and in the patronage of A. Wallis, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Cornelius.

LINWOOD, an extra-parochial liberty, in the northern division of the hundred of NEW FOREST, New Forest (East) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON. The population is returned with Godshill and Wood Green.

LIPHOOK, a hamlet in the parish of BRAMSHOTT, hundred of ALTON, Alton (North) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4½ miles (W.) from Haslemere. The population is returned with the parish.

LIPWOOD, a township in the parish of WARDEN, north-western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 7¾ miles (W.) from Hexham, containing 526 inhabitants. Grindon Lake, is situated in this township.

LISCARD, a township in the parish of WALLAZEY, lower division of the hundred of WIRRALL, county palatine of CHESTER, 12 miles (N. by E.) from Great Neston, containing 345 inhabitants.

LISCOMBE, a hamlet in the parish of SOULBURY, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Leighton-Buzzard. The population is returned with the parish.

LISKEARD, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in West hundred, county of CORNWALL, 18 miles (S.S.W.) from Launceston, and 225 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 3519 inhabitants, of which number, 2423 are in the borough. The ancient name of this place was Lis Kerrett, derived probably from two

Seal and Arms.

Cornish words signifying "a fortified place." It was formerly amongst the possessions of the Earls of Cornwall, and was, by act of parliament, annexed to the duchy, in the reign of Edward III.: the castle was occasionally the residence of Richard, Earl of Cornwall, King of the Romans. In 1643, during the civil war, a battle was fought near this place, between the royalists, under Sir Ralph Hopton, and the parliamentary forces, in which the latter were defeated, and the royalist army marched into Liskeard the same night. The king, on his entrance into Cornwall in 1644, halted here on the 2nd of August, and remained in the town until the 7th. Liskeard is one of the most ancient and considerable towns in the county: part of the town, which is irregularly built, is situated on rocky eminences, and the rest in a plain below: the streets are well paved, but not lighted; the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water; and the air is considered very salubrious. The river Looe runs through the parish. The tanning of leather is carried on to a limited extent: considerable facility for water carriage has been afforded by the canal from Liskeard to Looe, a distance of six miles, which has been recently completed, and terminates about one mile west of the town, where there is a paper-mill. This is one of the four coinage or stannary towns; but no coinage had taken place for some time, till within the last two years, when it was revived. A handsome market-house for poultry, fish, and vegetables, was erected, in 1822, at the expense of the corporation: the butchers' shambles are beneath the town-hall. The market, on Saturday, is abundantly supplied with provisions of all kinds, a great part of which is purchased for the market at Devonport: there are likewise great annual markets, on Shrove-Tuesday, the day after Palm-Sunday, and the Monday after St. Nicholas' day. Large cattle fairs are held on Holy Thursday, Aug. 15th, Sep. 21st, and Oct. 2nd. Liskeard was made a free borough, in 1240, by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, who conferred on the burgesses similar privileges to those enjoyed by the burgesses of Launceston and Helston; the date of the original charter of incorporation is unknown. By the existing confirmatory charter of Elizabeth, granted in 1580, the corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, eight capital burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen, with four constables, two serjeants at mace, and other officers: the mayor is annually chosen from among the capital burgesses, by the freemen, and the freemen and burgesses fill up vacancies in their respective bodies. The mayor and recorder are justices of the peace within the borough, the county magistrates having occasionally concurrent jurisdiction. Sessions are held within a month of Easter, and on the first Tuesday after the 18th of Oct.; also a court of pleas, every three weeks, for the recovery of debts to any amount, at which the mayor and capital burgesses, assisted by the recorder, preside. Petty sessions for the east division of the hundred of West are also held, on the first Tuesday in every month. This borough first sent representatives to parliament in the 23d of Edward I.: the right of election is vested in the mayor, capital burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen chosen by them, at present amounting to forty-four: the mayor is the returning officer: the influence of the Earl of St. Germans is predominant. The town-hall, which is supported by granite columns, was erected, about 1707, at the expense of — Dolben, Esq., one of the representatives of the borough.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £18. 13. 11½. The Rev. Dr. Gwynne was patron in 1821. The church, which is dedicated to St. Martin, stands on an eminence at the eastern entrance into the town: it is spacious and handsome, being built of fine large slate stone, and has a low embattled tower, which was erected in 1627: a tenement, called Lanseaton, now let at £50 per annum, is vested in the churchwardens for the repairs of the church. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A grammar school is supported by the Earl of St. Germans, who allows a salary of £100 per annum to the master. A free school for poor children, in which ten girls are now taught, was founded by the trustees of a donation by the Rev. St. John Eliot, who died in 1760, and endowed by them with £5 per annum: a school for one hundred boys was opened about fifteen years ago, on Dr. Bell's plan; and another for fifty girls, both supported by subscription. In 1714, John Buller gave £18 per annum, for teaching and clothing poor boys; and there are other small benefactions for teaching children. There are some vestiges of the ancient castle; and a great part of the conventual buildings belonging to the nunnery of Poor Clares, founded here, and endowed by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, yet remain: it is called "The Great Place," and has been converted into dwelling-houses; the chapel is now a bakehouse. About the year 1400, here was an hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

LISSETT, a chapelry in the parish of BEEFORD, northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 7½ miles (S. S. W.) from Bridlington, containing 95 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. James.

LISSINGTON, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4¼ miles (S.) from Market-Rasen, containing 183 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £12. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of York. The church, which is dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has some portions in Norman, and others in the early style of English, architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LISTON, a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, 2¾ miles (N. N. W.) from Sudbury, containing 73 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, within the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £12. W. H. Campbell, Esq. was patron in 1800. The church is in the later style of English architecture.

LITCHAM, a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of LAUNDITCH, county of NORFOLK, 7¼ miles (N. E. by N.) from Swaffham, containing 586 inhabitants. The market has been discontinued; but a fair for toys is held November 1st. The county magistrates hold a session here once in six weeks; and a court leet is held annually in October, by the lord of the manor. The living is a discharged rectory, with which that of East Lexham was united in 1742, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 2. 6., and in the patronage of Lord Wodehouse. The church is an ancient structure, dedicated to St. Andrew, and built of flint and stone: at the west end is a square embattled tower of brick, with freestone quoins; and there is an ancient carved oak screen. A National school is supported by subscription. An hospital, founded and endowed by Mr. John Halcot, comprises tenements for two poor persons, who receive a small weekly allowance, chargeable on land in the adjoining parish of Beeston. Here was anciently an hermitage, which has been converted into a farmhouse.

LITCHBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of FAWSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 5½ miles (N. W.) from Towcester, containing 393 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £16. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Rev. W. A. Taylor. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. A schoolmaster receives £25 per annum from Lady Katherine Leveson's charity, for educating all the poor children of the parish that are sent to him. Litchborough was one of the four British garrisoned towns taken by the Saxons in 571.

LITCHFIELD, a parish in the hundred of KINGSCLERE, Kingsclere division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (N.) from Whitchurch, containing 85 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £12. 19. 7. Sir R. Kingsmill, Bart. was patron in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. James.

LITCHURCH, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ST. PETER, DERBY, which is in the hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, 1½ mile (S. E.) from Derby, containing 93 inhabitants.

LITHERLAND, a township in the parish of SEPH-TON, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 4¾ miles (N. by W.) from Liverpool, containing 501 inhabitants.

LITHEWELL, or LUDWELL, a chapelry in the parish of DAWLISH, hundred of EXMINSTER, county of DEVON, ¾ of a mile (S. by W.) from Chudleigh. The chapel is in ruins.

LITTLEBOROUGH, a chapelry in that part of the parish of ROCHDALE which is in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3¾ miles (N. E. by E.) from Rochdale, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £1300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Rochdale. The chapel, dedicated to St. James, was licensed for mass by the abbey and convent of Whalley, in 1476: it was rebuilt about 1815, in the early style of English architecture, and has received an addition of four hundred and one sittings, of which three hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £300 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Here was a small Roman station, and several antiquities have been found in the vicinity: the Roman road from Manchester to York skirts the village.

LITTLEBOROUGH, a parish in the North-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from East Retford, containing 64 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, endowed with £1200 royal bounty. J. Hewett, Esq. was patron in 1820. Here was the Roman station Segelocum, or Agelocum; and numerous Roman remains have been found. The river Trent is here crossed by a ferry, which has existed ever since the Roman era in Britain.

LITTLEBOURN, a parish in the hundred of DOWNHAMFORD, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Canterbury, containing 698 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Vincent. A fair is held on the 5th of July. A branch of the river Stour, on which are two corn-mills, passes by the village.

LITTLEBURY, a parish in the hundred of UTTLESFORD, county of ESSEX, 2 miles (W.N.W.) from Saffron-Walden, containing 766 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £10. 2. 1., and in the patronage of the Rector: the rectory is a sinecure, rated in the king's books at £26. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church, which is dedicated to the Holy Trinity, stands within the area of an ancient encampment. On Chapel green was formerly a chapel of ease. In 1585, Dame Jane Bradbury bequeathed land and houses for the instruction of all children born in the parish.

LITTLECOT, a chapelry in the parish of CHILTON-FOLIATT, hundred of KINWARDSTONE, county of WILTS, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Hungerford. The population is returned with the parish. A curious tessellated pavement, the largest ever found in England, was discovered in Littlecot park, in 1730, but, unfortunately, soon destroyed: it was forty-one feet by twenty-eight in dimensions, and is supposed to have been the floor of a temple, from the two parts, the Templum and the Sacrarium, into which it was divisible. It was decorated with various devices: in the centre was a figure of Apollo with his harp, surrounded by four female figures, to represent the four seasons, with appropriate accompaniments: an accurate drawing was made of it by Mr. William George, steward to Edward Popham, Esq., who discovered it; and his widow worked a beautiful carpet, on a reduced scale, from which it was finally engraved, at the expense of the Antiquarian Society. Pickedfield, formerly part of Littlecot domain, was purchased by government, in 1803, for the purpose of establishing a dépôt for the interior of the county: it includes about forty acres of ground, on which were erected three magazines, capable of containing near eleven thousand barrels of gunpowder; also a mixing-house for the powder, storehouses, apartments for the labourers employed upon the establishment, barracks for a military detachment, and houses for a store-keeper and clerk of the cheque. At Knyghton, a small hamlet on the north bank of the Kennet, near Littlecot park, is an ancient encampment.

LITTLECOTE, a hamlet in the parish of STEWKLEY, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Winslow. The chapel, now in ruins, was a chapel of ease to Stewkley.

LITTLEDALE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LANCASTER, which is in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Lancaster, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Lancaster. The chapel was consecrated in 1755, and dedicated to St. Anne under Caton.

LITTLEHAM, a parish in the hundred of EAST BUDLEIGH, county of DEVON, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Exmouth, containing, with the chapelry of Exmouth, 2841 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 12. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £300 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In 1717, Henry Peardon gave £80, the interest to be applied in the instruction of poor children; two small additions have since been made to this endowment by Sir John Elwill, Bart. and Henry Peardon.

LITTLEHAM, a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, 2 miles (S.S.W.) from Bideford, containing 367 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £14. 16. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. G. Anthony and P. Tapp, Esqrs. were patrons in 1828. The church is dedicated to St. Swithin.

LITTLEMOOR, a liberty in the parish of ST. MARY the VIRGIN, partly within the liberties of the CITY OF OXFORD, and partly in the hundred of BULLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Oxford, containing 354 inhabitants. Here was formerly a chapel, now in ruins. A priory of Benedictine nuns, founded here about the reign of Henry II., and dedicated to St. Mary and St. Nicholas, was suppressed by the papal bull given to Cardinal Wolsey, in 1524, and subsequently became part of the endowment of King's College, Oxford, until the time of the general dissolution: at its suppression the revenue was valued at £33. 6. 8.

LITTLE-OVER, a chapelry in the parish of MICKLE-OVER, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, 2 miles (S.W. by S.) from Derby, containing 379 inhabitants.

LITTLEPORT, a parish in the hundred and Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Ely, containing 2364 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Ely, rated in the king's books at £8. The church is dedicated to St. George. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LITTLETHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of COSBY, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, county of LEICESTER, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Leicester. The population is returned with the parish.

LITTLETON, a township in the parish of CHRISTLETON, lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Chester, containing 43 inhabitants.

LITTLETON, partly in the parish of BLANDFORD, ST. MARY, and partly in that of LANGTON, county of DORSET, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. E. by S.) from Blandford-Forum, once an independent parish, now only a single house and farm. The living was a rectory, not rated in the king's books: the last rector was inducted Jan. 10, 1427.

LITTLETON, a parish in the hundred of SPELTORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Staines, containing 149 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of Thomas Wood, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. A free school is endowed with the interest of £355. 1. 2. stock, in the South Sea annuities, the amount of several benefactions; and the schoolmistress receives £20 per annum, for which all children who apply are instructed in reading, writing, arithmetic, and needle-work.

LITTLETON, a parish in the hundred of BUDDLEGATE, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Winchester, containing 108 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the incumbent, endowed with £800 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. Littleton is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

LITTLETON, a chapelry in the parish of STEEPLE-ASHTON, hundred of WHORWELSDOWN, county of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Trowbridge, containing 68 inhabitants. This place is sometimes, although improperly, called Little Hinton.

LITTLETON (HIGH), a parish in the hundred of CHEWTON, county of SOMERSET, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Bath, containing, with Hallabrow, 864 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £7. 7. $8\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant. Mr. W. B. Barter and Mrs. Barter were patrons in 1804. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, has been enlarged with one hundred and forty-four additional sittings, of which ninety are free, the Incorporated Society for enlarging churches and chapels having contributed £80 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The substratum of the soil of this and the neighbouring parishes is coal, which is worked to a considerable extent.

LITTLETON (MIDDLE), a township in the parish of NORTH LITTLETON, upper division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Evesham. The population is returned with the parish.

LITTLETON (NORTH), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, 5 miles (N. E.) from Evesham, containing, with the township of Middle Littleton, 342 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to that of South Littleton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 9. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

LITTLETON upon SEVERN, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LANGLEY, and SWINEHEAD, county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (W.) from Thornbury, containing 133 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £11. 4. $9\frac{1}{2}$.. Sir H. C. Lippincott, Bart. was patron in 1810. The navigable river Severn runs on the western side of this parish.

LITTLETON (SOUTH), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of BLAKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Evesham, containing 204 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of North Littleton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £4. 1. $10\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Nicholas.

LITTLETON (WEST), a chapelry in the parish of TORMARTON, lower division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S ASH, county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Marshfield, containing 109 inhabitants.

LITTLETON-DREW, a parish in the hundred of CHIPPENHAM, county of WILTS, 8 miles (N. W.) from Chippenham, containing 155 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 6. 9., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Near this village is a large barrow, with three stones of a fallen cromlech upon it, of large dimensions.

LITTLETON-PANNELL, a tything in the parish of WEST LAVINGTON, hundred of POTTERNE and CANNINGS, county of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W.) from East Lavington, containing 497 inhabitants. This village was anciently the lordship of the Paganells, one of whom obtained for it the privilege of a market, in the reign of Edward II.

LITTLEWORTH, an extra-parochial liberty, in the middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, and adjacent to the city of Gloucester, containing 237 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LITTLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Royston, containing 505 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £5. 13. 7., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Clare Hall, Cambridge. The church, which is dedicated to St. Catherine, is principally in the early, with some insertions in the later style of English architecture. A Roman cemetery has been discovered in this parish, whence many cinerary urns and other ancient vessels have been obtained: several Saxon coins, principally of the reign of Burghred, have also been found.

LITTLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of LONG-BRIDGE, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Sleaford, containing 133 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £12. 13. 6., and in the patronage of F. F. F. Beane, Esq. This parish is bounded on the west by Cuckmere river, the village being seated on its eastern bank.

LITTON, a hamlet in the parish of TIDSWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (E. S. E.) from Tidswell, containing 710 inhabitants. The celebrated non-conformist divine, William Bagshaw, commonly called the Apostle of the Peak, was born here in 1628.

LITTON, a parish in the hundred of WELLS-FORUM, county of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Wells, containing 378 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £8. 12. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Litton in the Cathedral Church of Wells. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LITTON, a township in that part of the parish of ARNCLIFFE which is in the western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWGROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 11 miles (N. E.) from Settle, containing 102 inhabitants.

LITTON-CHENEY, a parish in the hundred of UGGSCOMBE, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Bridport, containing 424 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £33. 7. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. James Cox, D. D. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, is in the later style of English architecture, and has a fine tower with battlements and pinnacles. In 1690, Robert Thorner bequeathed £25 per annum for the maintenance of a free school, and part of £75 per annum for apprenticing poor children of the parish of Litton, the towns of Dorchester and Southampton, and the city of Salisbury. In 1771, Thomas Hollis added £5 per annum for a schoolmaster's residence.

LIVEDEN, county of NORTHAMPTON.—See ALD-WINKLE (ST. PETER'S).

LIVERMERE (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of THEDWESTRY, county of SUFFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Bury-St. Edmund's, containing 251 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with which that of Little Livermere is united, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £15. 8. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of N. L. Acton, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LIVERMERE (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of BLACKBOURN, county of SUFFOLK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Bury-St. Edmund's containing 187 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Great Livermere, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 11. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LIVERPOOL, an eminent sea-port, borough, and market town, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of West Derby, county palatine of LANCASTER, 53 miles (S. by W.) from Lancaster, and 205 (N. W. by N.) from London, containing 118,972 inhabitants, according to the census of 1821, since which period the population is computed to have increased to upwards of 140,000. This town, which within the last century has, by a progressive increase in extent, population, and commercial importance, obtained the first rank after the metropolis, is supposed to be noticed in Domesday-book under the name Esmedune, or Smedune. In other ancient records its various appellations are, Litherpul, Lyrpul, &c., signifying probably, in the ancient dialect of the county, the lower pool; though some have deduced its etymology from a pool frequented by an aquatic fowl, called a "Liver," or from a sea-weed of that name; and others from its having belonged to a family of the name of Lever, whose antiquity is not sufficiently established to justify that conclusion. Soon after the Conquest, William granted all that part of the county which was situated between the rivers Mersey and Ribble to Roger of Poictiers, who, according to Camden, built a castle here, about the year 1089; to which circumstance may probably be attributed the origin of the town. The castle, which consisted of six circular towers, connected by embattled walls, and surrounded by a moat, commanded the harbour, and continued till the close of the parliamentary war, when it was demolished by order of the parliament. The remains were subsequently granted by Queen Anne to the corporation, but were finally removed in 1715, and the church of St. George was erected on the site. For a considerable length of time after the Conquest, Liverpool was but a small fishing-town; till, in 1172, its favourable situation, and the convenience of its port, attracted the notice of Henry II., who made it the place of rendezvous and embarkation of his troops for the conquest of Ireland; and in the following year is stated to have granted the inhabitants a charter, but this is doubtful, as such charter cannot be found among the records in the Tower: the first charter was probably granted by King John, although two charters of Henry I. are mentioned in the corporation records. It now became the chief station for the embarkation of troops, and for the exportation of military stores, for the service of Ireland; and the consequent intercourse which was here maintained between the two countries appears to have laid the foundation of its subsequent commercial importance. Henry III., in 1229, confirmed the preceding charter, made the town a free borough, instituted a guild merchant, and granted additional privileges. By these charters, and the advantage of its local situation, it began to improve its resources, and in a short time had established a considerable trade with Ireland, and with several parts of the coast. An old tower, which formerly stood in Water-street, appears to have been built by a descendant of Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, third son of

Arms.

Henry III., who, in the reign of Edward III., was created Duke of Lancaster, and, being ordered by that monarch to keep a strict guard on the coast of Lancashire, was permitted to embattle his house, which subsequently became the occasional residence of the Stanleys, Earls of Derby: after having been converted successively into a suite of assembly-rooms and a prison, it was taken down in 1819, and warehouses were erected on its site. Little is known of the state of the town from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century: Leland describes it as a paved town, which, as a good haven, was much frequented by Irish merchants, and as supplying Manchester with yarn imported from Ireland. From this time till the reign of Elizabeth it appears to have declined, but from what cause cannot be ascertained; in 1571, the inhabitants petitioned the queen to be relieved from a subsidy imposed on them, and in their petition described it as "Her Majesty's poor decayed town of Liverpool." In 1630, when writs were issued by Charles I., for the levying of ship-money, the town was rated only at £26, while Bristol was rated at £1000.

The early history of Liverpool is not distinguished by any important events. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the town was defended for the parliamentarians by Colonel Moore, against Prince Rupert, by whom it was besieged, and to whom, after an obstinate resistance, it was surrendered, June 26th, 1644, but was soon after retaken by the parliament. In the reign of William III., that monarch embarked with all his train at this port for Ireland, previously to the battle of the Boyne. During the rebellion in 1745, Liverpool raised several regiments to oppose the Pretender; and within twelve months after the war with France broke out, in 1778, one hundred and twenty privateers, carrying in the aggregate one thousand nine hundred and eighty-six guns, and eight thousand seven hundred and fifty-four seamen, were equipped here. The most important feature in the history of this place, is the extraordinary rapidity with which it has risen into a degree of splendour and importance without example in the history of any commercial country: among the causes which have produced its elevation to a rank but partially inferior to that of the metropolis are, its situation on the shore of a noble river, which expands into a wide æstuary; its proximity to the Irish coast; its central position with respect to the united kingdom; its intimate connexion with the principal manufacturing districts, and with every part of the kingdom, by numerous rivers, canals, and rail-roads; and the persevering industry and enterprising spirit of its inhabitants. The port is, by some, considered to have been anciently a member of the port of Chester, although it is not described as such in any of the charters either of Chester or Liverpool: it was assuredly, as is evident from records belonging to the corporation, an independent port so early as the year 1335. In the sixteenth century an attempt was made to prove it a creek within the limits of the port of Chester, which, however, was set aside by an order from the Board of Customs in London. The commerce of the port may be divided into three distinct branches: of these, the first and most important is its trade with Ireland, which appears to have been established, or greatly promoted, by the settlement here of several mercantile families from that country, about the middle of the sixteenth century, at which time there were only fifteen vessels, of the aggregate burden of two hundred and fifty-nine tons, belonging to the port. The principal imports are, linen, cattle, and provisions of every kind: in the year ending June, 1829, forty-nine thousand six hundred and seventy-four head of cattle, six thousand seven hundred and eighty-six calves, one hundred and twenty-five thousand one hundred and ninety-seven sheep, and one hundred and fifty-five thousand three hundred and nineteen pigs, were imported from Ireland. The principal exports are, British manufactured goods, salt, coal, and general merchandise: the quantity of rock and white salt brought to this port, in 1829, from the mines in Cheshire, by the river Weaver, was three hundred and ninety thousand tons, of which sixty thousand were shipped to Ireland. The number of vessels which entered inwards from Ireland, in the year 1829, was two thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, and of those which cleared outwards for that port, two thousand one hundred and twenty-four.

The second principal branch of the trade of this port is that with the United States of America, of which it engrosses more than three-fourths of the whole commerce of the kingdom: of this, the chief article is cotton wool, which may be considered as forming the staple trade of the town; and from this port, Manchester and the cotton manufacturing districts are supplied with the raw material: the sales of cotton, which upon an average exceed fourteen thousand bales per week, are negotiated by brokers, of whom there is a considerable number. This branch of commerce is subject to considerable fluctuation; but, from returns made to parliament, it appears that the quantity of cotton imported into Liverpool from all parts of the world, of which by far the greater portion was from the United States, is nearly nine times as much as is imported into London, and more than six times the aggregate quantity brought to all the ports in the kingdom, London included. The number of bales imported into England, in 1791, was sixty-eight thousand four hundred and four; in 1823, five hundred and eighty thousand two hundred and fifty-five; and in 1829, seven hundred and forty-one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, of which last, six hundred and forty-one thousand three hundred and seventy-three bales were imported into Liverpool alone. In 1764, one hundred and eighty-eight vessels entered inwards, and one hundred and forty-one cleared outwards, in the trade with North America, which has greatly increased since the termination of the war in 1783: in 1829, about eight hundred vessels entered inwards, and eight hundred and sixty-four cleared outwards, at this port, which enjoys great facility and frequency of intercourse with the principal sea-ports of the United States, by regular lines of packets, of which those for New York sail on the 1st, 8th, 16th, and 24th, of the month: on this line are sixteen fine vessels, elegantly fitted up with every accommodation for passengers, and which perform the voyage generally in twenty-three days and a half, though occasionally it has been done in fifteen days. The union line of packets, also to New York, sail on the 5th and 20th of the month. The Philadelphia packets sail from Liverpool on the 8th and 21st of the month; and those for Boston sail always monthly, and sometimes twice in the month.

The next in importance is the trade which Liverpool carries on with the West Indies, which had its commencement about the middle of the seventeenth century, and which was previously shared between London and Bristol; Liverpool, however, has successfully rivalled the latter of these ports, and secured to itself a very considerable portion of the trade: the quantity of British plantation sugar imported in 1829, was forty-three thousand seven hundred hogsheads and tierces; of rum, eleven thousand six hundred and fifty puncheons; of tobacco, four thousand nine hundred and sixty-four hogsheads; and of coffee, including also that brought from the East Indies and the Brazils, eight thousand and eighty casks, and five thousand two hundred barrels and bags. Liverpool was extensively concerned in the slave trade, in which, previously to its abolition, nearly one-fourth part of the vessels belonging to the port was employed. In 1829, thirty-six vessels entered inwards from the ports of Africa, and fifty-seven cleared outwards. In the same year, the number of vessels which entered inwards from the West Indies was one hundred and ninety-five, and of those which cleared outwards, two hundred and thirty-two. In 1814 this port was, by an order in council dated December 17th, declared a fit and proper depôt for the custody of goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from every port and place within the limits of the East India Company's Charter, and in 1819 thirty-eight vessels entered inwards from the East Indies; but this branch of its trade has since declined, probably from the decreased value of East Indian produce, as the number of vessels that entered from the East Indies, in 1829, was thirty-three, and of those that cleared outwards, thirty-five: the principal imports are, cotton, indigo, hides, ginger, pepper, and sugar. Liverpool carries on also a considerable trade with the principal ports in the Mediterranean and Levant seas, from which it imports wine, fruits, lemon and lime juice, olive and other oils, barilla, and brimstone; and from these ports one hundred and seventy vessels entered inwards, and one hundred and ninety cleared outwards, in 1829. Cotton was first imported here from Egypt in 1823, and twenty-two thousand four hundred and fifty-six bales were landed in 1829. The trade in ashes, tallow, and timber, has of late considerably increased; seventeen thousand four hundred casks of tallow were imported in 1829, when the number of ships entered inwards from the Baltic was ninety-five, and the number cleared outwards, one hundred and seventy. Considerable trade is also carried on in timber with the British Colonies in North America, from which, in 1829, two hundred and sixty-six cargoes, of the aggregate value of £256,422, were imported; and ninety-five cargoes, valued at £94,564, were also imported from the Baltic. A limited intercourse is maintained with New South Wales and South Shetland; and in that with the Isle of Man, the imports from which are grain, herrings, and wool, one hundred and thirty vessels are employed. The coasting-trade is very important; the number of arrivals in 1829 was not less than four thousand two hundred and fifty. The fisheries do not appear ever to have been very extensive; in 1764, three ships were engaged in the Greenland whale fishery, which number had increased, in 1788, to twenty-one, but from that time the trade began to decline, and has now ceased to exist, and the home fishery has diminished materially. The exports are principally the manufactured articles of the neighbouring districts.

In 1829, one thousand four hundred and eighty-five British, and eight hundred and ten foreign, vessels engaged in foreign trade entered inwards; and one thousand seven hundred British, and nine hundred foreign, vessels cleared outwards; and, including coasting vessels, the whole number which entered the port, in the year ending the 24th of June, 1830, was eleven thousand two hundred and fourteen, of which, the aggregate burden was one million four hundred and eleven thousand nine hundred and sixty-four tons, and the amount of duties paid at the custom-house was £3,123,758. 8. 10., and £166,550. 11. 11., at the dock office. The number of vessels belonging to the port, in 1828, was seven hundred and fifty-nine, averaging a burden of one hundred and ninety-nine tons each. In addition to the regular packets for America there are packets for Rio Janeiro, Naples, Genoa, Leghorn, Smyrna, Constantinople, Lisbon, and Oporto. There are thirty-six steam-packets established between this port and Ireland, two to the Isle of Man, seven to Scotland, six to Wales, one to Carlisle, one to Whitehaven, one to Lancaster: besides which there are sixteen to the different ferries on the Mersey.

The harbour is capacious and secure: at the entrance of the river is the Black Rock lighthouse, erected on a point of rock on the western coast, which is covered at quarter flood, the water at high spring tides rising twenty feet above the surface of the rock: this lighthouse was built at the expense of the corporation, from a design by Mr. John Foster: it is seventy-five feet high from its foundation to the lantern, and thirty-five feet in diameter immediately below the base, and fifteen and a half at the cornice: the lower part, to the height of twenty-eight feet and a half, is solid, from which a spiral staircase leads to the store-room and the apartments of the three keepers; above these is the lantern, at a medium height of sixty feet above the level of the sea, in which is a light of thirty argand lamps, with reflectors, in a triangular frame, revolving once in three minutes, and presenting, successively, two lights of a natural colour, and one of brilliant red, which attain their full lustre every successive minute; and in hazy weather a bell is constantly ringing to prevent accidents: this building, which is of limestone brought from Beaumaris, was completed, and the light first exhibited, on the 1st of March, 1830. A floating light has also been placed eleven miles seaward from the mouth of the river, by the trustees of the docks; and pilot boats stationed there are constantly on the look out. A telegraph has been established, by means of which communications have been interchanged between this town and Holyhead in the short space of three minutes; the signal stations extend along the coast, at intervals of eight miles distance from each other. The limits of the port (as fixed by the commissioners appointed under a commission issued in the 10th of George I., in their certificate to the Exchequer, dated November 28th, 1723,) extend "from the Red Stones in Hollyake, at the point of Wirrall, southerly to the foot of the river called Ribble water, in a direct line northerly, and so upon the south side of the said river to Hesketh bank easterly, and to the rivers Asland and Douglas there, and so all along the sea-coasts of Meols and Formby, unto the river Mersey, and all over the rivers Mersey, Irwell, and Weaver."

For the security of the shipping in the port, and for the greater facility of loading and unloading merchandise, an immense range of docks and warehouses, extending nearly two miles along the eastern bank of the river, has been constructed, on a scale of unparalleled magnificence; and forming one of those characteristics of commercial greatness in which this town is unrivalled. The docks are of three kinds, the wet docks, the dry docks, and the graving docks: the wet docks are chiefly for ships of great burden, employed in the foreign trade, and which float in them at all states of the tide, the water being retained by gates: the dry docks, so called because they are left dry when the tide is out, are chiefly appropriated to coasting vessels; and the graving docks, which admit or exclude the water at pleasure, are adapted to the repair of ships, during which they are kept dry, and when completed are floated out by admitting the tide. The Old dock, which was the first of the kind constructed in England, and for making which an act of parliament was obtained in 1708, is not now in use, its site having been appropriated to the erection of a new custom-house, and other offices connected with the trade of the port. The Dry dock, which is about to be converted into a wet dock, was constructed under the authority of an act passed in the 11th of George II., and is chiefly occupied by sloops from the North coast, which import corn, provisions, and slate, and convey back the produce of the West Indies, the Mediterranean, Portugal, and the Baltic: it has a quay five hundred yards in length, and has communication with three graving docks: it has been considerably enlarged, and many of the buildings surrounding it have been taken down, with the view of obtaining more quay room. The Salt-house dock, so named from some salt works formerly contiguous to it, was constructed about the same time as the Dry dock; the upper part of it is chiefly for ships that are laid up, and the lower part for vessels in the Levant, Irish, and coasting trades: the quay is seven hundred and fifty-nine yards in extent, and is provided with convenient warehouses, with arcades for foot passengers on the east side, and extensive sheds on the west side: between this dock and the river are some ship-builders' yards, which the corporation intend to convert into docks for the craft employed in the inland trade. George's dock was constructed, in the 2d of George III., at an expense of £21,000: it was originally two hundred and forty-six yards in length, and one hundred yards in breadth, with a quay of seven hundred yards in extent; but it has been enlarged, and the quay is now one thousand and one yards in length: on the east side is a range of extensive warehouses, in front of which is an arcade for foot passengers; and on the west side are sheds for protecting the merchandise from the weather: at the north and south ends of the dock are handsome cast-iron bridges; and a parade is continued westward for a considerable distance into the river: this dock has a communication with the two preceding docks, and also with the Prince's dock, by basins, which preclude the necessity of returning into the river. The King's dock, constructed in the 25th of George III., is two hundred and seventy yards in length, and ninety-six in breadth, and is appropriated to vessels from Virginia and other parts, laden with tobacco, which article is exclusively landed here: the new tobacco warehouses extend the whole length of the quay, on the west side, and are five hundred and seventy-five feet in length, and two hundred and thirty-nine in depth; the old warehouses, on the opposite side, which were appropriated to that purpose, have been converted into sheds for the security of merchandise: ships from the Baltic, freighted with timber and naval stores, discharge their cargoes on the quay, across the entrance is a handsome swivel bridge of cast-iron: this dock has a communication on the south with a dry dock and two graving docks. The Queen's dock, constructed at the same time, is four hundred and seventy yards long, and two hundred and twenty-seven and a half in breadth, with a spacious quay, and is chiefly occupied by vessels freighted with timber, and by those employed in the Dutch and Baltic trades: at the south end it communicates with a basin of considerable extent, called the Brunswick half-tide dock, which is also connected with the Brunswick dry basin: on the south of the half-tide dock, a new dock of larger dimensions than any of the preceding, for vessels laden with timber, is in progress, to be called the Brunswick dock, with a basin to the south of it, and patent slips for the repairing of vessels, which will probably terminate the range of docks at the southern extremity. The Prince's dock, constructed under an act passed in the 51st of George III., was opened with great pomp on the day of the coronation of His late Majesty George IV.: it is five hundred yards in length, and one hundred and six in breadth: at the north end is a spacious basin belonging to it, and at the south end it communicates with the basin of George's dock: at the north end is a handsome dwelling-house for the dock-master, with suitable offices; and at the south end is a house, in which the master of George's dock at present resides: the quays are spacious, and there are sheds for the protection of goods from the weather: along the west side, near the river, is a beautiful marine parade, seven hundred and fifty yards long, and eleven wide, defended by a stone parapet wall, from which is a delightful view of the river and the shipping: it is much frequented as a promenade, and at convenient intervals are three flights of steps leading down to the river, where boats are in constant attendance. To the north of the basin belonging to this dock, four spacious wet docks, and a large graving dock, which latter is to be fitted up with patent slips, are at present in a state of rapid progress; and, when completed, will probably terminate the range of docks on the north side of the town. The Duke's dock, between Salthouse and the King's docks, is a small dock belonging to the trustees of the late Duke of Bridgewater, for the use of his flats, with commodious warehouses. The several carriers by water have also convenient basins on the river, for the use of their barges, with quays for loading and unloading their goods; and the Mersey and Irwell Navigation Company have a small dock, called the Manchester dock, for the flats employed in that extensive trade, and for the transport to this town of the productions of Cheshire and the adjoining counties. The whole range of the docks, when the northern and southern additions are completed, will be two miles and eight hundred and twenty yards in length; and spacious as they are, they are still considered inadequate to the increasing commerce of the port, and measures are in contemplation for their further extension. The sums expended in the formation of these docks amount to more than two millions and a half sterling: for clearing them from the accumulation of silt brought in by the tide, a dredging machine, worked by a steam-engine of ten-horse power, is in constant operation, by which fifty tons per hour are raised into barges, and deposited where it may be washed away by the current of the river. The internal management of each dock is entrusted to a master resident on the spot, and the government of the whole establishment is vested, by an act of parliament obtained in 1825, in a committee of twenty-one members, including a chairman and deputy chairman, who meet at least once every week, and oftener, when circumstances require it: the committee consists of thirteen trustees nominated by the common council, and eight merchants, or ship-owners, chosen by the payers of rates or dues to the amount of £10, within one year prior to the election, and who are resident within eight miles of Liverpool.

The new custom-house, which is now being erected on the site of the Old dock, at the joint expense of government and the corporation, and under the superintendence of Mr. John Foster, will be a superb and beautiful edifice in the Grecian style of architecture; the probable cost, originally estimated at £175,000, will not be much less than £300,000, of which sum, £150,000 has been contributed by government. According to the approved plan now in progress, the buildings will be four hundred and fifty-four feet in length, and two hundred and twenty-four in depth, with three principal fronts, of which the north presents, in the central and receding part, a noble portico of eight Ionic columns, the shafts of which are five feet in diameter, and forty-six feet high, supporting an entablature with a triangular pediment having the royal arms in the tympanum: in the centre will be a finely-groined archway, intended as a thoroughfare for foot passengers to the streets at the south end of the building, and having on each side an entrance into the central part of the edifice: the entrance to the projecting wings will be through a loggia of two columns of similar dimensions and character: the east and west fronts have each a portico in the centre, of similar elevation as the portico of the north front; and the faces of the building, on each side of the portico, are decorated with pilasters supporting a cornice and entablature: from the centre of the building rises a noble dome, forty-six feet in diameter, of which the tambour is surrounded by Ionic pillars supporting an entablature surmounted by a balustrade. The exterior, from every point of view, presents an object of beautiful magnificence, unrivalled by any public building of the kind: the interior, in addition to ample accommodation for the business of the customs and excise, will contain the stamp and post offices, and the requisite offices connected with the docks: the long room, for the custom-house department, one hundred and forty-six feet in length, seventy feet in breadth, and forty feet high, will be accessible from the lower part of the building, by two double staircases of ample dimensions: under the building will be an extensive range of vaults for the reception of wines and spirits in bond. The old custom-house, in which the business has hitherto been transacted, is of brick, ornamented with stone, convenient only from its central situation, but destitute of any architectural importance: the present excise office consists of two private houses converted to that use. Adjoining the dock office, which is near the custom-house, is a building appropriated to the business of the dock police; and the present post-office is a small building, which cannot be noticed among the buildings of the town.

The exchange buildings, erected by the late Mr. John Foster, at an expense of £110,848, subscribed in shares of £100 each, were completed in 1806: they occupy three sides of a quadrangular area, one hundred and ninety-seven feet long, and one hundred and seventy-eight in breadth, the north front of the town-hall forming the fourth side: the façades of the east and west sides, which are uniform, consist of a rustic basement story, forming an arched piazza, surmounted by a range of Corinthian columns, supporting a cornice and balustrade: the south side of the quadrangle differs from the others, principally in the projection of its centre, which has a handsome portico of four duplicated columns, supporting an entablature, above which are four finely-sculptured figures of Portland stone, representing the four elements, and corresponding with similar figures on the front of the town-hall, which forms the other side. The three sides of the quadrangle have a piazza fifteen feet in width; and in the centre of the area is a monument to the memory of Lord Nelson, erected by subscription, at an expense of £9000, and placed on a circular pedestal of marble, round the base of which are four figures of captives, emblematical of the four principal victories gained by that admiral; in the spaces between these figures are representations, in basso relievo, of some of his naval exploits; and on the pedestal is the figure of the admiral, receiving on his sword a fourth naval crown from Victory, while, at the same moment, a figure of Death appears rising from behind the drapery of the fallen standards of the vanquished enemy. The entrances into the area are at the angles of the quadrangle, and from Old Hall-street is an additional entrance through three arches in the basement story, divided into avenues by duplicated columns of the Grecian Doric, with groined roofs richly ornamented: the façade of this entrance from the street is a noble design of the Doric order, and the end fronts of the east and west ranges of the quadrangle, facing the town-hall, are handsome specimens of the Corinthian. In the east wing is a news-room, ninety-four feet long and fifty-two feet wide, above which is a spacious room for the use of the underwriters: the central and west wings contain numerous counting-houses and offices, and behind them are extensive warehouses.

The manufactures of the town are principally such as are connected with the port and the shipping, the promotion of its commerce, and the supply of the inhabitants: there are several sugar-refineries upon a very large scale, extensive potteries, glass-houses, breweries, tanneries, salt and copperas works, iron and brass foundries, foundries for cannon, anchors, chain cables, the several parts of machinery connected with steam-engines, and various others; manufactories for steam-engines, steam-boilers, and machinery of all kinds; guns, small arms, nails, files, ropes, sails, cordage, watches, tobacco, snuff, and soap; there are numerous corn-mills, and others for grinding mustard, colours, and dye-woods: the manufacture of soap exceeds that of any place in England, the amount of duty paid for the year ending January 5th, 1830, being £316,942. 16. 1 $\frac{3}{4}$.; and those of tobacco and snuff are very extensive: the number of watches made annually, on an average, amount to ten thousand four hundred, a number greater than that of any town, except London. Numerous shipwrights are constantly employed in repairing the vessels in the docks, and ship-building is carried on to a considerable extent; thirty-three vessels were built at this port in 1826, and several ships of war have been launched from the dock yards, among which were three of fifty and one of forty-four guns, together with several frigates. The building of steam-packets, and the manufacture of engines and boilers for their use, have been greatly increasing within the last few years at Liverpool, which in this respect appears to take the lead of all other ports. The trade of the town is greatly facilitated by an extensive line of inland navigation in every direction, by which it is connected with the manufacturing districts and the principal towns in the kingdom. No less than five water conveyances fall into the Mersey; viz. the Mersey and Irwell navigation, the late Duke of Bridgewater's canal, the Sankey canal, the Chester and Ellesmere canal, and the Weaver navigation: the first communicates with Manchester, and with Bolton and Bury by a canal to those towns. The Duke of Bridgewater's communicates also with Manchester, and, by the Rochdale canal, with Hull and the southern parts of Yorkshire; and, by means of the Grand Trunk canal, with almost every other canal or inland navigation to the south of Lancashire. The Sankey canal has a communication with the extensive coal-mines at St. Helen's and its neighbourhood. The Chester and Ellesmere canal, now being united to the Birmingham canal in Worcestershire, will open a communication with all the southern parts of England, and with the mining districts of North and South Wales. The Weaver is the great medium of conveyance for the produce of the salt mines at Northwich and its neighbourhood. In addition to these is the Leeds and Liverpool canal, communicating, by the Lancaster canal, with all the north part of Lancashire; by means of a cut lately made to the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, with Manchester; and, as the name imports, with Leeds, and consequently with the principal manufacturing towns in Yorkshire. A rail-road from Manchester is also now being finished, which by means of a tunnel running under this town, from east to west, will deliver goods or passengers, by steam-engines propelled at the rate of from fifteen to thirty miles an hour, almost at the sides of the docks, without the inconvenience of passing through any part of the town: for a more detailed account of this stupendous work, see the article on LANCASHIRE. Other rail-roads are in progress in the vicinity, and one to Birmingham, and thence to London, has been projected.

The town is beautifully situated on the east bank of the river Mersey, along which it extends for more than three miles: on the west side are the immense ranges of docks, wharfs, and warehouses, in the neighbourhood of which the streets are narrow, and the houses of inferior appearance to those of more recent erection: on the east side, to which it extends for upwards of a mile, are spacious streets, squares, and crescents, modern houses, built chiefly of brick and roofed with slate, of which many are elegant mansions. The town is well paved, and brilliantly lighted with gas, by two companies, one established in 1818, for the supply of coal gas, and the other for the preparation of oil gas, in 1823. The inhabitants and the shipping in the docks are supplied with water from the springs at Bootle, about four miles distant, by the company of the Bootle water-works, and from springs in or contiguous to the town, by the company of the Liverpool and Harrington water-works. The air is highly salubrious, and the convenience of sea-bathing is afforded by the construction of baths of every description, erected by the corporation, and furnished with every accommodation; by private establishments of a similar nature; by a floating-bath, and by numerous machines. Steam-boats are constantly sailing to and from the ferries on the Cheshire shore; and every facility of aquatic excursions may be obtained by packets and pleasure boats, which are in constant attendance. The docks afford delightful promenades, commanding extensive views of the river and of the shipping: the public buildings, which are highly beautiful, give an air of grandeur to the town; and its numerous sources of refined amusement and social intercourse render it, independently of its mercantile attractions, a desirable place of residence. The environs are pleasant, abounding with interesting scenery, and with numerous handsome seats and beautiful villas. The village of Everton, one mile north-east of the town, is the retreat of many of the opulent merchants: from its elevated situation, it commands extensive and interesting views, and displays considerable architectural interest.

The public subscription libraries are numerous and well selected. The Athenæum, a neat building of stone, erected, in 1799, at an expense of £4000, by a proprietary of five hundred members, whose annual subscription is £2. 12. 6., contains a news-room, and a library comprising fourteen thousand volumes: adjoining the library are a committee-room and apartments for the librarian. The Lyceum, a handsome edifice of the Ionic order, was erected by public subscription, in 1802, at an expense of £11,000: it contains a well-selected library of thirty thousand volumes, conveniently arranged in a circular room forty-five feet in diameter, tastefully decorated with busts, and lighted by a spacious dome; a coffee-room, sixty-eight feet in length, forty-eight feet wide, and thirty-one feet high, with an elegant coved ceiling; and a lecture and committee-room: the institution is under the direction of a president, vice-president, and a committee of twenty-four members; there are eight hundred subscribers to the library, and six hundred to the coffee-room. The Union news-room, a substantial and neat building, was erected by public subscription, in 1800, at an expense of £6000: it contains a spacious coffee-room, with two recesses at the end, ornamented with Ionic pillars: over the entrance to the bar is a painting, by Fuseli, emblematical of the union; and on the parapet above the entrance are the union arms, finely sculptured. The exchange news-room, which occupies the lower story of the east wing of that splendid edifice, is ninety-four feet in length and fifty-two feet wide: the ceiling, which is richly panelled, is divided into three arched compartments, by a double range of sixteen Ionic pillars, twenty feet high, forming an elegant colonnade in the centre of the room: the side walls are decorated with sixteen pilasters of the same order, between which are spacious arched windows: the whole of the interior preserves a character of striking beauty. There are also a medical and a law library, supported by the members of those professions. The royal institution, a spacious and handsome edifice, the purchase and adaptation of which to its purpose, cost £14,000, raised in shares of £100, consists of a centre and two wings, extending one hundred and forty-six feet in front, and containing on the ground-floor a reading-room for the subscribers, a lecture-room fifty feet in length and thirty feet wide, a committee-room, and classical and mathematical school-rooms; and on the first floor, a large room for the Liverpool Literary and Philosophical Society, a library, a museum, a spacious exhibition-room for the members of the Liverpool academy of painting, an exhibition-room for casts from the Elgin and Eginna marbles, a drawing school-room, and a committee-room: on the roof is an observatory, and behind the principal building are a laboratory and a theatre for chemical and philosophical experiments. This institution was formed, in 1814, for the advancement of literature, science, and the arts, and the members were incorporated by royal charter, in 1822: the society appoints professors, who lecture on chemistry, anatomy, physiology, botany, and astronomy; and masters for teaching the classics, mathematics, English composition, the modern languages, and drawing. A school of arts was established, in 1825, for the gratuitous instruction of the artisans of the town, in the principles of chemistry and mechanics, on which subjects lectures are delivered at the rooms in Slater-street, by professors of the royal institution. The Botanic gardens, near Edge hill, occupy about four acres of ground, enclosed within a stone wall, having a handsome entrance-lodge, containing apartments for the superintendent and others connected with the management: the collection of plants is extensive, and affords not only a practical illustration of the lectures delivered on that subject at the Royal Institution, but an interesting and pleasing recreation; strangers are admitted by a note from any of the proprietors: the conservatory, two hundred and forty feet in length, is an elegant and highly ornamental structure. The museum, in Church-street, consists of two apartments, in one of which a collection of natural productions is tastefully displayed, and in the other is a variety of ancient armour and warlike weapons and instruments.

The new baths, on the west side of George's dock, form a neat range of stone building, two hundred and thirty-nine feet in length and eighty-seven in depth; on each side of the entrance, which is in the centre, is a colonnade of eighteen pillars, affording a sheltered walk; and in front of the building is a good promenade on the margin of the river. The gentlemen's baths are on the north side: the principal bath is forty-five feet long and twenty-seven wide, and the entrance from the dressing-rooms is under a projecting roof supported on pillars; a handsome saloon, lighted by a dome, leads to the warm baths, which are well arranged, and provided with every accommodation: the ladies' baths, on the south side, are similarly arranged. The theatre, on the east side of Williamson-square, was built in 1772: it is a neat edifice of brick, with a circular stone front, ornamented with the king's arms, and with emblematical figures in bas relief: the season commences in May, and closes in December. The amphitheatre, in Great Charlotte-street, is a spacious and handsome building of brick, coated with stucco: it is open, during the winter, for the performance of equestrian exercises, feats of agility, and pantomimes. The circus, in Springfield-street, is used for similar exhibitions. The Wellington rooms were built by public subscription, in 1815; in the centre of the front, which is of stone, is a lofty circular portico of the Corinthian order, from which two doors open into an octangular vestibule, twenty-five feet in diameter, beyond which is an ante-room, from which doors on the right and left lead into the card and supper rooms, and in the centre into the ball-room, eighty feet in length and thirty-seven feet wide, and splendidly decorated; the whole forming a suite of rooms admirably adapted to the uses for which they were erected. The music-hall is a plain brick building, with a portico, in which subscription concerts are held during the winter months. The diorama is a plain and substantial edifice, erected, at a considerable expense, by the Messrs. Daguerre, members of the Legion of Honour, who are the inventors of that exhibition. The rotunda is a handsome circular building of brick, elegantly fitted up for the exhibition of panoramic views, but now used as a billiard-room by a select number of subscribers. At the entrance into the town from London is an equestrian statue of George III., the first stone of which was laid in Great George-square, by the mayor and corporation, attended by the different trade associations, on the 25th of October, 1809, being the day on which His Majesty completed the fiftieth year of his reign, but since removed to its present site: it is of bronze, and a copy of that of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, at Rome: the expense, amounting to nearly £4000, was raised by subscription. The races take place in July, and continue four days: the course, at Aintree, about six miles to the north-north-east of the town, is a mile and a half in length, and is enclosed by railing, with a straight run in of nearly one thousand one hundred yards; there is also an interior course, or training-ground: stabling for fifty horses have been built at the upper end, with rooms over them for the grooms: six common stands have also been built, capable of accommodating six thousand persons. The grand stand was erected in 1829: it is four stories in height; the ground-floor, beneath which are spacious cellars, contains entrance halls and vestibules, from which two spacious staircases lead to the principal rooms on the first floor, and to the various rooms for refreshment and for promenade during the intervals of the running; the principal of these, overlooking the race ground, is ninety-one feet in length, twenty-two feet wide, and seventeen feet high, with circular ends, and lighted by fifteen windows: in front is a balcony extending the whole length of the front and round the ends of the building; and at the back of the principal room are two withdrawing-rooms, each twenty-eight feet long and seventeen feet wide, one for gentlemen, and the other for ladies; above are two similar rooms, and the leads, commanding a view of the whole course, and a most beautiful and extensive prospect of the surrounding country, are capable of accommodating two thousand persons.

The chartered market days are Wednesday and Saturday, but there are markets for provisions every day in the week except Sunday: the market days for corn are Tuesday and Saturday, from ten in the morning till one o'clock, the market being held in the corn exchange, a neat building, with an entrance in the centre into the lower area, and the basement story ornamented with Doric columns, supporting a cornice and entablature. Numerous market-places have been formed, and buildings erected, for the accommodation of persons attending them; of these, the principal is St. John's market-place, nearly in the centre of the town, begun in August 1820, and completed in February, 1822, by the corporation, at an expense of £35,000: the building is of brick, with entrances and cornices of stone; it is one hundred and eighty-three yards in length, and forty-five yards wide, lighted with one hundred and thirty-six windows, and thoroughly ventilated: there are eight spacious entrances, and the interior is divided longitudinally into five avenues, by four ranges of handsome cast-iron pillars, one hundred and sixteen in number, which support the roof. St. James's market-house, for the accommodation of the south part of the town and of Harrington, has been lately erected; and a similar building is in progress in Scotland road, for the convenience of the residents in Everton and Kirkdale. In addition to these are the old fish market in James-street, and open market-places in Cleveland-square, Islington, and Pownall-square; the cattle and hay markets, in Lime-street; and the pig market, in Great Howard-street. The fairs are, July 25th and November 11th: ten days prior to each fair, a hand is displayed in front of the town-hall, and remains there for ten days after the conclusion, during which time, every person entering or leaving the town on business connected with the fairs, is free from arrest for debt on borough process within the ancient liberties of the town.

Liverpool, though a borough by prescription, received its first charter of incorporation from King John: under this charter, confirmed and extended by many succeeding monarchs, and modified by William III., George II., III., and IV., the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, an indefinite number of aldermen, a town clerk, and others, composing a common council of forty-one, assisted by subordinate officers. The mayor is chosen annually on St. Luke's day from among the common council, by the burgesses generally; the recorder and town clerk are chosen by the common council; the senior bailiff is appointed by the mayor, and the junior bailiff by the burgesses; and such of the common council as have served the office of mayor become aldermen. The mayor and aldermen are justices of the peace within the borough, and the mayor, by charter of William III., is also justice of the peace for the county, and, by charter of George IV., the junior alderman and the two bailiffs are coroners. The freedom of the borough is inherited by birth, and acquired by servitude or gift; among the privileges is the freedom of the city of Bristol, and of Waterford and Wexford, in Ireland, the resident burgesses of which places are reciprocally free of Liverpool, with the exception only of the right to vote at elections. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for all offences not capital, which are also held every Monday by adjournment; and a court of record, by prescription, for the recovery of debts to any amount, every Thursday: a court of requests is held every Monday and Wednesday, under an act passed in the 25th of George II., by commissioners appointed by the corporation, for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40s. A regular system of dock police has been established by act of parliament, and some of the borough magistrates attend daily at the dock office, for determining causes connected with that department, and the mayor or some of the magistrates attend daily at the sessions-house, for the transaction of public business. The estates belonging to the corporation may be estimated at the value of £2,500,000, producing an income varying from £100,000 to £110,000 per annum, a considerable proportion of which is expended in the improvement of the port, and in the embellishment of the town; the gross sum laid out from 1786 to 1828, in widening the streets, and in other improvements within the liberties, was £602,554, and in building churches, charity schools, market-houses, and other public buildings, £465,000, making a total of £1,067,554, and an average expenditure of £25,417 per annum, for forty-two years. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., but made no other return till the reign of Edward VI., since which time it has continued to send two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the freemen generally not receiving alms, of whom the number is about five thousand: the mayor and bailiffs are the returning officers.

The town-hall, built in 1749, and of which the ground-floor was originally designed for an exchange, occupies an elevated situation at the north end of Castle-street; the whole of the interior was destroyed by fire in 1795, and has been since restored, upon a more improved plan, at an expense of £110,000: it is a stately and magnificent structure, in the Grecian style of architecture, with four elegant fronts, of which the north forms one side of the Exchange buildings, and the south, which is the principal, forms the grand entrance; a rustic basement surrounds the whole building, from which rise handsome ranges of Corinthian pillars, supporting an entablature and cornice; between the pillars are tablets, in which the emblems of commerce are finely sculptured in bas relief: the principal front has a noble portico of Corinthian columns, supporting a triangular pediment in the central part, which has a bold projection: the east and west fronts, which are uniform, have in the projecting central part a handsome portico of Corinthian columns, supporting triangular pediments, from the centre of the building rises a splendid and stately dome, supported on a range of lofty columns of the Corinthian order, grouped at the quoins and surmounted by triangular pediments; round the tambour of the dome is an open gallery, commanding an extensive panoramic view, and the summit is crowned by a colossal figure of Britannia. The interior of this noble building contains on the ground floor a council-room, apartments for the mayor, committee-rooms, and offices for the town clerk, treasurer, and other officers of the corporation. The grand staircase leads into a spacious saloon splendidly furnished, and ornamented with full-length portraits of George III., by Sir Thomas Lawrence; of His late Majesty George IV., when Prince of Wales, by Hopner; of the late Duke of York, by Phillips; and a portrait by Sir M. A. Shee of His present Majesty, William IV.: the saloon opens on the east and west sides into two magnificently-furnished drawing-rooms, thirty-two feet in length and twenty-seven feet wide; and on the north and east sides, into two spacious ball-rooms, superbly decorated, and lighted by three chandeliers of richly cut glass of great beauty, and of unusual magnitude: the larger of these rooms is eighty-nine feet in length, forty-one feet wide, and forty feet high; the smaller is sixty-one feet in length, twenty-eight feet wide, and twenty-six feet high; the ceilings are coved, and ornamented with highly-enriched panels, the walls are decorated with pilasters of Scagliola marble, and the furniture is sumptuously elegant. On the west of the saloon is the banquet-room, fifty feet in length, thirty feet wide and twenty-five feet high; the walls are ornamented with pilasters of variegated Scagliola marble, with capitals of the Corinthian order; the arched ceiling is richly panelled in compartments, and the whole is fitted up in a style of the most costly magnificence. The refectory, adjoining the smaller ball-room, thirty-six feet in length, and twenty-one feet wide, and lighted from the ceiling, is in a style of proportionate elegance. The interior of the dome, as seen from the grand staircase, is strikingly beautiful; the entire height from the pavement is one hundred and six feet; and the ornaments are characterised by a due regard to purity of style and chasteness of embellishment: the whole suite of rooms, for convenience of arrangement, and for splendour of decoration, are in perfect harmony with the general character of the building, which, for the magnitude of its dimensions, and the beauty of its architecture, is, perhaps, unparalleled by any edifice of the kind in Europe.

The borough sessions-house, near the west wing of the Exchange buildings, is a neat plain structure in the Grecian style of architecture: it is one hundred and seventy-four feet in length, and varies from fifty to eighty feet in depth; at the north front are two entrances, from which a winding staircase leads into a saloon, the ceiling of which is supported by four handsome Ionic columns: the saloon opens into the sessions hall, sixty-one feet in length, and thirty-nine feet wide, handsomely fitted up for the business of the sessions; the bar, communicating with some cells below, to which there is an underground passage from the prison, occupies the centre of the hall, and a gradual flight of steps ascending from it affords accommodation to spectators: the ceiling, in which are two domes, from which the hall is lighted, is handsomely panelled, and the walls are decorated with twelve pilasters supporting an enriched cornice: at the other extremity of the building is another court of similar style, but of smaller dimensions, in which the petty sessions and daily examinations are held: there are also rooms for the magistrates, jurors, and persons connected with the court, and on the ground-floor are cells for prisoners awaiting their trial. The borough gaol consists of six wings, of which three were let to the county as a temporary house of correction, till the new house of correction at Kirkdale should be completed: three of these are now appropriated to the confinement of debtors, and three to that of offenders against the dock acts, and of prisoners for trial at the borough sessions: it is capable of containing from five to six hundred prisoners, but is not well adapted for classification. The house of correction at Kirkdale, recently erected, is of a circular form, with two large wings, and is capable of receiving eight hundred prisoners, for the classification of whom there are twenty-two wards: the governor's house occupies the north front, and in the centre of the area are the chapel and the schools: it contains a tread-mill with ten wheels, of which three are worked by females. The sessions-house for the hundred of West Derby forms the south front of the house of correction, and is handsomely built of stone, with a portico of six lofty Ionic pillars; the sessions are held in a handsome room seventy feet long and forty-two feet wide, to which are attached apartments for the magistrates, barristers, and witnesses: the petty sessions for the hundred are held every alternate Friday, in a smaller room in this building, which was completed in 1821, at an expense of £80,000: the average number of prisoners confined here is about five hundred and fifty, who are employed in various pursuits of profitable labour, and receive a portion of their earnings on their discharge. A refuge for female prisoners, discharged in a destitute state, has been established in the town, under the auspices of which, many have been restored to stations of usefulness and respectability in society.

Liverpool was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Walton, from which it was separated in 1699, and constituted a distinct parish and a rectory, to be "called and esteemed a mediety, that is to say, equal betwixt the two rectors that shall preach at the new church (St. Peter's) and the parochial chapel (St. Nicholas):" it is in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester. Since the period of its separation from Walton, many new churches have been erected, and it has of late, by act of parliament, been divided into twenty-two districts, for ecclesiastical purposes: the original, and the only church prior to 1699, was that of St. Nicholas; the time of its foundation is not known; but, in 1361, a license was obtained from the Bishop of Lichfield, to bury in the churchyard during the plague, which then raged in the town: the body of the church was rebuilt in 1774, and, in 1810, the spire and the upper part of the tower fell upon the roof, a few minutes before the hour of service, and killed several persons who had assembled in the church, and were entering at the time: a new tower, in the later style of English architecture, has been erected, surmounted by a lantern, from a design by the late Mr. Harrison, of Chester: there were anciently four chantries in this church, but few monuments of antiquity are now remaining. St. Peter's church is a plain edifice, with a low square tower surmounted by an octagonal turret crowned with pinnacles: the interior contains some good specimens of carving in oak, and on the south side of the chancel is a costly marble monument to the memory of Foster Cunliffe, merchant: the rectory, or mediety of Liverpool is not in charge, and is in the patronage of the Mayor and Council. The following churches, the livings of which are perpetual curacies, are also under the patronage of the Mayor and Council: St. George's, erected, in 1732, on the site of the ancient castle, and recently rebuilt, under the superintendence of Mr. John Foster; the prevailing character is the Doric, and, in the elevation of the steeple, that style has been blended with the Ionic and the Corinthian: the Mayor and Council usually attend divine service at this church. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas, built under the authority of an act passed in the 21st of George II., and consecrated in 1750, is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, with a tower formerly surmounted by a very lofty spire, which was taken down, in consequence of the damage it sustained from a storm, in 1822: the interior is neatly fitted up, and the exterior walls are ornamented with duplicated columns of the Corinthian order, supporting a cornice surmounted by a balustrade. St. Paul's church, erected at the expense of the inhabitants in 1769, is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, with a dome rising from the centre, and porticoes of the Ionic order, forming the principal entrances: the Ionic character prevails throughout the building. St. Anne's, erected under an act passed in the 36th of George III., at the expense of two gentlemen of the town, is a neat building of brick, in the early style of English architecture, with a square brick tower crowned with pinnacles: the east window is of painted glass. St. John's church, erected, in 1784, under an act passed in the 2nd of George III., is a neat structure, with a square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles. St. Michael's, erected under an act passed in the 54th of George III., and amended by a subsequent act in the 4th of George IV., is an elegant structure in the Grecian style of architecture, with a lofty steeple of two receding turrets surmounted by a neat spire: it has a noble and boldly-projecting portico of six lofty Corinthian columns, supporting a triangular pediment: at the east end are four Corinthian columns supporting an entablature and cornice, which are continued round the building: the interior contains one thousand three hundred and six sittings, of which five hundred and twenty are free: the whole expense of its erection was £45,267. 10. 6., of which sum £10,267. 10. 6. was paid by the corporation. St. Luke's, recently erected at the expense of the corporation, after a design by Mr. Foster, is an elegant structure in the later style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, having turrets at the angles, which rise considerably above the battlements: the walls are strengthened by richly-embellished buttresses crowned with pinnacles in the lower stages, and carried up above the roof of the chancel, forming a series of highly-ornamented turrets. The interior is richly decorated, and the chancel, which is after the model of the Beauchamp chapel at Warwick, is a beautiful specimen of the decorated style: the windows, which are lofty and in fine proportion, are elegantly enriched with tracery, and the whole edifice is highly creditable to the taste and skill of the architect. The church of St. Martin's in the Fields, containing one thousand nine hundred and ten sittings, of which eight hundred and twenty-eight are free, was erected, in 1828, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £20,037. 3. 8.: it is a handsome structure in the later style of English architecture, having a square embattled tower with angular turrets, surmounted by an octagonal spire, the whole rising to the height of one hundred and ninety-eight feet: the chancel, of which the roof is finely groined, is separated from the nave by a lofty and richly-moulded arch; and the whole structure forms a striking ornament at the entrance into the town from the Ormskirk road: the living, a perpetual curacy, is, under certain regulations, vested by an act passed in the 10th of George IV. in the corporation.

The following churches will, at the expiration of sundry terms, be also in the patronage of the Mayor and Council: the church dedicated to the Holy Trinity, erected, by private subscription, under an act passed in the 32nd of George III., in 1792, is a neat edifice of stone, with a tower: the living is a perpetual curacy, now in the patronage of the Rev. R. Formby. Christ Church, erected under an act of parliament passed in the 40th of George III., is an elegant building of brick ornamented with stone, and having a light and handsome cupola and dome: the interior is well arranged; the chancel is lighted by a large Venetian window, and contains a marble tablet to the memory of John Houghton, Esq., by whom the church was built, at an expense of £21,000, and by whom it was endowed with £105 per annum, as a stipend for the minister: the living is a perpetual curacy, now in the patronage of Edward Gibbon, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mark, erected under an act passed in the 56th of George III., at an expense of £18,000, raised by subscription, is a plain edifice of brick, with a square tower crowned with a balustrade, and ornamented with vases at the angles: the interior is well arranged, and contains one thousand seven hundred and fourteen sittings, of which three hundred are free: the living is a perpetual curacy, the patronage of which was vested in five Trustees, of whom John Whitley, Esq. is the only survivor. St. Andrew's church, erected, in 1815, by John Gladstone, Esq., at an expense of £12,000, is a neat edifice, with a turret surmounted by a dome supported on eight columns: it contains one thousand six hundred and fifty sittings, of which four hundred are free: the living is a perpetual curacy, now in the patronage of John Gladstone, Esq. The church dedicated to St. Philip, erected under an act passed in the 1st of George IV., by John Cragge, Esq., at an expense of £12,000, is a neat edifice in the later style of English architecture: it contains one thousand sittings, of which one hundred and fifty are free: the living is a perpetual curacy, now in the patronage of John Cragge, Esq. St. David's church is a neat edifice, erected for the accommodation of the Welch residing in the town: the service of the church of England is regularly performed in the Welch language: the living is a perpetual curacy, at present in the patronage of Trustees. St. Catherine's church, in Abercromby-square, erected by subscription, at an expense of £10,000, is not yet completed; it is calculated to contain one thousand two hundred sittings: the entrance is through a portico of six handsome Ionic columns; the interior is lighted by a dome in the centre, supported by Corinthian columns. St. Bride's church, now being erected by subscription, at an estimated expense of £5000, will contain one thousand three hundred sittings, of which one hundred and twenty are to be free: it will be in the Grecian style of architecture, with a handsome portico of six Ionic columns. The two following will, in a short period, be under the patronage of the Rectors: St. Stephen's church, originally built for a congregation of Protestant Dissenters, but purchased and fitted up for the established religion, is a plain building with a small turret surmounted by a cupola: the living is a perpetual curacy, now in the patronage of William Spurstow Miller, Esq. St. Matthew's was also purchased from a congregation of Dissenters: the living is a perpetual curacy, now in the patronage of J. T. Holloway, Esq. St. Mary's, the church for the school for the indigent blind, with which it communicates by a subterraneous passage, was erected by subscription, after a design by Mr. Foster, in 1818: it is an elegant structure in the Grecian style of architecture, with a noble portico of six massive columns of the Doric order, supporting an enriched entablature and triangular pediment, an exact copy of the portico of the temple dedicated to Jupiter Panhellenius, in the island of Egina: the interior is beautifully arranged, and contains a splendid monument to the late Pudsey Dawson, Esq.: one half of the pews is reserved for strangers, whose contributions are received for the benefit of the charity: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of five Trustees, of whom the mayor and the two senior aldermen are three. There is also an episcopal chapel, dedicated to All Saints. In George's dock is a floating chapel connected with the established church. In addition to the churchyards are two public cemeteries: the one near Edge hill is spacious, and contains a small chapel of brick, in the ancient style of English architecture, in which the funeral service is performed; the other, which is called St. James' cemetery, is a large tract of ground excavated as a quarry for stone used in the building of the docks, and converted into a depository for the dead, at an expense of £21,000: it contains forty-four thousand square yards, enclosed by a stone wall and handsome iron palisades, having four stately entrances: the interior is intersected by roads wide enough to admit a carriage, which lead to catacombs excavated in the rock: the oratory, or chapel, in which the funeral service is performed, is an elegant edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, and of the Doric order, forty-six feet in length, and twenty-nine wide; at the west end is a noble portico of six massive columns supporting a rich entablature, which is carried round the building, and surmounted by a triangular pediment: it was built after a design by Mr. Foster, and forms an elegant specimen of purity of style, and of tasteful embellishment: near it is a house for the officiating minister, a handsome edifice of stone; and at the south end of the cemetery is the porter's lodge. St. James' church, nearly adjoining the cemetery, and from which it takes its name, is in the parish of Walton. There are five places of worship for Baptists, three for Welch Calvinists, one for the Society of Friends, four for Independents, one for Welch Independents, five for Wesleyan Methodists, one for Welch Methodists, and one for those of the New Connexion, one for Sandemanians, one for Swedenborgians, and two for Unitarians: two Scottish kirks, and two chapels for Seceders; five Roman Catholic chapels, and a synagogue. Of these, several are handsome buildings, among which may be noticed the Scottish kirk in Rodney-street, dedicated to St. Andrew, and built after a design by Mr. Foster, with a receding portico of the Ionic order, and a handsome balustrade, and having, at each end of the front, a turret surmounted by a dome; the Roman Catholic chapel on Copperas hill, in the early style of English architecture, strengthened on the sides by buttresses crowned with crocketed pinnacles; and the Synagogue, an elegant structure, with a handsome Ionic portico, and in every respect decorated in a style characteristic of the opulence of that portion of the inhabitants. In the Salthouse dock is a floating chapel, under the management of a society of Dissenters, called the Bethel Union.

The Blue coat hospital, established in 1709, for the clothing and instruction of poor children, was, in 1714, extended also to their entire maintenance, and the present substantial building, occupying three sides of a quadrangle, was erected for that purpose by subscription: the endowment arises from a bequest by William Clayton, Esq., of £1000, a bequest by the Cleveland family of premises which sold for £1706. 13. 9., and donations by the late Mr. John Horrocks, amounting to £3022, its support being further provided for by subscription: two hundred and fifty boys, and one hundred girls, are clothed, maintained, and educated, in this ancient and truly valuable institution. Numerous other schools for the education of the children of the poor, in various parts of the town, are supported by subscription. Two were erected and are supported by the corporation; one in Park-lane, founded in 1825, at an expense of more than £12,000, in which four hundred boys and three hundred girls are instructed; and the other at Bevington hill, in which an equal number of each sex is taught: they are both handsome buildings of stone. The Moorfields day and Sunday school, in which two hundred boys and one hundred and twenty girls are educated, is supported by subscription. A school in Hunter-street was erected in 1792, by Mr. Stephen Waterworth, and endowed by Frances Waterworth, his sister, with £4000, in which one hundred and sixty boys from any part of the country are instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and one hundred and ten girls in reading, writing, knitting, and sewing. St. James' school, built in 1802, by Mr. Moses Benson, is supported by subscription, and two hundred boys and one hundred girls are educated in it. St. Matthew's day and Sunday school affords the means of instruction to one hundred and twenty boys and one hundred and thirty girls. St. Andrew's school was erected by John Gladstone, Esq., who endowed it with rents from St. Andrew's church, for the instruction of one hundred and forty boys and one hundred and thirty girls. The Welch Charitable Society, instituted in 1804, and under the patronage of His Majesty, has a school in Russell-street, in which three hundred and twenty boys and ninety girls, children of Welch parents residing in and near the town, are clothed, instructed, and apprenticed. St. Mark's school, in which one hundred and fifty boys and one hundred girls are educated; and the Harrington school, in which one hundred and fifty boys and one hundred and twenty girls are taught, are supported by subscription; besides various others connected with the established church. Among those supported by the dissenting congregations are, the Manesty-lane school; the school of the Society of Friends, in Duncan-street, London-road, comprising two spacious buildings, in which two hundred boys and two hundred girls are taught on the Lancasterian plan; the Caledonian school, in Oldham-street, instituted in 1809, for the instruction of one hundred and sixty-six boys and ninety-seven girls, children of Scottish parents. The Brunswick school, in which one hundred and forty boys and one hundred girls are taught; the Leeds-street school, in which are two hundred boys and one hundred and fifty girls; and the Jordan-street school, a large and commodious building, in which three hundred and ten boys and one hundred and sixty girls are educated, and instructed in some useful art, are supported by the Wesleyan Methodists. The Mount Pleasant school, in which seventy-two boys and sixty girls are instructed, is supported by the Unitarians. The school of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, in Pleasant-street, instituted in 1807, is supported by subscription, and two hundred and sixty-four boys and one hundred and forty-eight girls, children of Irish parents, are clothed, instructed, and apprenticed. The Bethesda school, in which are one hundred and ninety boys and one hundred girls, is supported by the congregation of Bethesda chapel in Duncan-street; and there are various other similar institutions, together with several infant schools recently established, in different parts of the town, which are liberally supported, and judiciously conducted.

The school for the indigent blind was established in 1791, and the present spacious buildings were erected by subscription in 1808: they consist of a substantial dwelling-house for the conductor; behind which is a spacious range of building for the residence and employment of the inmates, for whose accommodation, and as a means of increasing the funds for their support, the handsome church already noticed has been erected; the pupils are instructed in various branches of learning, upon Dr. Bell's plan, and are taught spinning, the art of making baskets, sacks, list-shoes, twine, packthread, worsted rugs, the weaving of linen, sacking, stair-carpeting, and various other trades, by which they may obtain a livelihood: they are also instructed in music, with a view to qualify them as organists and teachers, and in stringing and tuning musical instruments: the present number of pupils is one hundred and twenty, to whose health and moral improvement the greatest attention is paid: the amount of goods manufactured and sold at the school is from £1500 to £2000 per annum. An institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb was established in 1825: the school-room in Wood-street is well adapted to the accommodation of fifty pupils, of whom such as can afford it pay an adequate remuneration, and the rest are instructed gratuitously; adjoining the school is a respectable boarding-house, in which the pupils are received on suitable terms, the school is open to visitors every week, and a public examination of the pupils is held quarterly. Many children of the poor are also instructed in various branches of trade in the house of industry, established in 1772, and said to be the largest of the kind in the kingdom; it is appropriated generally to the reception, maintenance, and employment of the poor: to the east of the building is a house of recovery from fever, a spacious stone building, occupying an elevated situation, and in every respect well adapted to the purpose: it is under the direction of the overseers of the poor, and was opened for the reception of patients in 1806. A school of industry for females, established in 1809, is under the direction of a committee of ladies: there are one hundred females in the school, who are instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and in knitting, spinning, and plain work: a fund arising from the contribution of one half-penny per week by each scholar is appropriated to the payment of two guineas to each on her marriage, and an annuity of two guineas on attaining the age of fifty-five years. The female penitentiary was established in 1809, and a handsome brick building has been erected by subscription, for the reception of destitute and abandoned females, of whom, since its establishment, many have been reclaimed to virtue and to habits of industry, and restored to their families, or placed in stations of usefulness to society.

The infirmary was originally instituted in 1749, but the building being found inadequate to the object, the present spacious and handsome edifice of stone was erected, by public subscription, in 1824: it consists of a centre and two receding wings, extending two hundred and four feet in length: the front, in the centre of which is a noble portico of six massive columns of the Ionic order, supporting a frieze and boldly-projecting cornice, with corresponding pilasters at each extremity, is one hundred and eight feet in depth, and the wings are twenty-six feet deep: the building comprises three lofty stories, having one hundred and thirty-eight windows in front; and the whole, from the chaste elegance of its design, produces a pleasing grandeur of effect. The ground-floor contains all the domestic offices; on the first floor is a suite of twenty rooms, for the committees, officers of the institution, and for the accommodation of the household; and one long room, which is fitted up as a ward for the reception of casualty patients: the second and third stories are appropriated to the use of the patients, of whom the number in the house is two hundred and twenty, and two hundred and thirty-four beds are made up. This institution is an excellent school of medicine and surgery, and is gratuitously attended by the medical professors of the town and neighbourhood: the annual expenditure exceeds £5000, and it is open unlimitedly to all who may need its aid. There are two public dispensaries, supported by subscription; the North, situated in Marybone, and for which a very handsome building is now being erected in Vauxhall-road; and the South dispensary, in Upper Parliament-street: they are liberally supported, and are each under the direction of a president, two auditors, three physicians, three surgeons, and an apothecary, who acts as secretary: there were formerly three, but the central dispensary, in Church-street, has lately been taken down. The institution for curing diseases of the eye, in Basnet-street, and a similar institution in Slater-street, are supported by public subscription; and, in 1825, an establishment for curing diseases of the ear was opened in Duke-street, and is liberally supported. The lunatic asylum, near St. John's church, originally founded in 1792, was found inadequate to the accommodation of the patients, and a new building was erected, in 1830, after a design by Mr. Foster: the basement story is fitted up with every convenience for the use of the establishment, and the building, which is two stories high, is divided into wards for the classification of the patients: to each ward is an adjoining ground for exercise, in addition to which, a considerable portion of ground is laid out in walks and pleasure grounds, for the use of convalescent patients: the asylum is capable of accommodating sixty general patients, exclusively of several suites of apartments for the reception of private patients, who are admitted on terms adapted to their circumstances, and accommodated in a manner corresponding with their rank. A ladies' charity, for the relief of poor married women lying-in at their own houses, was instituted in 1796, and is under the superintendence of a patroness, president, vice-president, and a committee of six ladies and seven gentlemen: it is supported by subscription, aided by the proceeds of an annual ball: its general expenditure exceeds £1000 per annum; and the charity, since its establishment, has afforded relief to nearly fifty thousand individuals. A marine humane society was established, in 1823, for the encouragement of boatmen and fishermen to adventure for the relief of vessels in distress in the river and upon the coast, by the distribution of suitable rewards for their success in rescuing the lives of the crew: it has, since its formation, been productive of great benefit. The strangers' friend society originated with the Wesleyan Methodists, and is open, without distinction of religious denomination, to all objects of distress: it was established in 1789, and has afforded material assistance in the clothing and relief of numerous indigent and friendless strangers. The marine society was instituted for the relief of reduced or aged masters of vessels, and for the support of their widows and children. The seamen's hospital was established, in 1752, for the maintenance of decayed seamen, their widows, and children: it is conducted on the plan of the Trinity-house, and is supported by a permanent fund of £35,000, the amount of unclaimed prize money, and by a contribution of sixpence per month from the wages of every seaman belonging to the port: there are seven hundred individuals who receive monthly pensions from the funds. An hospital for the relief of sick and wounded American seamen was opened in 1820, and is supported entirely by the American government; and a military hospital, for the relief of any regiment either quartered at or marching through the town, has accommodation for forty invalids, and is supported at the expense of Government. The Liverpool merchant society consists of two hundred and seventy-four members, associated for the relief of widows of its decayed members, to twenty of whom it pays an annuity of £20.

There are numerous provident and benefit societies; and the Liverpool charitable society administers relief to the poor at their own houses. The society for ameliorating the condition and increasing the comforts of the poor is under the direction of a committee of twenty-one members, who have established a savings bank in Bold-street, a handsome building with a rustic basement story, from which rise four Doric columns supporting an enriched entablature and triangular pediment, with an ornamented architrave. The Diocesan Society, for the relief of the widows and orphan children of the clergy, has been established for several years, and has been productive of considerable benefit. The charitable institution house, a commodious building, was erected at the joint expense of John Gladstone, James Cropper, and Samuel Hope, Esqrs., for the gratuitous accommodation of the several committees of the various charitable institutions in the town: the lower part of the building is used as a depositary by the Liverpool Auxiliary Bible Society; and attached to it is a record office, in which are kept the reports of all charitable institutions.

Among the distinguished natives of the town may be noticed, Jeremiah Horrox, an eminent astronomer, who was born at Toxteth park in 1619; George Stubbs, a celebrated painter of animals, and author of a work on comparative anatomy, and of a series of drawings and engravings illustrative of the anatomy of the horse, born in 1724; William Sadler, who invented the method of applying copper-plate prints to the embellishment of earthenware; Edward Rushton, born in 1756; and John Deare, an eminent sculptor, born in 1760. Matthew Dobson, M.D., F.R.S., and his wife, both respectable authors; Dr. William Enfield; Dr. John Bostock; the celebrated Mrs. Hemans; and William Roscoe, Esq., author of the Life of Leo X., and of Memoirs of the family of Lorenzo de Medici; and the Rev. Legh Richmond, author of the Dairyman's Daughter, were residents in this town. Liverpool gives the title of earl to the family of Jenkinson.

LIVERSEDGE, a chapelry in the parish of BIRSTALL, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Huddersfield, containing 4259 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £2200 parliamentary grant. The Rev. H. Roberson was patron in 1812. The chapel dedicated to Christ, has lately received an addition of three hundred and fifty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £350 towards defraying the expense. The High Town school was erected by subscription among the inhabitants; and in 1722, Josias Farrer devised a rent-charge of £8, for the instruction of sixteen poor children; and in 1723, Edward Beaumont bequeathed £100, the interest to be applied in teaching six others of this township: the annual income is £14, for which twenty-two free scholars are educated at a National school established here in 1821. During the disturbances in the manufacturing districts, and the prevalence of the Luddite system, in 1812, a mill belonging to Mr. William Cartwright, at Rawfolds in this township, became the object of hostile attack, but was vigorously defended by its proprietor, when two of the assailants were killed, and several wounded; none of the efforts at demolition, however, proved successful, and, in admiration of the bravery of Mr. Cartwright on the occasion, a public subscription, amounting to upwards of £3000, was made, and presented to that gentleman.

LLANWERN, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Caerleon, containing 27 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £4. 0. 10., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir Thomas Salusbury, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LLANYBLODWELL, a parish in the hundred of OSWESTRY, county of SALOP, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Oswestry, containing 850 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the curacy of Moreton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £7 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a plain structure, with a small wooden turret rising from the roof of the west end; it contains some handsome monuments to the Bridgeman and Godolphin families. Attached to the building is a school-room, and a dwelling-house for the master, built and endowed by Mr. Matthews, of Blodwell hall, for the education of poor children, and to which the late Rev. Dr. Donne was a great benefactor. The small river Tannat flows through the parish, and Offa's Dyke bounds it on the east. Here are quarries of limestone and several lime-kilns, affording employment to most of the poor inhabitants of the neighbourhood; copper and lead ore also abound, though no regular mines of either seem to have been wrought since the time of the Romans, of whose works there are still considerable traces in this and the adjoining parishes. In the township of Llyncllys, a name derived from Llyn, a lake, and Lys, a palace, is a lake of extraordinary depth, of which it is vulgarly believed and affirmed, that when the water is clear and unruffled, towers and other parts of a large structure are plainly discernible at the bottom.

LLANYMYNECH, a parish in the hundred of OSWESTRY, county of SALOP, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Oswestry, containing, with the townships of Llwyn-tlanan and Treprenal, 454 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £12. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is dedicated to St. Agatha. Limestone of the finest quality abounds in the parish, and there are kilns for burning it. Copper and lead ore are also found in the neighbourhood, but though no mines are now in operation, the "Ogof," a Welch word for cave, is evidently the mouth of an ancient mine, near which are vestiges of a Roman encampment. The Llanymynech canal passes through the parish.

LLOYNDU, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ABERGAVENNY which is in the lower division of the hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, containing 121 inhabitants.

LLWYNTLANAN, a township in the parish of LLANMYNECH, hundred of OSWESTRY, county of SALOP, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Oswestry. The population is returned with the parish.

The living is a perpetual curacy, united to the rectory of Mottisfont, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. John. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The Salisbury and Southampton canal passes through the parish. Sarah Rolle, in 1700, gave certain land, directing the income to be applied in clothing, maintaining, and educating all poor children of Lockerley, East Tytherley, Mounds-mire, and Stebbington.

LOCKHAY, or LOCKO, a chapelry in the parish of SPONDON, hundred of APPLETREE, though locally in the hundred of Morleston and Litchurch, county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Derby. The population is returned with the parish. Here was an hospital of the order of St. Lazarus of Jerusalem, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, and subordinate to a house in France: in the reign of Edward III. it was seized by the Crown, and given to the Society of King's Hall, Cambridge.

LOCKING, a parish in the hundred of WINTERSTOKE, county of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Axbridge, containing 198 inhabitants. The church, dedicated to St. Augustine, is a modern structure, built principally at the expense of the Society of Merchant Adventurers of Bristol, who are trustees of Colston charity in Bristol and, as such, patrons of this benefice.

LOCKINGE (EAST and WEST), a parish in the hundred of WANTAGE, county of BERKS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Wantage, containing, with the tythings of Betterton and West Ginge, 342 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £31. 10., and annexed to the Wardenship of All Souls' College, Oxford, since 1764, by act of parliament. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LOCKINGTON, a parish in the western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Loughborough, containing, with the township of Hemington, 627 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 7. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late Rev. P. Story. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The navigable river Trent flows along the northern, and the Soar along the eastern, boundary of this parish, at the north-east angle of which they form a junction.

LOCKINGTON, a parish in the Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, containing 426 inhabitants, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Beverley: it comprises part of the township of Aike, and part of that of Lockington, the remaining part being in the parish of Kilnwick. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £20. The Rev. Francis Lundy was patron in 1817. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LOCKWOOD, a chapelry in the parish of ALMONDBURY, upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W.) from Huddersfield, containing 1881 inhabitants. A handsome chapel has recently been erected by the parliamentary commissioners, containing nearly one thousand sittings, four hundred of which are free. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LODDINGTON, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Uppingham, containing, with the liberty of Whatborough, 166 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, and in the patronage of Charles Morris, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

LODDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S.) from Rothwell, containing 214 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10. 4. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a trifling rent-charge, the bequest of Sarah Wykes, in 1705, for teaching eight poor children.

LODDISWELL, a parish in the hundred of STAN-

BOROUGH, county of DEVON, 3 miles (N.N.W.) from Kingsbridge, containing 762 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £26. 0. 2½. Francis Freke Gunston, Esq. was patron in 1824. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. In 1728, R. Phillips bequeathed a house and lands for the benefit of the poor of this parish, the produce of which is annually distributed over the tomb of the testator. Blackadon camp, an ancient military post, is in this neighbourhood.

LODDON, a market town and parish in the hundred of LODDON, county of NORFOLK, 10 miles (S.E.) from Norwich, and 113 (N.E.) from London, containing 1038 inhabitants. This place is situated on the banks of an inconsiderable stream, which flows from the neighbourhood of Howe into the Yare at Yardley cross, on the direct thoroughfare from Norwich to Beccles: the streets are neither lighted nor paved, but the inhabitants are well supplied with water: malting is carried on to a small extent. The market is on Tuesday: fairs are held on Easter-Monday, and on the 25th of November for horses; and a statute fair for hiring servants is held a fortnight before Michaelmas day. The county magistrates hold their meetings monthly at this place. A court baron is held at the will of the lord of the manor. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was erected at the expense of Sir James Hobart, Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in the reign of Henry VII. It is a fine fabric of stone, surmounted by an elegant tower, in the later style of English architecture: in the chancel is a marble altar-tomb of the Hobart family, with heraldic symbols and other devices; and another tomb for Dyonis Williamson, with a recumbent statue. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A National school has been established for children of both sexes, in which about one hundred are educated. A farm was left by the Hobarts for repairing the church.

LODSWORTH, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 3½ miles (W. by N.) from Petworth, containing 513 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant. W. S. Poyntz, Esq. was patron in 1808. The Rother, or Arundel, navigation is crossed by a bridge in this parish.

LOFTHOUSE, a township in the parish of ROTHWELL, lower division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N.) from Wakefield. The population is returned with the township of Carlton.

LOFTHOUSE, a parish in the eastern division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, 8½ miles (E.N.E.) from Guilsbrough, containing, with the hamlet of Wapley, 1178 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 11. 0½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The vicinity abounds with stone and alum rocks, the latter being worked to a considerable extent. A customary market is held on Thursday. At Handale, or Greendale, in this parish, a priory of Benedictine nuns was founded, in 1133, by William de Percy, the third baron of that name, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary; at the dissolution the revenue was valued at £20. 7. 8.

LOFTSOME, a joint township with Wressel, in the parish of WRESSEL, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, 3½ miles (W.N.W.) from Howden. The population is returned with Wressel. This township lies near the Derwent, over which is a wooden bridge, so constructed as to admit the passage of vessels.

LOGASTON, a township in that part of the parish of ALMELEY which is in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD. The population is returned with the parish.

LOLWORTH, a parish in the hundred of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, 6¼ miles (N.W. by W.) from Cambridge, containing 111 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £6. 2. 3½. Sir H. Hawley, Bart., and P. Orchard, Esq., were patrons in 1786. The church is dedicated to All Saints. An extensive destruction of houses and corn, by lightning, occurred here in 1393.

LONDESBOROUGH, a parish in the Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N.) from Market-Weighton, containing, with the hamlet of East Thorpe, 244 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire. The church is dedicated to All Saints. An hospital for twelve poor persons, being aged bachelors, widowers, or widows, was founded here by the first Earl and Countess of Burlington: it is now in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire. Londesborough was, for several generations, the seat of the Clifford family, and in the village, park, and gardens, several Roman coins, and repositories of the dead, have been discovered, on which account, Dr. Drake, considers it to have been the Roman station Delgovitia. The Roman road from Brough is continued in a line to Londesborough park.

338 (S.E.) from Dublin, and contains, including some of the adjoining parishes, 1,225,694 inhabitants, according to the census of 1821; of this number, 56,874 are in the city of London Within the Walls, 69,260 in the city of London Without the Walls (not including any part of the borough of Southwark, in which there are 84,098 inhabitants), and 182,085 in the city and liberties of Westminster: the increase of population during the twenty years preceding the last census was 360,849, and since that period it has been augmenting with greater celerity.

The earliest notice that we find of London, which is now the most important, if not the most extensive, city in the world, is in Julius Cæsar's account of his two exploratory expeditions from Gaul to Britain, styled his Commentaries. Its situation identifies it with the Civitas Trinobantum, or city of the Trinobantes, by which people it was probably selected on account of its peculiarly fine situation: on the north, it was protected by an eminence, a forest, and a morass; on the west, by the deep ravine called the Fleet; on the east, by another ravine, since called Wal-brook; and on the south was the Thames, connected with extensive marshes, sheltered by the Kent and Surrey hills; thus combining, with other advantages, all the natural defences that could be desired by an uncivilized people. At a very early period of its history it was considered peculiarly eligible as a seat of commerce, the proximity to the sea being sufficient to afford the full advantage of the tide, at the same time that the distance was great enough to furnish a perfect security against any sudden attack from the naval force of an enemy. The name Londinium is, according to the most prevailing opinion, a Latinization of the British compound Lyn-din, the town on the lake; the vast æstuary formed by the Thames here, at that time, being a peculiarity attaching to no other British town; whilst Lun-dun, the town in the grove, and Llhong-din, the city of ships, the next two most probable etymons, are liable to insuperable objections, the former name expressing a feature said by Cæsar to have been common to all British towns, which he describes as fortified woods; and the latter being inapplicable before the place became known as a naval station. The Saxons called this city Lunden-ceaster, which affix, as well as those of wick, and byrig or byrig, occasionally used by them in place of it, appears to have been dropped at the time of the Norman Conquest.

The earliest event recorded of London is its destruction by Boadicea, Queen of the Iceni, in the reign of Nero, in the year 60. Its progress since the time of Cæsar had been so rapid, that Tacitus describes it, at this period, as "the chief residence of merchants, and the great mart of trade;" though not then dignified, like Camalodunum (Maldon, or Colchester), and Verulamium (St. Alban's), with the name of a colony, nor, as it appears, fortified in the Roman manner. A few years afterwards, the Romans made it a permanent station, subject to the authority of their own laws. It is agreed to have been surrounded by a wall in the fourth century; and, according to Dr. Stukeley, the Roman city occupied an oblong square, extending in length from Ludgate to Wal-brook, and in breadth, from Maiden-lane, Lad-lane, and Cateaton-street, to the Thames. This space was between the river Fleta, on the west, and the stream called Wal-brook, on the east, and comprised about one-fifth of the area subsequently surrounded by a wall: the height of which, when perfect, was twenty-two feet, throughout its whole circuit: it commenced at the Palatine tower, proceeded in a straight line along the eminence of Ludgate-hill, as far as Newgate, and was then suddenly carried eastward, to a spot a little beyond Aldersgate, running thence straight in a northerly direction, almost as far as Cripplegate, from which spot it returned, in a direct easterly course, as far as Bishopsgate, where a large remnant of the wall, called "London Wall," remained standing until the late removal of Bethlehem hospital. From Bishopsgate the wall assumed a gentle curvature to the Tower, over the site of which it originally passed, and probably finished in a castellum at this, as it did at the western extremity. Another wall skirted the river, and ran the whole length of Thames-street. Strong towers and bastions, of Roman masonry, to the number of fifteen, increased the strength of these fortifications; to which, in after times, was added a broad deep ditch; and at Barbican stood the Specula, or Watch-tower, so named. Four gates afforded entrance from the great military roads which then intersected South Britain: the Prætorian way, improved from the British Watling-street, passed under one of those gates, at the spot where Aldersgate formerly stood; whence it proceeded along that street to Billingsgate, and thence continued, on the opposite bank of the Thames, to its southern termination at Dovor. The Ermin-street led from a trajectus, or ferry, which crossed from Stony-street, Southwark, to Dowgate, and passing by Bishopsgate, pursued the course of the present road northwards, to Ad Fines (Braughing). Another road passed through Newgate, by Holborn and Oxford-street, to Ad Pontes (Staines), from which there was a branch road, in a north-easterly direction, by Portpool-lane, Clerkenwell, Old-street, and Hackney, to Duroleiton, the modern Layton in Essex. Bishopsgate, Moorgate, Ludgate, &c., were added as new roads were formed. Temple-bar is modern, not having been built until after the great fire, in 1670. Roman antiquities, consisting of foundations of houses, temples, walls, and streets; tessellated pavements, sepulchral monuments, urns, glasses, coins, articles of dress, and numerous other remains of the same period, have been discovered on the site of the present metropolis. The London stone, in Cannon-street, is considered, by most antiquaries, as part of a Roman milliard, and the central point from which the great Roman roads diverged.

London continued to improve under the Romans, and had greatly increased in importance before the year 211, when we find it recorded as "a great and wealthy city, illustrious for the vast number of merchants who resorted to it, for its widely-extended commerce, and for the abundance of every species of commodity it could supply." Antoninus, at this period, makes seven of his fifteen itineræ terminate here, and its early importance is further evinced by its having been a municipium, or free city, and the residence of the Vicars of Britain, under the Roman Emperors. In the year 359, no less than eight hundred vessels are said to have been employed in the exportation from London of corn alone, and its commerce is stated to have increased proportionally, until the end of the fourth century. On the abandonment of Britain by the Romans, a new and fierce race succeeded to their dominion. The warlike Saxons, under their leaders Hengist and Horsa, landed, in 448, at Upwines fleet (the present Ebbs-flete), in the Isle of Thanet. The Britons, however, remained masters of London at least nine years after that event; for, being defeated in 457, at Creccanford, now Crayford, they evacuated Kent, and fled to the capital. On Hengist's death, in 498, having then been for some time in the possession of the Saxons, it was retaken by Ambrosius, and retained by the Britons during a considerable part of the following century. In the year 604, London seems to have recovered from the ravages of the invaders, so that Bede terms it "a princely mart town;" and its chief magistrate was called portgrave, or portreeve.

London was the chief town of the Saxon kingdom of Essex, and, on the conversion of the East Saxons to Christianity, it became an episcopal see. Sabert was the first Christian king of Essex; and his maternal uncle, Ethelbert, King of Kent, founded here, about the commencement of the seventh century, a church, dedicated to St. Paul, of which Mellitus was consecrated the first bishop. In the years 764, 788, and 801, the capital suffered severely from fires, as it did also in 849, on an invasion of the Danes, who entered the Thames with two hundred and fifty ships, plundered and burnt the city, and massacred the inhabitants. In a similar attempt with an increased naval force, two years afterwards, they were completely defeated by Ethelwulph and his son Ethelbald; yet London suffered more from these two invasions than it had ever done before. Under Egbert, London, though not the seat of government, was advancing fast in importance, a wittenagemote having been held in 833, to consult on the means of repelling the Danes. Alfred restored this city, and constituted London the CAPITAL of all England, but had the mortification, in 893, to see it almost entirely reduced to ashes by an accidental fire, which raged with the more uncontrollable fury as the houses were, at that time, almost wholly built of wood. It was a second time rebuilt, and, for its better government, divided by Alfred into wards and precincts; that monarch also instituted the office of sheriff in London, as in other parts of the kingdom. In 925, King Athelstan had a royal palace here, and appointed eight mints for the coinage of money. The city increased in importance during the succeeding reigns, until the year 1015, when Canute the Dane, with his fleet, sailed up the Thames and besieged it; but he was repulsed, and after having blockaded it and made several unsuccessful attempts, a compromise was agreed upon between the two kings, Edmund Ironside and Canute, whereby London was conceded to the latter. The comparative opulence of the city, at this time, is indicated by its having paid a seventh part of the tax levied on the whole nation by that monarch, the total amount of which was £72,000. In a wittenagemote at Oxford, to determine the succession after the death of Canute, we find the "pilots of London" summoned thereto, meaning its magistrates, or leading men. Edward the Confessor granted to London the court of Hustings, and by his charter, in which the city is called Tray-novant, gave it pre-eminence over all his cities: he moreover confirmed its right of manumission of slaves who had resided there a year and a day, from which is thought to be derived the custom of calling the city "The King's Free Chamber."

On the successful invasion of England by William the Norman, the magistrates of London, in conjunction with the prelates and nobility, invited him to accept the title of king, and he was crowned at Westminster. In return, that prince granted to the city two charters, confirming the whole of the privileges it had enjoyed under the Saxon kings, and adding several others. The government of London, at this time, appears to have been vested in the bishop and a portreeve. In the year 1077, another fire having destroyed a great part of the city, with St. Paul's cathedral, Maurice, Bishop of London, laid the foundation of a new church, on a more extended scale than the former. That part of the city which had been destroyed by the last-mentioned fire was soon rebuilt more magnificently than before; and the White Tower, now forming part of the Tower of London, was erected by William I., in 1078. Domesday-book contains no notice of London at this time, owing, it is supposed, to a separate survey having been made of it, which is now lost, but mentions, as part of the suburbs, a vineyard in Holborn, in the possession of the crown, and ten acres of land, near Bishopsgate, belonging to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's: the latter is the present manor of Norton-Falgate; and both are now situated within the limits of the metropolis. In 1090, a tremendous hurricane overthrew about six hundred houses, with several churches, and damaged the Tower of London. This fortress was repaired by William Rufus, and strengthened by additional works: the same king, in 1097, founded Westminster hall. Henry I., as a reward for the ready submission of the men of London to his usurped authority, granted to the city the first charter in which its privileges were circumstantially detailed; amongst them were the perpetual shrievalty of Middlesex, which enabled the citizens to unite the power of the two shrievalties of the city of London and of the county of Middlesex, in freemen of their own nomination. The standard of weights and measures was granted to them about the same time; and, by the same king's charter, it was further stipulated, that the city of London should have all its ancient privileges, as well by land as by water. In the first year of the reign of Stephen, another fire, beginning near London stone, consumed all the houses eastward to Aldgate, and westward to St. Paul's, together with London bridge, which was then of wood: this occasioned, in 1192, an order to the mayor and aldermen, that "all houses thereafter erected in the city, or liberties thereof, should be built of stone, with party walls of the same, and covered either with slate or tiles, to prevent the recurrence of fires, which had been occasioned by the houses having been built of wood, and thatched with straw, or reeds;" but this order does not appear to have been extensively carried into effect.

Of the state of London at this early period, an admirable picture is afforded in the description by Fitz-Stephen, a contemporary monk, wherein he informs us that the city was strongly walled and fortified; that it abounded in churches, convents, and public buildings; carried on an extensive commerce with distant parts of the world; and had a large disposable military force. It was supplied with water from numerous wells, among which were Clerkenwell, Clement's well, Holywell, and others. Moorfields was a great lake, the Magna Nora of the Conqueror: all the suburbs are described as being filled with the gardens and summer-houses of the citizens, and watered with streams of pure water, which turned the numerous mills employed in grinding corn for the subsistence of the inhabitants. The chief improvement during the reign of Henry II. was the foundation, in 1176, of a new London bridge, of stone, which was completed in 1209. The year 1189 is memorable in the metropolitan annals for the cruel massacre of the Jews, which took place at the coronation of Richard I. In the year 1210, King John empowered "the barons of London," as they are styled, to choose their mayor annually, or continue him from year to year at pleasure; but in 1252 a by-law was made, ordaining that no one should be mayor longer than one year. In 1212 occurred a tremendous fire, wherein, according to Stowe, as many as three thousand persons perished. In 1214, the Town ditch, surrounding the city walls, was commenced, and, after several hundred persons had been employed upon it for upwards of two years, was completed in 1218. In 1215, the citizens taking part with the barons against King John, opened their gates to Louis the Dauphin and his army. In the same year happened a great fire, which began in Southwark, and extended to London bridge, where it destroyed three thousand persons, who were prevented from escape by another fire breaking out at the Middlesex end of the bridge.

The increase of the metropolis in buildings, from the reign of Henry I. to the period last named, had kept pace with the extension of its municipal privileges. In this interval, of little more than a century, twelve large monasteries were founded in London and its suburbs, including the magnificent establishments of the Knights Templars and the Knights Hospitallers, the superb priory of the Holy Trinity, in Aldgate, whose prior was an alderman of London, and others of nearly equal magnitude. Several additional gates had also been erected, in consequence of the formation of new roads; as well as magnificent mansions built by the wealthy citizens, such as Gerard's Hall, Basing Hall, the Ledyn Porch, &c.; and various parochial churches rebuilt on a grander and more substantial scale. In consequence of the extensive foundations above mentioned, and the increased number of private houses, in the reign of Henry III., the supply of water furnished from Old-bourne (Holborn), Wal-brook, and Ley-bourne, was found insufficient, and a new supply was obtained from the springs in the village of Tyburn; and, in 1285, a conduit in Cheapside was first supplied with this water, by leaden pipes. The fee-farm of Queen-hythe had, previously to this period, been purchased from Richard, Earl of Cornwall, by the corporation, subject to an annual quit-rent of £50, thus affording additional facilities for the increased commerce of the metropolis. In 1258, a dreadful famine was experienced in London, in consequence of the high price of corn, and twenty thousand persons are said to have died of hunger. In 1262, a considerable part of West-cheap was reduced to ashes by a fire wilfully caused by some unknown incendiaries. In 1266, the Earl of Gloucester, in rebellion against Henry III., entered the city with an army, and built bulwarks, cut trenches, &c.

In 1296, in the reign of Edward I., the wards of London, first formed by Alfred, but uncertain as to their number, were extended to twenty-four, with each a presiding alderman, and common council-men appointed to be chosen annually, as at present, for the several precincts: a common seal was also granted to the city. In 1320, a fish-market was first established. In 1325, the Bishop of Exeter, high treasurer to Richard II., and custos of the city, on the king's departure from London to the West of England, was seized by the citizens, and beheaded at the Cross in Cheapside: they afterwards seized the constable of the Tower, and took possession of that fortress. Edward III., who began his reign on the 25th of January, 1327, granted that the mayor should be one of the judges of Oyer and Terminer, or gaol delivery of Newgate; that the citizens should not be compelled to go to war out of the city; and, moreover, that the liberties and franchises of the city should not, after this time, on any pretext, be taken into the king's hands: he also granted that the mayor should be the only escheator within the city. In 1338, the serjeants of the mayor and sheriffs of London were empowered to bear maces of silver gilt, with the king's arms engraven on them, and in 1340, tolls were imposed for paving the streets. In 1348 occurred a great plague; and in the course of the same year, Sir Walter Manny founded the Charter House, near Smithfield, with Pardon churchyard adjoining, to be a place of burial for such as died of it. In 1354, the aldermen of London, having been hitherto changed yearly, it was ordained that they should not be removed without some special cause. In 1356, the opulence of the citizens was strikingly displayed by Henry Piccard, the mayor, feasting at one entertainment the Kings of England, France, Cyprus, and Scotland, with other great personages. In 1380 occurred Wat Tyler's rebellion, when William Walworth, mayor, was knighted in the field, together with several aldermen, for their gallant behaviour on the occasion; and the dagger is said to have been added to the city arms on account of Walworth having killed, with that weapon, the rebel Tyler, in Smithfield. In 1406, London was afflicted with another great plague, which swept away upwards of thirty thousand people. In 1410, Stocks' market-house was erected, on the site of the present mansion-house. In 1416, Sir Henry Barton, mayor, ordained that lanterns, with lights, should be hung out on winter evenings, between Hallowtide and Candlemas; and in the following year this custom was general. In 1417, a new guildhall was built on the site of the present edifice, in lieu of a mean cottage, formerly occupied as such, in Aldermanbury; and in 1419 Leadenhall was erected, as a public granary. The supply of water being found insufficient, in 1443, pipes were laid from Paddington. A few years afterwards the city ditch was cleansed, and the walls repaired. In 1449, the Kentish rebel, Jack Cade, made his entry into London.

About the year 1460 occurs the earliest notice of the use of brick in the buildings of London: this material was first made in Moorfields, and afterwards gradually superseded wood, and became generally used in erecting dwelling-houses. New conduits, and cisterns for water, were also constructed. In 1469, the Tower of London being delivered to the mayor and his brethren, the aldermen, they set at liberty King Henry VI., who was confined there. Under Richard III. and Henry VII. various additions were made to the royal palace at Westminster; and the latter monarch, besides founding his magnificent chapel at the abbey adjoining, also rebuilt Baynard's castle, in Thames-street. In the thirteenth year of his reign, several gardens in Finsbury were destroyed, and formed into a field for archers, whence the origin of the present Artillery Company. During this reign also the river Fleet was made navigable, Houndsditch was arched over, and many less works of utility, or ornament, completed. Henry VIII. continued the improvements of the metropolis; and during his reign the police was better regulated, many nuisances were removed, the streets and avenues were mended and paved, and various regulations were carried into effect for supplying the metropolis with provisions sufficient to answer the demands of its increasing population. The greatest alteration made in the aspect of the city, during this reign, was effected by the dissolution of religious houses, of which there had been upwards of twenty, founded between the reign of Edward I. and the period of the dissolution, besides those before mentioned: this event took place in the year 1535, and rendered London entirely a commercial city. The religious establishments, usually occupying large plots of ground, now gave way to the erection of schools, hospitals, manufactories, noblemen's mansions, and other edifices. There were fifty-four larger monasteries in London at the dissolution, exclusively of minor establishments. Two royal palaces, St. James' and Bridewell, were among the splendid buildings erected by Henry VIII.; and to the same monarch is to be attributed a considerable part of the buildings in New Palace Yard, Westminster, and at Whitehall, particularly the cock-pit, and the fine gateway by Holbein, which formerly stood at the latter palace, as also the laying out of St. James' park. Until the Reformation, the government of Westminster had been vested solely in its abbot, but, in the settlement of that great revolution, it was placed, first in the hands of a bishop, and subsequently in those of the Dean of Westminster, in whom it still, in some degree, continues. Near this period, notwithstanding there had been a recent revival of commerce, and that the metropolis had been enlarged, it is stated that there were not above four merchant vessels exceeding one hundred and twenty tons' burden in the river Thames; and afterwards it is observed, in a letter from a London merchant to Sir William Cecil, that there was "not a city in Europe, having the occupying that London had, that was so slenderly provided with ships:" yet a spirit of enterprise was then very general among our merchants. The events which chiefly characterise the reign of Edward VI., as regards London, are, the conversion of Bridewell palace into an hospital, the refounding of that of St. Thomas, and the completion of Christ's and St. Bartholomew's hospitals, which had been begun by his father; all which establishments still remain, and will hereafter be described. By an act, in the seventh year of this king's reign, for the general regulation of taverns and public-houses, it was directed, that there should be only forty in the city and liberties of London, and three in Westminster. In this reign also Southwark was annexed to London, and constituted a twenty-sixth ward, under the name of "Bridge ward Without."

The commencement of Elizabeth's reign was distinguished by the building of the Royal Exchange, and various other works of public utility. In the year 1580, from the great increase of the city, that queen prohibited the erection of any new buildings within three miles of the city gates, and ordained that only one family should inhabit each house. Another proclamation, in 1583, commanded that no new building should be erected within three miles of London and Westminster, that one dwelling-house should not be converted into two or more, and that the commons within three miles of London should not be enclosed. At this period, notwithstanding the danger that was anticipated by increasing the size of the metropolis, it appears, from contemporary plans, that the greater part of London was contained within the walls, and even in those narrow limits there were numerous gardens, upon the sites of which have since been formed lanes, courts, and alleys. In the whole of the space now constituting the parishes of St. Margaret, Westminster; St. Martin in the Fields; St. Paul, Covent Garden; St. Anne, Soho; St. Giles in the Fields; St. George, Bloomsbury; and even including the extensive parish of St. Mary le bone, there were not at that time two thousand houses. All the north side of the city, continuing through Clerkenwell, as far as Shoreditch church, was very thinly scattered with dwellings; the whole of Spitalfields, Goodman's fields, Bethnalgreen, and Stepney and Limehouse fields, were, what their names import, open spaces of ground, having here and there groups of cottages and gardens: and on the Surrey side of the river, with the exception of the borough of Southwark, Bermondsey, and part of Lambeth parish next to the Thames, the entire space was devoid of houses. In 1594, the Thames water was first conveyed into houses, by means of an engine of a pyramidal form, erected at Broken wharf, to which succeeded the "London-bridge Water-Works;" and, in 1613, that great public benefit, the New River, which was projected and executed by Sir Hugh Myddelton, was brought to its head at Clerkenwell, from Amwell in Hertfordshire. In 1616, the sides of the principal streets, which had before been laid with pebbles, were paved with broad stones and flags.

Building continued to advance after the death of Elizabeth; and we find that most part of Spitalfields and about three hundred and twenty acres to the south and south-east of it, were then covered with houses. James I., alarmed at this rapid growth of the metropolis, issued his proclamation, in 1618, against the erection of new buildings. The suburbs, notwithstanding, had greatly increased in 1640, especially to the westward, in the parishes of St. Giles in the Fields, and St. Paul, Covent Garden. In 1643, Cheapside cross was demolished, by the authority of the common council, as a relic of superstition, thus increasing unintentionally the width and accommodation of that great central thoroughfare. Another attempt was made, during the Protectorate, in 1656, to prevent the enlargement of the metropolis; for which purpose, all houses built since the year 1620, within ten miles of it, were taxed, and fines were imposed on those who raised new buildings within that distance. About 1661, a great many streets, on the site of St. James' parish, were built, or finished, particularly St. James' street, Pall-Mall, and Piccadilly; other streets were ordered to be widened; and candles, or lights in lanterns, were to be hung out by the occupier of every house fronting the street, between Michaelmas and Lady-day, from night-fall until nine o'clock, when it was presumed that people retired to bed. The dreadful plague, in 1665, put a temporary stop to the increase of the metropolis. This infection was generally thought to have been brought from Holland, about the close of the year 1664, and made its appearance in the neighbourhood of Drury-lane: sixty-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-six persons are calculated to have perished in the course of the year 1665, during which, London was so far deserted by its inhabitants, that grass grew in the principal streets.

"The great fire of London," the most terrible conflagration that the metropolis ever suffered, succeeded "the Plague year," as it is emphatically styled: it broke out on Sunday, the 2nd of September, 1666, at the house of a baker in Pudding-lane, Thames-street. The houses being then for the most part of wood, with projecting stories, the uppermost of which, from the narrowness of the streets, almost met each other, and a strong easterly wind blowing at the time, the fire spread rapidly and continued raging until Thursday, when it was nearly extinguished, having destroyed thirteen thousand two hundred houses, and eighty-nine churches, exclusively of the venerable Cathedral of St. Paul, the greater part of the corporation halls, London bridge, and other public edifices, covering a plot of four hundred and thirty-six acres of ground with ruins. The value of the property involved in this destruction was calculated at upwards of £10,000,000. To perpetuate the remembrance of this melancholy event, "The Monument," on Fish-street-hill, was erected, by order of parliament: it was commenced in 1671, and finished in 1677, from a design by Sir Christopher Wren, and is composed wholly of Portland stone. The column, rising from a pedestal forty feet high, and twenty-eight square at the base, is two hundred and two feet in height from the pavement; it is fluted, and of the Doric order: within is a staircase of black marble, leading to the summit. Above the capital of the column is a balcony of iron, encompassing a meta thirty-two feet high, supporting a blazing urn of brass gilt. On three sides of the pedestal are inscriptions, and on the fourth an emblematical representation, commemorative of the object of its erection. In rebuilding the city, many improvements were effected: the streets, which were before so narrow that, according to Sir William Davenant's facetious remark, "they seemed to have been contrived in the days of wheelbarrows," were widened; many conduits and other obstructions were removed; and the buildings in general were constructed on a more substantial and regular plan. An increased number of houses, amounting to nearly four thousand, was added, by building on the sites of the gardens belonging to the halls and merchants' residences; and although the noble plans of Wren and Evelyn, for rebuilding the metropolis, were rejected, it arose, on the whole, with increased splendour. In 1670, an act was passed for widening the streets, and for restoring the navigation of the Fleet ditch. An order in council, issued in 1674, prohibited the building of new houses. Many houses in Southwark having been destroyed by an extensive fire, in 1676, an act was passed for rebuilding them of brick, instead of wood.

In 1685, the population in Spitalfields and St. Giles' was much increased by the settlement of French Protestant manufacturers, who had left their native country in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes; and the same year, the western suburbs increasing, two new parishes were formed, namely, those of St. Anne, Soho, and St. James, both which were previously parts of the parish of St. Martin in the Fields. In 1689, the district called the Seven Dials was built on a spot called Cock and Pye Fields. In consequence of the great increase of the commerce and shipping of London, the suburbs to the east of the Tower were become so populous in 1694, that a new parish was constituted, by the name of St. John, Wapping. Soho-square and Golden-square were built at the close of this century. At this time, also, that useful institution called the Penny Post had its origin, a proof of the enlargement of the capital; and the number of hackney coaches, which, in Cromwell's time had been limited to three hundred, had increased to nine hundred, exclusively of two hundred sedan chairs. A few years afterwards, in the reign of Queen Anne, fifty new churches were erected in the metropolis and its vicinity. In 1722, the Chelsea Water-Works Company was established, for supplying the city of Westminster and the western suburbs with water. In a few years afterwards, Hanover-square, Cavendish-square, and the streets adjacent; Bedford-row, Red-Lion-square, Hatton Garden, &c., were built. The streets from Leicester-square and St. Martin's-lane to the Haymarket and Soho, and thence nearly to Knightsbridge, were finished in the reign of George II. In 1729, the north side of Oxford-street was partly built, and many streets near it were completed. In 1730, the hamlet of Spitalfields became so populous, in consequence of the prosperity of the silk manufacture, as to make it necessary to form it into a distinct parish, which received the name of Christ Church. About the same period the parishes of St. George in the East, St. Anne, Limehouse, and St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, were separated from Stepney, and the parish of St. Luke was formed out of that of St. Giles, in Farringdon ward Without.

The improvements in the construction of the buildings, and in the local regulations of the metropolis, during the period last described, and principally in the reign of George III., were as follows. About the year 1760, most of the city gates were taken down. In 1762, an act was passed to remove the shop-signs, which, projecting from almost every house into the middle of the street, materially obstructed the light and air; and at the same time the water-spouts, which projected in like manner, were taken down: by this act also, the names of the streets were ordered to be affixed at the corners of each. In the building of dwelling-houses great improvement, both as regarded safety and uniformity of appearance, was effected, by the Building Act. In 1768, commissioners were appointed by act of parliament for paving, cleansing, lighting, and watching the streets, and for regulating the stands of hackney coaches. In 1774, an act was passed for placing fire-cocks in the water-pipes, with conspicuous notices of their distances and situations, and for keeping fire-engines and ladders in every parish. About 1795, in pursuance of an act of parliament authorising a lottery for the purpose, called "The City Lottery," Snowhill, and the western side of Temple bar, were materially widened and improved. During this period also, several new companies were established for supplying the metropolis with water, and subsequently for lighting the streets, shops, &c., with gas.

London is eminently fortunate in being situated on rising ground, and on a river of ample extent, which, flowing through the town, is agitated twice in twenty-four hours, by a tide which ascends fifteen miles above it. The mean breadth of the Thames here is about four hundred yards, and is crossed by five magnificent stone bridges, besides a sixth of cast-iron: the river, by its winding in this part of its course, greatly contributes, not only to the embellishment, but to the healthful ventilation, of the metropolis. Occupying a gentle slope on the north side of the river, which extends from east to west in a kind of amphitheatre, together with a level tract on the southern bank, it is surrounded on every side, for nearly twenty miles, by thickly-scattered villages and seats. The streets are regularly paved, having a central carriage way, and a foot-path on each side; the pavement of the former is composed of small square blocks of Scotch granite, and the latter is laid with large flags: some of the wider streets in the western part of the metropolis are Macadamized. The foot-paths are in general broad, particularly those of the principal thoroughfares, and have a regular curb-stone, raised some inches above the carriage way, which latter has a slight convexity in the middle, to allow the water to pass off into channels on each side. Underneath are large vaulted sewers, communicating with every house by smaller ones, and with every street by convenient openings and gratings, to carry off to the river all impurities that can be conveyed in that manner. All mud and rubbish accumulating on the surface of the streets are taken away by scavengers employed for that purpose. Nearly all the streets and principal shops are lighted with gas, supplied by several incorporated companies. Almost the whole of the houses, those of ancient date excepted, are constructed of brick; the more modern and larger edifices being built of stone, or stuccoed to resemble it. Excellent water is plentifully conveyed from the Thames and the New River reservoirs to almost every house; spring water is obtained from pumps, erected in various parts of the town.

Strictly speaking, London is still confined within its ancient bounds, and the limits of the corporate jurisdiction of the city; but as a continuity of buildings has connected it with Westminster, Southwark, and all the neighbouring villages and hamlets, the name is, in common usage, given to them all collectively, their respective proper names being no more than sub-divisions of one great metropolis. In this general view, therefore, London may be said to consist of several divisions, viz.:

"The City," properly so called, comprehends the most ancient and central part of London, and is almost exclusively occupied by shops, warehouses, and public offices devoted to business. The East End of the Town includes Wapping, Shadwell, Ratcliffe-highway, &c., extending from Tower hill, eastward, to the East India Docks; the inhabitants of this large district being in general connected with the shipping interests, and consisting of shipwrights, ship-owners, and captains of vessels, merchants, sailors, shop keepers, and others, who are supported by the business of the port. This division of London has, within the last thirty years, assumed an importance unknown to preceding ages, and vast commercial docks and warehouses have been here constructed. The West End is the most modern and elegant part of London: it is inhabited by the nobility and gentry, and is the seat of Government and of the Court, as well as the centre of fashion; and consists principally of handsome squares and streets: it may be said to extend westward from the meridian of Charing Cross. Southwark, which lies on the south bank of the Thames, comprehends five parishes, connected with others by extensive ranges of houses. Its population chiefly consists of merchants, traders, and manufacturers. It had formerly only one main street, called the Borough High-street, extending from London bridge towards Newington, but the increase of buildings has since added numerous others, stretching in various directions, and has formed it into a town, several miles in extent.

That part of the metropolis lying on the north-west, and which may be considered as the latest enlargement, and the most elegant, as well as the most systematic in its arrangement of squares and streets, comprehends an immense mass of new buildings between Holborn and Somers-town, and in the parishes of St. Mary-le-bone and Paddington. Besides which, the villages of Chelsea, Knightsbridge, Paddington, Camden-town, Pentonville, Islington, Mile-End, Limehouse, Rotherhithe, Bermondsey, Newington, Camberwell, Lambeth, &c., united, from the contiguity of their buildings, may be considered as appendages to this immense capital. Thus regarded, the extent of London, from west to east, along the banks of the Thames, or, from the upper end of Knightsbridge to the lower end of Poplar, is seven miles and a half, and its breadth from north to south, or from Islington to Kennington, is about five miles and a half; its circumference is full thirty miles, hence it may be fairly estimated, that the buildings of this metropolis cover at least twenty square miles, extending in length seven miles. This space contains between eight thousand and nine thousand streets and smaller avenues, more than seventy squares, and one hundred and seventy thousand houses, besides an immense number of public buildings. The town, in the direction of east and west, is traversed by two principal ranges of streets, which may be termed the great southern and northern lines, forming a communication from one end to the other. The most southern of them, for the greater part of its course, runs within a quarter of a mile of the Thames: it commences at Knightsbridge, and is continued, under successive names, to the Tower, and thence by Ratcliffe-highway to the extremity of Shadwell. The northern line commences on the west at Tyburn, and is continued to Whitechapel, and Mile-End, and thence may be said to extend as far as Stratford-le-Bow, a course of nearly eight miles. The streets running north and south, which connect the above-mentioned lines, are comparatively short, as are also those from the southern line to the river. Those from the northern line to the New-road are longer; but, with the exception of Tottenham-Court-road, and its continuation to Camden-town, St. John's street, to the extremity of Islington, and Bishopsgate-street, Shoreditch, and some others, are all of moderate length. The longest single street in the metropolis is Oxford-street, the length of which is two thousand three hundred yards; the Commercial-road, extending from the back of Whitechapel church to the East India Docks, is more than double that length, but its buildings are not yet entirely continuous. Portland-place is the widest street in London, and at the same time the most magnificent: the one which ranks next to it, for breadth and the varied elegance of its buildings, is the newly-formed Regent-street, as continued from Portland-place, by the Quadrant and Waterloo-place, to St. James' Park.

The environs are greatly enhanced in beauty by a chain of hills to the north of the town, forming a second amphitheatre, entirely enclosing the first, of which Hampstead, Highgate, and Muswell hills, are the most prominent features. On the east and west are extensive plains, stretching twenty miles, in each direction, along the banks of the Thames, and forming a most fertile, populous, and interesting valley; those which lie eastward of the town feeding numerous herds of cattle, and those westward being chiefly employed in the production of vegetables for the supply of the London market. That part of the metropolis which is situated south of the Thames occupies a flat surface, bounded by a landscape beautifully varied from west to east by the heights of Richmond, Wimbledon, Epsom, Norwood, and Blackheath, and terminating in the horizon with Leith hill, Box hill, the Reigate hills, the Wrotham hills, and Shooter's hill. On every side the approaches are spacious and kept in admirable order, and, like the town, lighted at night with gas, and well watched and patrolled. Country houses of opulent merchants and tradesmen, or the mansions of the nobility, standing detached and surrounded by plantations, or arranged together in successive handsome rows, are every where to be seen, either on the sides, or in the vicinity, of these roads, together with numerous villages, some of which imitate the commercial activity of the metropolis.

The increase of London since the commencement of the present century has exceeded, if possible, that of the last in celerity and extent. It is visible on all sides, but perhaps more especially so on the western and northern, where the buildings in the parishes of Paddington, St. Mary-le-bone, Bloomsbury, and St. Pancras, have been amazingly extended, by the formation of an incredible number of new streets, squares, and places, for the most part after elegant designs. In the same quarter of the town also, the Regent's park has been laid out, and surrounded with stately ranges of brick buildings, stuccoed so as to resemble stone. A great number of excellent residences has been lately completed on the space behind Gower-street, formerly called the Long Fields, and these again are adjoined eastward by the new church of St. Pancras, and the elegant streets in its neighbourhood, together with a continued mass of building, extending along the south side of the New-road, and the City-road, as far as Old-street. On the Southwark side of the Thames is Newington, with the streets adjacent to it, connecting Camberwell with Southwark; while Kennington, Brixton, Clapham, and Battersea-fields, have numerous, extensive, and continually-increasing, ranges of building. Proceeding along the outskirts, towards the east, we perceive the village of Islington to have joined London on one side, St. Pancras on the other, and to have stretched itself over the White Conduit fields (formerly celebrated amongst our early places of amusement) to the hamlet of Holloway, and through that link to Highgate and Hornsey. In the parishes of Shoreditch, Hackney, Stratford-le-Bow, &c., the extent of buildings has every where immensely increased; and at the direct eastern extremity of London are the East and West India, the London, and the St. Katherine's, docks. On viewing the surface of the parishes of Rotherhithe, Bermondsey, Walworth, Newington, Camberwell, and Lambeth, on the south side of London, much ground is yet occupied as fields or gardens; these parishes may be said, however, to form an immense connected town in many places, and are again joined to Deptford and Greenwich, to the east; and Peckham, Stockwell, Clapham, Battersea, &c., to the south and south-west. As evidence of the great extent of building mentioned, it is conjectured that, within the last fifty years, sixty thousand houses, at least, have been erected in London and its neighbourhood; and that these afford habitations for nearly three hundred thousand additional persons.

The improvements at the west end of the town include the widening of the Strand, &c.; the new and elegant buildings on the site of Carlton House and gardens; the laying-out of St. James' Park, and various alterations and buildings in the interior, and at the entrances to Hyde Park; the immense mass of new streets and mansions on the north side of Pimlico, and various additions to the buildings of the Regent's Park and its neighbourhood, as well as on the intermediate space connecting Westminster with St. Mary-le-bone, formed by the fine line of Regent-street, and the various branch streets and places leading from it. The Strand Improvements extend to the whole neighbourhood, between the King's mews and St. Martin's lane, and beyond to the north boundary of Chandos-street, reaching westward to the Strand, and having its eastern termination beyond the late Exeter 'Change. To correspond with the beautiful edifices of the Union Club-house, and the College of Physicians at Pall-Mall (East), there is to be an elegant opposite range of buildings, consisting of a row of public offices, to form a new metropolitan police station, instead of the present inconvenient one at Bow-street, and which will extend in a line with St. Martin's church: the cemetery of the latter will be railed in, and adjoined by the vicarage-house and parochial schools, and the whole, with the noble portico of St. Martin's church, will be thrown open from Pall-Mall: the north side, where was the Royal Riding-house, is to be occupied by a new National Gallery and Royal Academy, and the south side of this quadrangle to lay open to Charing Cross. The grand line of street is to be from West to East, by Pall-Mall, passing the front of the National Gallery, and is to enter the Strand facing Hungerford-street, the Strand being widened as far as the New church, to a road-way of sixty feet. Another wide carriage way is to run from the new line of street into Leicester-square, through Hemming's row; and there is to be a second communication between Castle-court and Bedford-street; as well as a fine new street continued over the site of the late English Opera-house, in a line with Waterloo-place and bridge, to meet Great Charlotte-street, Bloomsbury. The open spaces of ground contiguous to St. Martin's church, &c., will be formed into squares. It is calculated that nearly two millions of money are necessary to carry these several improvements into effect. The alterations on the site of Carlton House and gardens consist in the erection of a corresponding side, or completion of the square begun by Waterloo-place, and will form a commodious communication between Regent-street and St. James' Park.

The latest improvements in building, in the vicinity of Whitehall, include the entire renovation of the front of Whitehall chapel, and Mr. Soane's erection opposite for the Council-office, Board of Trade, &c.: the latter exhibits a long row of stone columns, with an enriched entablature and parapet, possessing considerable elegance, but justly found fault with as being too low, and wanting a balancing end on the north, for which there is no space but by destroying the fine line of street of Whitehall. Richmond-terrace is an elegant row of first-rate mansions, built on the site of the late Richmond House. Belgrave-square and Wilton-crescent, erected on that part of Chelsea called the Five Fields, are both exceedingly elegant: the former contains four symmetrical rows of first-rate houses, with spacious isolated villas at the angles, the whole being partly stuccoed and partly of stone, ornamented in the Corinthian order. Before the houses in the crescent, which are also first-rate in size and appearance, there is a handsome plantation, communicating right and left with the square: a foot and carriage road have been completed from Knightsbridge to the King's road, for the convenience of the occupants of these new buildings, which are mostly inhabited by the nobility and gentry. Eaton-square, of an oblong form, adjoins the preceding, and contains buildings of nearly equal splendour, together with a new, spacious, and handsome church at its east end. Of these improvements, effected at the expense of Earl Grosvenor, Belgrave-square alone is reckoned to have cost half a million of money.

To particularise the public buildings included in the above-mentioned improvements would far exceed the limits of this article; but their number and consequence may be inferred from the circumstance that no less than fifty new churches have been erected, by the commissioners appointed under the late act of parliament, all having districts allotted to them, many of which already contain a vast and daily increasing population. So numerous are the improvements constantly being projected and carried into effect, that scarcely a month passes in which there is not brought forward some plan of elegant embellishment, of public or private utility, or of civil or commercial advantage. In size, population, and wealth; in the extent, grandeur, and number of its religious edifices, its public establishments, its charitable institutions, its commercial docks, and its bridges; in the elegance of its squares, and the commodiousness of its habitations, the superiority of the English metropolis over that of every other country is manifest.

ROYAL PALACES AND HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

St. James' is the only royal palace in the metropolis now in a habitable state. It is an ancient building, and though, from the irregularity of its parts, its appearance is not imposing, yet, from its great extent, and the number of fine apartments it comprises, it is said to be the best adapted for royal parade of any in Europe. Carlton House, the splendid residence of his late Majesty George IV., when Prince of Wales, has been recently demolished for the purpose of effecting the "Park Improvements;" and on the site of Buckingham House, the palace of the late Queen Charlotte, a new royal residence is now being erected, by Mr. Nash, to be called St. George's palace: this is of great extent, and, when completed, will consist of a centre and large wings projecting from it at right angles, forming, with the principal entrance, which is a detached marble gateway of great cost and splendour, a spacious and magnificent quadrangle. The Lords' and Commons' houses of parliament occupy parts of the old palace of Westminster, which, though possessing a certain degree of splendour, are chiefly venerable for their age and the purposes to which they are appropriated. The House of Lords is a large oblong room, formerly the Court of Requests, and was fitted up for its present purpose on the union with Ireland, when the fine tapestry of the old House of Lords, representing the defeat of the Spanish Armada, was removed hither, and the apartment was otherwise handsomely and appropriately decorated: at the upper end of the room is the throne, which has been renovated in a style of great magnificence: a new entrance has lately been added, with a superb staircase and gallery by Mr. Soane. The House of Commons was originally the chapel of St. Stephen, out of which it has been formed chiefly by raising a floor above the pavement, and adding an inner roof, considerably below the ancient one. On removing the wainscot, when this room was lately enlarged, great part of the ancient decorations were discovered: they are of extreme beauty, but were again closed up. In its present state the House of Commons is a large plain apartment, of which the Speaker's chair, with its appendages, forms the chief decoration: around it are galleries, supported by slender iron columns with gilt capitals, into one of which, namely, that at the lower end, over the bar of the house, strangers are admitted to hear the debates. The house is wainscoted to the ceiling; and the benches for the members rise in regular gradation behind each other.

THE PARKS, SQUARES, &c.

St. James' Park, so called from the palace of the same name, contains about two hundred acres, the central part being laid out in a pleasing manner, and varied with water, shrubberies, and intersecting gravel walks, and the sides adorned with several avenues of stately trees. The eastern extremity of the park is occupied by the Horse Guards, the Treasury, and other government offices, which have a noble appearance; the ground plot of the entire park is an oblong, and nearly two miles in circuit. The King's foot guards, with a fine band of music, parade every day, between ten and eleven o'clock, opposite the park front of the Horse Guards. The Green Park is a triangular piece of ground, lying south of the western part of Piccadilly, and adjoining St. James' Park and the gardens of Buckingham House. On the north side of it is a large basin, with a promenade round it, near which is the Ranger's house, embowered in a fine plantation, which adds greatly to the beauty of the prospect. Hyde Park, which extends from the western extremity of the metropolis to the walls of Kensington Gardens, contains about four hundred acres. It is a spot of great rural beauty, the drives round it forming one of the chief amusements of the gay and fashionable. The Serpentine river, which adorns the lower part of it, is a large bending sheet of water. Near the Piccadilly corner of Hyde Park stands a colossal bronze statue of Achilles, erected in honour of the Duke of Wellington, on a pedestal of granite. The entrances to this park have been greatly improved within the last few years: at the Piccadilly entrance a handsome screen of the Ionic order, consisting of three arches, united by an open colonnade, with two side arches, has been erected; facing it is a new and magnificent arched gateway, (in imitation of the arch of Severus at Rome, the architecture from the temple of Jupiter Stator, in the same city,) leading into the gardens belonging to the King's palace in St. James' Park. Kensington Gardens are beautiful and extensive pleasure grounds attached to the palace at Kensington, and were formerly part of Hyde Park: they are open to all well-dressed people, and the promenade in them forms one of the most delightful and fashionable amusements of the metropolis during the months of summer. The Regent's Park is a newly-formed park, on the site of what was formerly Mary-le-bone fields, containing about four hundred and fifty acres. For the magnificence of the buildings by which it is surrounded, and the picturesque style in which it is laid out, this park indisputably excels the others, and it will do so in a still greater degree as the trees with which it is planted approach maturity.

The residences of the nobility, though formerly scattered all over the town, and more especially along the banks of the Thames, from the Temple to Whitehall, have long been removed, almost exclusively to the western portion of it. The largest and most elegant of them are, Apsley House, the residence of the Duke of Wellington; Devonshire House, the residence of the Duke of Devonshire; and Burlington House, that of Lord Cavendish; all in Piccadilly: Cleveland House, the Marquis of Stafford's; Earl Spencer's, St. James' Place; Lord Grenville's, in the Green Park; Marlborough House, Pall Mall, the residence of Prince Leopold; Northumberland House, Charing-Cross, that of the Duke of Northumberland; the Marquis of Lansdowne's, in Berkeley-square; Chesterfield House, the Earl of Chesterfield's, in May Fair; and Uxbridge House, Burlington-gardens, that of the Marquis of Anglesey. Great numbers of the nobility and gentry, who have not separate detached mansions like those above mentioned, have spacious and, in many instances, superb residences in the grand squares. The principal of these are, Grosvenor, Portman, Berkeley, St. James', Hanover, Manchester, Cavendish, Bedford, Russell, Bloomsbury, Montagu, Bryanston, and Leicester Squares, and Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; all which contain large and elegant houses. They may be noticed, according to their respective architectural merits, in the following order:

Grosvenor Square has a finely-planted area of six acres, surrounded by magnificent houses. It derives its name from having been erected at the expense of Sir Richard Grosvenor, Bart., and constitutes part of the present Earl Grosvenor's immense estates in this vicinity. In the centre is a fine gilt equestrian statue of George I., placed there in 1726. Portman Square, finished in 1784, ranks next to the preceding. Its planted area is laid out with great taste and richness, and the houses are of the first order of domestic architecture. Montagu House, which stands beyond the north-west angle, forms an elegant addition to the whole, and is remarkable for having been the residence of the literary and talented Mrs. Montagu. Russell Square is likewise surrounded by elegant buildings, and has in the centre a perfect miniature landscape garden, laid out with every regard to taste and variety. It is adorned with a finely-executed statue of the late Duke of Bedford, in bronze, by Westmacott, Jun. Fitzroy Square, if finished in accordance with the two sides already built, would, from the elegance of its buildings and the materials of which they are constructed, probably form the most elegant square in the metropolis. The houses are fronted with stone, and are in the best taste of those excellent architects the Adams's. Cavendish, Bedford, and Manchester Squares, are all surrounded by buildings of a uniform and handsome appearance, the residences of persons of the higher ranks, each comprising a beautiful planted area. In the first, which was planned so long ago as 1715, is a gilt equestrian statue of the conqueror at Culloden, William, Duke of Cumberland. St. James' Square is small, but inhabited by some of the principal nobility. At Norfolk House, in this square, George III. was born. In the centre is a fine equestrian bronze statue of King William III. Bloomsbury Square is chiefly remarkable for the fine statue of that distinguished statesman, Charles James Fox, which is of colossal size, and of bronze. The figure is in a sitting posture, in the habit of a Roman senator, and is placed on the north side, facing an elegant street, which leads up to the statue of the Duke of Bedford, in Russell-square. Berkeley Square has on its south side the noble mansion of Lansdowne House, half enveloped in fine gardens and plantations. Leicester Square contains a gilt equestrian statue of George I., and formerly possessed a degree of fashionable attraction which it has now lost, having at that time included Leicester and Saville Houses, the former having been the residence of Frederick, Prince of Wales, father of George III.: and the latter, that of the celebrated Sir George Saville. The largest of the squares near this quarter of the town is Lincoln's-Inn-Square, commonly called Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. The whole of its western side is composed of the masterly erections of Inigo Jones, amongst which is the fine mansion formerly called Lindsey, and afterwards Ancaster House. On the eastern side is seen the beautiful range of law chambers called Stone Buildings, which overlooks the gardens of Lincoln's Inn.

On the south side is Surgeons' Hall, a handsome new erection; and on the north side the elegant house of Mr. Soane, the architect. This square was once inhabited by the first nobility, at the time that Newcastle House, one of the largest mansions which it comprises, was the residence of the Duke of Newcastle, Prime Minister to George II. The centre of the square contains the most spacious and finely-planted area of any square in the metropolis.

Queen-square, Holborn; Golden-square, Piccadilly; Red Lion-square; Soho-square: and in the north-eastern part of the town, Finsbury-square, Finsbury-circus, and numerous others, though not in the very first style of architecture, are all spacious and ornamental. It may be observed, that the squares west of Tottenham-Court-road are chiefly occupied by the nobility and gentry; whilst those east of that line are for the most part the residence of merchants and professional men.

Portland Place was, some years ago, almost the only street that, in point of width, length, and the uniform grandeur and elegance of its buildings, would have been worthy of especial notice. But the construction of the new line of street extending northwards from the site of Carlton House, under the names of Waterloo Place, the Quadrant, and Regent-street, and communicating with Portland-place by means of Langham-place, forms a new era in our domestic architecture; and for vast length, width, and uniform elegance, this immense range of buildings, as a whole, is not exceeded by any in Europe. Carlton-terrace, now being built on the site of Carlton House, promises, when completed, to vie in elegance with the noble avenue last named; and eastward of the fine street called Pall-Mall, an opening has been formed, to obtain a vista for the noble portico of St. Martin's church. Beyond this church, on the north side of the Strand, from the site of Exeter 'Change, lately demolished, westward, the Strand improvements are in progress, which will give to the whole neighbourhood a character of magnificence that it did not before in any degree possess. Nor is there a doubt that the example which has been set in the western and northern parts of the town, and in various parts of the city, will soon be followed in other neighbourhoods, and give, at no distant date, an entire new face of beauty to the principal streets and thoroughfares of the metropolis.

THEATRES AND PLACES OF AMUSEMENT.

The King's Theatre, or Italian Opera-House. This magnificent theatre, situated at the bottom of the Haymarket, on the western side, is appropriated exclusively to the performance of Italian operas, and ballets, in both which some of the most eminent vocal and instrumental performers and dancers in Europe are engaged, at very high salaries. The original edifice was burnt down in 1790, soon after which it was rebuilt, though externally it was not completed till 1818, after a design by Mr. Nash. It is built of brick cased with stucco, and is surrounded by a colonnade supported on cast-iron pillars of the Doric order: the front is decorated with figures in bas relief, representing the origin and progress of music, executed in 1821. The interior consists of a stage sixty feet long and eighty broad; five tiers of boxes, all of them either private property, or rented for the season, and affording accommodation to about nine hundred persons; a spacious pit and a gallery, with room in each for eight hundred spectators; a grand concert-room, ninety-five feet long, forty-six broad, and thirty-five high, with dressing and other apartments, entrances, staircases, &c., rendering it nearly equal in magnitude to the celebrated theatre of La Scala, at Milan: the fronts of the boxes are embellished, in compartments, with various emblematical designs, and the ceiling is adorned with a painting of the Nine Muses. The season usually commences in January, and continues until August, operas being constantly performed on Tuesdays and Saturdays, and of late, towards the close of the season, on Thursdays, during that period.

Drury-lane Theatre, situated in Brydges-street, had its origin in a cock-pit, which was converted into a place of theatrical entertainment, and pulled down and rebuilt, under the name of the Phoenix, in the reign of James I. A patent for dramatic performances having been granted by Charles II. to Killigrew, a new theatre was erected on the site of the present structure, and the actors having belonged to the king's household, their successors at this house have ever since been styled "His Majesty's Servants." This theatre was burnt in 1671, and rebuilt by Sir Christopher Wren, but was displaced, in 1793, by a much larger one, from a design by Holland, which, however, was burnt down in 1809, and the present edifice erected, in 1811, under the superintendence of Mr. B. Wyatt: the exterior is very plain: the front is of the Doric order, and the portico, supporting a statue of Shakspeare, was added in 1820: a new colonnade, along the side extending from Brydges-street to Drury-lane, is in contemplation: the building is the property of a number of shareholders. The interior of the house, which was rebuilt in 1822, is on a scale of great splendour: the grand entrance is through a spacious hall, supported by columns of the Doric order, leading to a rotunda, from which staircases ascend to the boxes: there are three tiers of boxes, besides others on each side of the lower gallery, and some on a level with the pit, affording together room for one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight spectators: the pit, over the centre of which hangs an elegant chandelier of cut glass, with gas-burners, is capable of accommodating eight hundred persons, the lower gallery six hundred and seventy-five, and the upper gallery three hundred and eight, making a total of three thousand six hundred and eleven persons. The stage, in front, is forty-three feet in width, and thirty-eight in height; and the height of the house, from the floor of the pit to the ceiling, is fifty feet and a half. The grand saloon is a handsome room, circular at each end, and about eighty-six feet in length.

Covent-Garden Theatre, situated in Bow-street, was established by Sir W. D'Avenant, who received a patent in 1662, under which successive companies acted at the theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, until the erection of the original theatre in Covent-Garden in 1733, which was burnt down in 1808, the present magnificent structure having been opened Sept. 18th, 1809. It stands in an isolated situation, and is nearly of a square form, being built, from a design by Mr. Smirke, Jun., in the Doric order, in imitation of the Temple of Minerva, situated in the Acropolis at Athens, at an expense of £150,000. In the centre of the principal front is a lofty portico of four large fluted baseless columns, elevated on a noble flight of steps, and supporting an enriched entablature and triangular pediment, on the tympanum of which are statues of Tragedy and Comedy by Flaxman: on each side of the portico is a basso relievo, representing the ancient and the modern drama. The entrance to the boxes is by a grand staircase adorned with Ionic columns, having Grecian lamps suspended between them, leading to an ante-room in which is a statue of Shakspeare, by Rossi, and from which a small flight of steps leads to the lobby forming the entrance to the boxes: there are three tiers of boxes, a spacious pit, and lower and upper galleries: over the centre of the pit hangs a magnificent chandelier of cut-glass. The house, it is computed, will afford accommodation to upwards of three thousand persons, and the receipts, in one night, may amount, at the highest calculation, to more than £900.

The Haymarket Theatre, situated in the Haymarket, was erected originally in 1702. The present edifice was opened in 1821, having been built from a design by Mr. Nash: in front is a portico of six Corinthian columns, supporting a pediment, above which are nine circular windows, connected by sculptured ornaments. The interior contains two tiers of boxes, and a row of boxes on each side of the pit, with two galleries, and is much smaller than any of the above-mentioned theatres, but exceedingly neat and compact within. It is licensed for the performance of regular dramas during the summer, at which period only it is open. The other minor establishments, most of which are summer theatres, are, the English Opera-House, or Lyceum, in the Strand, opened June 15th, 1816, and lately considerably damaged by fire, which has afforded an opportunity of carrying into effect the long-projected improvement of forming a new road in the line of the Waterloo bridge road, to the vicinity of Bedford-square; the Adelphi Theatre, also situated in the Strand, and formerly called the "Sans Pareil;" the Royal Circus, or Surrey Theatre, in Blackfriars'-road, originally used for equestrian performances, destroyed by fire in 1805, and rebuilt in a superior style, since which it has been appropriated to the performance of melo-dramas, ballets, &c.; the Royal Coburg Theatre, in the Waterloo-road, first opened in 1818; Sadler's Wells, in St. John's street road, so called from some wells anciently situated there, and from the name of a person who, in 1683, first opened a theatre in that neighbourhood: the present edifice was erected in 1765, since which the interior has been rebuilt: the space beneath the stage is filled with water, affording the proprietors the means of introducing aquatic exhibitions, which have imparted a peculiar character to the performances at this house. Astley's, or the Royal Amphitheatre, opened, about 1767, as a riding-school, and converted into a regular theatre in 1780, is eminently distinguished for equestrian exhibitions: it was burnt down in 1794 and again in 1803, having been since rebuilt in a neat and commodious manner. The Olympic Theatre, in Wych-street, was built in 1806: the boxes afford room for three hundred and forty persons, the pit six hundred, and the gallery three hundred and twenty. The West London Theatre, in Tottenham-street, was formerly called the Regency Theatre, and has of late been occupied, during the winter, by a company of French comedians.

Vauxhall Gardens, now the only place of amusement of the kind adjoining the metropolis, are situated at Lambeth. They were formerly little more than tea gardens, enlivened with instrumental music; but their rural beauty and easy access rendered them so great a place of resort, that the proprietor was encouraged to speculate on public patronage, and by a series of attractions introduced from time to time, at length enabled Vauxhall to rank among the finest gardens of the kind in Europe. The entertainments commence after night-fall; and thirty thousand lamps are employed to illuminate the gardens on evenings of extraordinary splendour, contributing, with the aid of music, both vocal and instrumental, dramatic representations, fire-works, and other entertainments, to attract large companies in the summer months, during which only they are open.

Among the higher class of amusements are the nobility's balls, held at Willis' rooms, King-street, St. James', commonly called Almack's, from the name of their former proprietor; where also, and at Hanover-square rooms, concerts take place: oratorios and selections of miscellaneous music are performed at Drury-lane and Covent-Garden theatres, on Wednesday and Friday evenings during Lent, and at other periods; the present age being distinguished, above all others in England, for the patronage bestowed upon the art of music. There are various other miscellaneous public performances, but they are so multifarious and changeable, as to preclude a particular description.

COMMERCE.

The commerce of London has three principal branches: 1st. The port of London, with the foreign trade and domestic wholesale business; 2ndly, the manufactures; and, lastly, the retail trade. In 1268, the half-year's customs, for foreign merchandise in the city of London, amounted only to £75. 6. 10. In 1331, they amounted to £8000. In 1354, the duty on goods imported was only £580. 6. 8., and on exports, £81,624. 1. 1. In 1590, they yielded £50,000 a year. In 1641, just before the commencement of the civil war, the customs brought in £500,000 a year, the effect of a long series of peaceful days. From the year 1671 to 1688 they were, on an average, £555,752. In 1709, they were raised to £2,319,320; and in the year ending April 1799, they amounted to £3,711,126. The astonishing increase in the extent of commercial intercourse in later years may be inferred from the following brief statement. The average number of British ships and vessels of various kinds, in the Thames and docks, is estimated at thirteen thousand four hundred and forty-four, of which, the barges and other small craft, employed in lading and unlading, are not fewer than between three and four thousand: two thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight barges and other craft are engaged in the inland trade; besides which, there are three thousand wherries, or small boats, for passengers. About eight thousand watermen are employed in navigating the wherries and craft, four thousand labourers in lading and unlading ships, and twelve thousand revenue officers are constantly doing duty on the river. In regard to tonnage, the East India Company's ships alone carry more burden, by many thousand tons, than all the vessels in London did a century ago. The value of merchandise annually received and discharged in this port, is computed at between £60,000,000 and £70,000,000 sterling. From accounts printed by order of the House of Commons, it appears that, in 1798, previous to docks being constructed in the port of London, the value of imports and exports was £30,290,000. In 1806, after the docks were formed, the value increased to £36,527,000. In 1819, it increased to £46,935,000, and in 1825 it amounted to £96,936,000, being an increase of sixty-six millions and a half as compared with 1798. The number of coasters which entered the port in 1814 was fifteen thousand one hundred and thirty-nine; in 1821, eighteen thousand nine hundred and fifteen, being an increase in seven years of three thousand seven hundred and seventy-six ships. The number of ships moored in the river, during 1804, after the West India docks were opened, was seven thousand three hundred and twenty-seven; and in 1823, when five docks, and three wet dock canals were opened and fully employed, notwithstanding the extended accommodation, thirteen thousand one hundred and twelve, being an increase of six thousand ships; in addition to which, about one thousand nine hundred voyages by steam-boats annually now obstructs the navigation above Greenwich. From official returns of the Customs it appears that, in 1825, an increase of upwards of six hundred sail took place in the number of vessels which arrived in the port of London from foreign parts; since then, and till the present time, it has still kept rapidly increasing. The number of vessels which entered inwards from foreign ports, in 1826, was three thousand four hundred and ninety-five British, and one thousand five hundred and eighty-six foreign; and the number cleared outwards, two thousand one hundred and forty-nine British, and one thousand four hundred and eighty-six foreign. The scene of this immense traffick occupies a space more than four miles in length, reaching from London bridge to Deptford, and from four hundred to five hundred yards in average breadth; which may be described as consisting of four divisions, three of them called the Upper, Middle, and Lower pools, and the fourth comprising the space between Limehouse and Deptford. The present annual value of the custom and excise duties may be rated at somewhat more than £6,000,000 sterling. It is, besides, calculated that above forty thousand wagons and other carriages, including their repeated journies, arrive and depart, laden in both instances, with articles of domestic, colonial, or foreign merchandise; occasioning a transit, including cattle and provisions sent for the consumption of the inhabitants, of more than £50,000,000 worth of goods to and from the inland markets, making altogether a sum of £120,000,000 worth of property annually moving to and from the metropolis.

London has long been celebrated for its manufactures, as well as its commerce. So early as the reign of Henry I., the English goldsmiths had become so eminent for working the precious metals, as to be frequently employed by foreign princes; and the perfection of various other manufactures at this period appears both from history and antique remains. The manufacturers of London had, in that reign, become so numerous as to be formed into fraternities, or companies, some of which are now disused, some have declined, as the Cap-pers, Bowyers, Fletchers, &c., and others still flourish, and are much increased in the number of their members, in the extent of their property and patronage, and in general importance. In 1556, a manufactory for the finer sorts of glass was established in Crutched Friars; and flint-glass, not exceeded by that of Venice, was made at the same time at the Savoy. About five years after, the manufacture of knit stockings was introduced, in consequence of the ingenuity of William Rider, an apprentice on London bridge, who, happening to see a pair from Mantua, at the house of an Italian, made another pair exactly similar to them, which he presented to William, Earl of Pembroke. The manufacture of knives was shortly after begun by Thomas Matthews of Fleet bridge, and has since eclipsed that manufacture at Sheffield, where it was much earlier established. Silk-wove stockings were first made from the invention of Lee, a student at Oxford, in the reign of Elizabeth, which reign forms so splendid an era in the commercial and trading history of the metropolis. Coaches were introduced in 1564, and in less than twenty years they became an extensive article of manufacture. In the following year, the manufacture of pins was begun, and soon after that of needles. The making of "earthen furnaces, earthen fire-pots, and earthen ovens transportable," began about the 16th year of Elizabeth, an Englishman of the name of Dyer having brought the art from Spain; and in 1579, the same individual being sent to Persia, at the expense of the city of London, brought home the art of dyeing and weaving carpets. In 1577, pocket-watches were imported from Nuremberg, in Germany, and the manufacture of them almost immediately commenced. In the reign of Charles I., saltpetre was made in such quantities as not only to supply the whole of England, but the greater part of the Continent. The manufacture of silk, as well as of various articles of plate, had also become extensive. The printing of calicoes commenced in 1676, and about the same time, weaving-looms were brought from Holland. The other articles of manufacture, introduced or practised in the metropolis about the same time, are too numerous to particularise.

The silk manufactory, which, under its different modifications, now affords employment to so many thousands, was first established at Spitalfields, by the expelled French Protestants, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685. Since that period the productions of London have greatly increased, both in extent and value, in articles of elegance and utility, such as cutlery, jewellery, gold and silver ornaments, japan ware, cut-glass, cabinet work, &c., as well as commodities requiring a great mart for their consumption, export, or sale, as porter, English wines, vinegar, refined sugar, soap, &c. In short, the manufactures of London, as well as its commerce, are vast and flourishing, many of the goods manufactured here surpassing in quality those of any other part of the country. In the silk trade alone fifty thousand persons are employed, and in most of the light manufactures the number is proportionably great. For the more scientific manufactures, such as those of machinery, optical and mathematical instruments, &c., London has always been celebrated. Ship-building is carried on to a great extent; and during the late war a considerable number of frigates was built for the government by private individuals, and with greater rapidity than they could be completed in the Royal Dock-yards.

THE COMMERCIAL DOCKS, CANALS, &c.

Intimately connected with the commerce of the metropolis is the establishment of enclosed docks, which have yielded the most decided service to the revenue and trade of the country. The former insecurity of property in the river, and the daring plunder committed on it, led to the formation of them.

The West India Docks which were the first constructed, are situated on what may be called the isthmus of that peninsular part of the environs of London named the Isle of Dogs, and communicate with the Thames at Limehouse on the west, and at Blackwall on the east. These docks were commenced on the 12th of June, 1800, and finished in August, 1802, occupying, with the ground attached to them, an area of two hundred and four acres. The import dock is two thousand six hundred feet long, five hundred and ten broad, and twenty-nine feet deep; the export dock is of the same dimensions, except in breadth. Both docks are enclosed by walls five feet thick, and surrounded by a series of very lofty and extensive warehouses: they are stated to have cost £12,000,000. The proprietors are an incorporated body, under the title of the West India Dock Company. In the vicinity is a school, established by the Company, for instructing apprentices in the West India navigation, whilst the vessels are in dock. Parallel with the docks is a canal, which cost between £300,000 and £400,000, to enable merchant vessels of any burden to avoid the circuitous navigation round the Isle of Dogs. The East India Docks, commenced in 1804, and completed in 1806, are lower down the river, but at no great distance from the former, and, like them, consist of an import and an export dock, the former about one thousand four hundred feet long, and five hundred and sixty wide; and the latter seven hundred and eighty feet long, and five hundred and twenty wide; the depth of each is thirty feet; and the space which they occupy is twenty-eight acres: a basin was added to the export dock in 1817. The largest dock is capable of containing, at one time, twenty-eight Indiamen, with double that number of smaller vessels. The goods from both these docks are conveyed to town by a recently formed rail-way running parallel with the Commercial road. The establishment of the East and West India Docks, which afford employment to many thousand individuals, has occasioned in their immediate vicinity a very numerous resident population.

The London Dock.—This is also an extensive dock, situated between Ratcliffe-highway and the Thames; it covers twenty acres of ground, and belongs to a Company whose capital is £12,000,000. It is capable of containing two hundred sail of merchantmen, and is not appropriated to any particular branch of commerce. It was opened February 1st, 1805, and is surrounded, like the former, with immense warehouses, beneath which are capacious cellars: another branch dock was opened in 1827 or 1828. St. Katherine's Docks were commenced in 1825, and completed in 1829, by the merchants, shipowners, and traders of London, for securing additional accommodation to the great increase of shipping in the port, and a reduction in the rates and charges. These docks receive annually about one thousand four hundred merchant-vessels, besides craft for loading and discharging; and afford an improved mode of ingress and egress which no other docks in the kingdom possess, as vessels drawing twenty feet of water may be locked from two to three hours after high water, and small vessels and lighters at all periods of the tide; the total outlay attending the construction of these docks (including the purchase of considerable property, capable of returning its price on re-sale) amounted to £1,827,113. The warehousing, bonding, and quay-room, are nearly equal to the London Docks; and, from an improved construction of the warehouses, which are within a few feet of the docks and basin, a considerable saving is effected in the expense of labour. These docks are also enclosed with walls, and are entitled to all the privileges of the warehousing system, and of legal quays, preventing goods lodged there, on exportation, from being chargeable with the duties on deficiencies. The Bermondsey Collier Dock is calculated to relieve the river from an obstruction to navigation by the number of small craft, which, in course of time, must otherwise have prevented ships with general cargoes approaching convenient places of discharge near the Custom House, and which had been serious matter of complaint for many years.

Notwithstanding the greater part of the interior of the kingdom being intersected with canals, the inland navigation to the metropolis is at present confined; owing, it is supposed, in a great measure, to the policy which prohibits the carriage of coal by that conveyance, and which would be the grand inducement to undertakings of this nature. The Paddington canal, which was the first, was not opened till July 10th, 1800. It leads from Paddington, and unites with the Grand Junction canal, whence the two are frequently mentioned by the joint name of the Grand Junction and Paddington canal. From the basin at Paddington, it extends nearly one hundred miles, to the Oxford canal at Branson, in Northamptonshire, by which it is connected with the Coventry and Birmingham canal, the Grand Trunk canal, &c.; thus forming a regular line of water conveyance from London into Lancashire and Yorkshire; another branch of the Grand Junction enters the Thames at Brentford. The Regent's canal connects the Paddington Grand Junction, and other canals west of London, with the Thames on the east, or mercantile side of the city, and, skirting the northern suburbs, has occasioned a vast influx of trade, with its accompanying warehouses, wharfs, &c., at Paddington, Battle-bridge, the City-road, and other places; it was opened August 1st, 1820: it branches out of the Grand Junction at Paddington, and, passing by a tunnel under Maida hill, continues through the Regent's park and St. Pancras' parish to Islington, when it passes through a tunnel about three quarters of a mile long, immediately under the village and the bed of the New River, to the grand basin in the City-road, and proceeds on by Hoxton, Hackney, and Mile-End, to Limehouse, uniting all the principal canals in the kingdom with the Thames. The whole length of this canal is nine miles, and within that space are comprised twelve locks and thirty-seven bridges: the former are so admirably constructed, that a large barge can pass through each in three minutes and a half; they are capable of admitting barges twenty-three feet long and fourteen wide: this canal cost upwards of half a million of money, and was seven years in construction: it was executed under the superintendence of Mr. Nash. On the Surrey side of the river is the Grand Surrey canal, which passes through the south-eastern suburbs, from Camberwell to the Thames at the lower extremity of Rotherhithe.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS DEVOTED TO COMMERCE.

The Royal Exchange is situated on the northern side of Cornhill. The entire building occupies an area two hundred and three feet long, and one hundred and seventy-one broad, and its erection cost £80,000. The original Royal Exchange, at first named Britain's Bourse, was founded, in 1566, by Sir Thomas Gresham, an eminent merchant of London, nearly on the spot where the ancient Tun prison stood; the merchants before that time having had no suitable place in which to assemble, and having been in consequence compelled to meet in the open air. The building erected by Sir Thomas was of brick and stone, with a lofty tower and vane, somewhat similar to the present, but much inferior in grandeur: this was destroyed by the great fire in 1666; and the present building of Portland stone was erected, in the reign of Charles II., from the designs of an architect named Jerman. Its form is quadrangular, the interior being surrounded by piazzas, divided into walks, bearing the names of different countries, the merchants connected with which generally assembling at those particular spots. Above the piazza is an entablature, with sculptures of the armorial bearings of the city companies, and other appropriate ornaments, and over these are twenty-four niches, nineteen of which are occupied by statues of the English sovereigns, from Edward I. down to George III.; Edward II., Richard II., Henry IV., and Richard III., being excluded; the statue of George III., occupying the twentieth niche, having been taken down for renovation, was restored in September, 1830. Sir Thomas Gresham's effigy, and that of Sir John Barnard, occupy niches within the piazza, the former at the north-western, and the latter at the south-western, angle. The open area is ornamentally paved with Turkey stone, and is adorned in the centre with a statue in white marble of Charles II., under whose auspices the Exchange was rebuilt. The principal front, next Cornhill, is very noble, extending two hundred and ten feet in length, with a stately piazza, a lofty central gateway, which opens into the area, and ornamented with statues, bas-reliefs, and other embellishments; a newly-erected triple-stoned tower rises above the gateway, with a circular peristyle, or colonnade, of eight Corinthian columns, surrounded with an entablature and dome surmounted by a lofty vane and gilt grasshopper, the crest of the founder. The north front next Threadneedle-street has also a piazza, and a gateway in the centre, corresponding with the one opposite. The galleries over the four sides of the building were originally divided into two hundred shops; but they are now occupied by the Royal Exchange Assurance and other offices, and, till their removal to the London Institution, the Gresham Lecture-rooms; also Lloyd's coffee-house, which is celebrated as a place of meeting for underwriters and insurance brokers: they comprise two separate suites of extensive rooms, one of which is public, and the other exclusively appropriated to subscribers, who pay a premium of twenty-five pounds upon admission, and four guineas annually, these sums forming a fund for the general purposes of the establishment, which has agents for the protection of the commercial interests of its subscribers all over the world.

Bank of England.—The business of this great national corporation was originally transacted at Grocers' Hall, Poultry. In the year 1732, the first stone of a more splendid edifice comprising the central part of the present building was laid, on the site of the house and garden of Sir John Houblon, the first governor. The eastern wing was completed about the year 1786, by the late Sir Robert Taylor, the north front, and the side towards Princes-street, were added from designs by Mr. Soane in 1825, when considerable alterations and improvements were made throughout the whole of the interior. The whole building forms an immense edifice, chiefly of stone. The principal entrance is opposite Bank buildings; the front, consists of a centre of the modern Ionic order, and two extensive wings, ornamented with a colonnade. The interior comprises numerous apartments appropriated to different branches of the establishment; amongst which are, the Rotunda, a large circular apartment, principally used by the stock-brokers for transacting business in the public funds; the hall, in which the bank notes are issued and exchanged; the chief cashier's office, a noble apartment, in imitation of the Temple of the Sun and Moon, at Rome; and the three per cents. warrant-office, an oblong room, with a vaulted ceiling supported by decorated piers, and having a handsome dome resting on caryatides in the centre, the whole being constructed without timber; and various other offices too numerous to particularise: the entire buildings are included in an area of irregular quadrangular form, the exterior wall of which measures three hundred and sixty-five feet in front, or on the southern side, four hundred and forty feet on the western side, four hundred and ten feet on the northern side, and two hundred and forty-five feet on the eastern side. This area comprises, together with the various buildings and offices, eight open courts: there are also underground apartments stored with bullion, coin, &c.

The Stock Exchange stands in Capel-court, opposite the eastern entrance to the Bank. It was completed in 1804, from a design by Mr. James Peacock. The business transacted here relates solely to the purchase and sale of stock in the public funds, Exchequer bills, India bonds, and other securities, an additional building having subsequently been erected for the transfer of foreign stock. On the east side of the great room is a recess with an elevated desk, for the use of the commissioners for the redemption of the national debt, who make their purchases four times a week: viz., on Monday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, at the hour of twelve precisely. No person can transact business but those who are balloted for annually by a committee, who, on being chosen, subscribe ten guineas each: the number of Jew brokers is limited to twelve, who, before they are entitled to admission, must purchase a ticket of the lord mayor, which, on a vacancy occurring, is sold to him who will give the greatest sum, it being a perquisite of the lord mayor's for the time being: the tickets generally producing from £1200 to £1500 each.

The South Sea House, or, House of the South Sea Company, first incorporated in 1711, for the purpose of an exclusive trade to the south seas, is a substantial and handsome building of brick, ornamented with Portland stone: the entrance is by a gateway, with a noble front, leading into a court having a piazza, formed by Doric columns. The interior is grand and commodious, the court-room being particularly lofty, spacious, and elegant. The concerns of this company are managed by a governor, sub-governor, and twelve directors, annually elected.

East India House.—The present East India House, situated on the south side of Leadenhall-street, comprises the principal offices of the East India Company, where their courts are held, and all official and general business transacted; and, as a public structure, it ranks among the most magnificent in the city. In consequence of the important additions to the old building erected in 1726, made under the superintendence of Mr. Jupp, and consisting of the centre and the west wing, with other important parts, adjoining Leadenhall-street, the whole may now be considered as almost a new edifice. The front, which is of stone, is about two hundred feet long: in the centre is a lofty portico of six fluted Ionic columns, the frieze of which is sculptured with antique ornaments, and above is a pediment, containing a group of figures in alto relievo by Bacon, emblematical of the commerce of the company. On the apex of the pediment is a figure of Britannia, and at the angles are figures emblematic of Europe and Asia. The wings have arched basement windows, with square windows above, and are surmounted by a handsome balustrade. The back, and part of the western side, of the building, are wholly enclosed by houses. The interior consists of a great number of apartments and offices, several of the former being of large dimensions and noble architecture. Those particularly worthy of observation, are the grand court-room, the new sale-room, the old sale-room, the rooms for the committee of correspondence, the library, and the museum; all of them embellished either with emblematical designs and paintings illustrative of commerce, statues and portraits of distinguished individuals who have been connected with the company, or with India generally, views of Indian scenery, or architectural ornaments. The library contains a fine collection of Indian and Chinese manuscripts, together with every book that has been published respecting Asia. The museum, which adjoins it, contains models of Indian and Gentoo idols; the library of the late Tippoo Saib, with his armour, and other trophies taken from that sovereign at Seringapatam; and abounds with Indian curiosities of every description. Connected with the business of the East India House are the extensive warehouses of the company, situated in New-street, Bishopsgate, Fenchurch-street, Crutched-Friars, and various other parts of London. The men employed are embodied into three regiments of Infantry, called "The Royal East India Volunteers," of which the superior clerks and officers in the company's service form the staff. In these warehouses teas, indigo, silks, china, crape, and other imported goods are deposited. The great height of these buildings, forming entire streets within themselves, with the multitude of windows, and of cranes for drawing up goods, combine to give an imposing idea of the commerce of this most important establishment.

Custom House.—The Custom House, or place where all the king's duties are collected on goods imported to, or exported from, London, stands on the north bank of the river, at a small distance to the westward of the Tower, having been removed to its present situation since the destruction of the former edifice by fire in 1814: it was begun in 1815, from a design by Mr. David Laing, and occupies an immense extent of ground, reaching from Billingsgate eastward, nearly to the site of the former Custom House. It is four hundred and eighty-nine feet long, by one hundred and seven feet wide; the whole cost of the erection being £167,050. The south front, next the river, is of Portland stone: the central compartment, which comprises the Long-room only, was at first quite plain, but this part of the building having lately sunk, from some defect in the foundation, it has been rebuilt in a more ornamented style, having a noble colonnade standing on a projecting basement, and surmounted by an open gallery with balustrades: the façade of each of the wings is enriched also with a colonnade of six Ionic columns to correspond. The interior contains an immense number of apartments and offices appropriated to the vast extent of business carried on in them: the principal is the Long-room already mentioned, which is of astonishing extent, its length being one hundred and ninety feet, its breadth sixty-six feet, and the height about fifty-five feet. Beneath this immense edifice are equally extensive vaults and store-cellars. Attached to the establishment are about six hundred and fifty clerks and officers, besides one thousand tide-waiters and servants.

The Corn Exchange, instituted as a mart for the disposal of all kinds of grain through the medium of corn-factors, until very lately consisted only of a handsome brick building, on the east side of Mark-lane; but the vast increase of business requiring additional space, a new and commodious edifice of stone, was erected in 1828, adjoining the former. The principal façade consists of a centre and two wings, with a portico of six fluted Grecian Doric columns, supporting an entablature wreathed with chaplets of wheat-ears, and a cornice charged with lions' heads, the whole being surmounted by a blocking-course: over the centre is a large pedestal crowned with a cornice, above which are the royal arms sculptured in stone, with ploughs and other emblems of agriculture. The roof rests on entablatures supported by twelve columns, their capitals being composed of wheat-sheaves. The market is held on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday; the first being the principal day.

The Coal Exchange is situated in Thames-street, and comprises a spacious rotunda, with convenient divisions for the business of the coal merchants and dealers. It forms a small square, surrounded by an open arcade, and has a handsome front.

The Excise Office, in Broad-street, is a spacious and noble building, erected in 1763, to which the business of the excise, established in 1643, and at first carried on in the Old Jewry, was transferred. In this office the town business of the excise is transacted, by nine commissioners, having under them numerous clerks and officers. It consists of two ranges of building, one of stone, the other of brick, separated from each other by a large yard. From the centre of each of these ranges, passages and staircases lead to the apartments of the commissioners and clerks.

The Commercial Hall, situated in Mincing-lane, is an elegant structure, erected by subscription in 1811, for the sale of the various kinds of colonial produce. The front is of Portland stone, ornamented with six attached Ionic columns rising from the lower story, and supporting an entablature; between them are five emblematic devices, executed by Bubb, representing Britannia, Husbandry, Science, Commerce, and Navigation. The interior, which is of considerable extent, contains five public sale-rooms, a large coffee-room, several shew-rooms, and numerous counting-houses let to various merchants.

The Auction Mart, Bartholomew-lane, was opened in 1810, principally for the sale of landed property by public auction: it is constructed of Portland stone, and, though not very large, is unsurpassed in the metropolis for airiness, lightness, and gracefulness of design. The internal arrangements, too, are all upon a plan which unites elegance with utility. Previously to the erection of this edifice, the principal sales took place at Garraway's Coffee-house, in Change-alley, where a great part of the business is still transacted. At the Mart, particulars of all sales are preserved for the sake of public reference, as are also all charters and legislative enactments regarding canals, rail-roads, bridges, &c.

Trinity House, Tower Hill.—This corporation was originally established at Deptford, under the title of "The Master, Wardens, and Assistants of the Guild or Fraternity of the most Glorious and Undivided Trinity, and of St. Clement, in the parish of Deptford Strand, in the county of Kent." It was incorporated by Henry VIII., in the year 1516, at a period when the English navy began to assume an ascendancy, as a sort of guardian of the shipping, military and commercial, being for that purpose endowed with extensive powers, which it still exercises. The members examine those children in Christ's Hospital, intended for the sea service, and the masters of king's ships, appoint pilots for the Thames, and settle the rate of pilotage, erect lighthouses and land-marks, grant licenses to poor seamen not free of the city, to navigate on the Thames; besides transacting a variety of other business connected with that river, and maritime affairs generally. The originator of this establishment was Sir Thomas Spert, comptroller of the navy, and commander of the Harry Grace de Dieu. The house which the company afterwards occupied in Water-lane, near the Custom House, being found inconvenient, the present structure was completed from a design by Mr. Wyatt, in 1795. It is built of stone, in the purest style of Grecian architecture, within are several handsome apartments, and, having the advantage of a rising ground for its site, and a fine area in front, it deservedly ranks among the finest buildings of the metropolis.

Post-Office. The necessity for the removal of this establishment from its former confined situation in Lombard-street having long been urgent, an act was passed in 1815, for the erection of a new post-office, which was completed in 1829, from a design by Mr. Smirke, a great portion of the interval having been consumed in the purchase and removal of the houses which were crowded upon its site. This building is an isolated massive structure of large dimensions, composed externally of Portland stone, being about three hundred and eighty-nine feet long, one hundred and thirty broad, and sixty-four high, standing in an enclosed area of irregular figure, at the junction of the street called St. Martin's-le-Grand with Newgate-street, a central and convenient situation. The old buildings on the north have been taken down as far as St. Anne's lane; and it is presumed, that at least an equal area will be cleared on the south, by removing the few houses which still remain, and obstruct the approach from Cheapside. The façade towards St. Martin's-le-Grand is the only one in which there is any architectural display, and this is confined to three porticos of the Ionic order, one at each end consisting of four columns, and one in the centre of six, the latter being surmounted by a pediment; on the frieze over the columns is the inscription, Georgio Quarto Rege, MDCCCXXIX. Under the central portico, by an ascent of several steps, is the entrance to the grand public hall of the establishment, which extends through the building into Foster-lane, being eighty feet long, by about sixty feet wide, and divided by Ionic columns, into a centre and two aisles: the centre rises to the height of about fifty-three feet, and admits of a dwarf, or attic pilastrade over the principal order, the intervals of which are glazed for the admission of light. In the northern aisle are the Inland, American, Ship-letter, and Newspaper offices; and at the eastern end is a staircase leading to the Letter-bill, Dead, Mis-sent, and Returned, letter offices. In the southern are the Foreign and Two-penny post departments, the Offices of the Receiver-General and Accountant, and the entrance to the Assistant-Secretary's official residence. North of the centre, and in the eastern front, is the entrance, or vestibule, where the bags are received from the mails. Communicating with the vestibule is the Inland office, eighty-eight feet long, fifty-six wide, and twenty-eight high; and adjoining it is that of the letter carriers, one hundred and three feet long, thirty-five wide, and thirty-three high. The West India letters have an office appropriated expressly to them, on the eastern side. Near which are the Comptroller's and Mail coach offices. The communication between the apartments in the northern and southern divisions of the building is by a subterraneous passage beneath the Great Hall, in which the letters from one department to another are conveyed by machinery, invented by Mr. Barrow. The Inland office may be regulated to any temperature by a warm air apparatus, designed and fixed by Mr. Sylvester. On the first floor are the Board-room, the Secretary's rooms, and the Secretary's clerks' office; the Solicitor's office, and those for the Letter-bill, Dead, Mis-sent, and Returned, letters. On the second and third stories are lodging-rooms for the clerks of the foreign office, it being necessary, from the uncertainty of the time of arrival of the mails, that they should be always on the spot. On the basement, which is vaulted, and therefore fire-proof, are the mail guards' room and armoury; the servants' offices; the apparatus for warming the patent gasometer by the Messrs. Crossleys, large enough to register four thousand cubic feet of gas per hour; and a "governor," by Mr. Clegg, for regulating the supply of gas to nearly a thousand argand burners: the gas is supplied by the City of London Gas Company. The business is very extensive and complicated. The building is divided into—The Inland Office, in which, according to a return for January, 1829, there are one hundred and thirteen clerks and other persons ordinarily in attendance at the morning duty, and one hundred and nineteen at the evening duty; the Returned Letter Office, in which there are an inspector and nine clerks; the Foreign Office, in which there are a comptroller and deputy, and sixteen clerks and sorters, including the West India office; the Letter-Bill Office, in which there are a superintendent and seven clerks; the Bye-Letter Office, in which there are an accountant and four clerks; besides the offices of the Receiver-General, the Accountant-General, the Surveyor and Superintendent of Mail coaches, and the Secretary, in which there are nearly fifty persons, making a total of nearly three hundred and fifty persons engaged in this important establishment.

The business of the Two-penny Post, which applies exclusively to London and its immediate vicinity, forms only a branch of the General Post-Office. The principal office being in Gerrard St. Soho. The returns of the Commissioners of Revenue Enquiry afford a remarkable proof of the convenience of this mode of conveying letters through the metropolis and its vicinity, by exhibiting the great extent of business which is thus transacted. From them it appears that the average number of letters passing daily through the Two-penny Post-Office, taking May as the period when the returns are prepared, is forty thousand. This account includes soldiers' and sailors' letters and newspapers, as well as those letters which are either delivered to, or from, the General Post-Office by the Two-penny Post. There are six collections and deliveries of letters in town daily, Sundays excepted; and there are two dispatches from, and three deliveries at, most places in the country within the limits of this office. Besides the principal office, there are scattered through the town and its environs about fifty receiving-houses for the General Post-Office, and upwards of one hundred for the Two-penny Post.

FAIRS AND MARKETS.

London has at present only one fair, well known by the name of Bartholomew fair, which, though anciently famous for the sale of cloth and other commodities, is now resorted to merely for amusement: it was granted by Henry II. to the prior and convent of St. Bartholomew, and its opening is proclaimed by the lord mayor in civic state, on the 3rd of September, after which it continues three more days, a court of pie-powder being held during the time. The markets, held in different parts of the metropolis, amount to sixteen flesh markets, and twenty-five for corn, hay, vegetables, &c. Smithfield is the grand mart for the sale of live stock, which takes place on Mondays and Thursdays, on which latter day there is also one for horses: upwards of one hundred thousand bullocks, and eight hundred thousand sheep, are, on an average, annually sold here. Newgate, Leadenhall, and Whitechapel markets, are the principal wholesale markets for butchers' meat, and the two former for poultry; Leadenhall and the Borough markets are the only skin markets within the bills of mortality; and at both Leadenhall and Newgate markets are sold pigs and poultry, killed in the country, with fresh butter, eggs, &c., to an immense amount. Covent Garden market is celebrated for its early and abundant supply of fruit, vegetables, herbs, and flowers. Farringdon market (formerly Fleet market), Spitalfields market, the Borough market, and Finsbury market, at least the three former, are noted for supplying an abundance of the commoner vegetables and fruit; and Farringdon, Newport, and Clare, markets for home-killed butchers' meat. The only market in London, exclusively for the sale of fish, is that of Billingsgate, but it is in contemplation to establish another on the site of Hungerford market, Strand. Billingsgate is principally supplied by fishing-boats and smacks from various parts, and partly with fresh fish by land carriage. There are various less extensive markets for the sale of butchers' meat, &c. The incommodious and mean buildings which crowded the large area of Covent Garden have all been removed, and a new and handsome market-place completed at the cost of the Duke of Bedford, who is the sole proprietor. It consists of three principal ranges of building, extending in length from east to west, the external fronts of the northernmost and southernmost ranges of which, as well as the west end of the centre one, being adorned with a colonnade of the Tuscan order, supporting a neat balustrade, and having a wide gateway in the centre. Down the middle of the central range is a handsome arcade, having shops on each side, the western extremity of which is immediately opposite to the front of St. Paul's church, the eastern to the end of Russell-street. The eastern end of these three ranges are connected by a terrace supported upon rows of baseless Tuscan columns, of single blocks of granite, like those of the colonnades, forming a pleasant promenade among flowers and plants tastefully arranged for sale. One flight of steps leads up to this terrace from the end of each of the two outer ranges of building, and two from that of the centre one. A great part of the space between the central and the northern ranges is roofed. The whole of the enclosed area is paved with flag stones; and it is surrounded by a spacious carriage way.

The corporation of the city of London were authorised, by an act of parliament passed in 1814, to remove the old Fleet market, and to erect a new one. The execution of this public improvement was confided to a committee, who obtained a new site, cleared away the houses upon it, erected suitable buildings, and at length completed the numerous other necessary arrangements, so as to enable the corporation to open the new market for business on November 20th, 1829. It forms a handsome and elevated quadrangle of two hundred and thirty-two feet by one hundred and fifty, standing on a surface of one acre and a half. The purchase of houses, &c., is stated to have cost £200,000; the building of the market-house, including pavilions' accounts, &c., £80,000. The avenue, under which are the shops of the dealers, and which extends round three sides of the market-place, is twenty-five feet high, to what are technically called the tie-beams, with ventilators ranged at equal distances. In the centre of the roof of the principal avenue are placed a turret and clock, the latter illuminated at night with gas. The chief entrance is by two principal gates, for wagons, &c., in Stone-cutter-street, which has been made double its former width; and there are two smaller ones for foot-passengers: eighteen large gas lamps are placed in the centre of the market-place. Eatables only are permitted to be bought and sold in this market. The old market-place having been entirely removed, and the street repaved, it forms a fine line in connexion with Bridge-street, and Great Surrey-street; being in the whole considerably more than a mile in length, and it is in contemplation to continue the line of road to Islington.

MUNICIPALITY AND LEGAL JURISDICTION.

CITY.—The City of London, properly so called, consists of that part anciently within the walls, together with that termed the Liberties, which immediately surround them: the liberties are encompassed by an irregular line, called the line of separation, which is the boundary line between them and the county of Middlesex. Their superficial extent does not exceed three hundred acres; their boundaries are marked by the Bars, which formerly consisted of posts and chains, but are now marked by lofty stone obelisks, bearing the city arms, which may be seen eastward, in Whitechapel, the Minories, and Bishopsgate street; northward, in Goswell-street, at the end of Fan-alley, and in St. John's-street; and westward, at Middle-row, Holborn; while at the western end of Fleet-street, the boundary is the stone-gateway called Temple Bar.

The grand division of the city is into twenty-five wards, exclusively of Bridge ward Without. The number of wards, which in 1285 has been stated to have been twenty-four, was, by the division of Farringdon ward into two wards in the 17th of Richard II., augmented to twenty-five; and when, in 1550, the liberties of the borough of Southwark were granted to the city, they were constituted a twenty-sixth ward, by the name of Bridge ward Without; and this number has continued ever since. Of these wards, exclusively of the last-mentioned, thirteen are on the east, and twelve on the west, side of Walbrook. Their names are as follows:—Aldersgate (Within and Without), Aldgate, Bassishaw, Billingsgate, Bishopsgate (Within and Without), Bread-street, Bridge (Within), Broad-street, Candlewick, Castle-Baynard, Cheap, Coleman-street, Cordwainers' Cornhill, Cripplegate (Within and Without), Dowgate, Farringdon (Within), Farringdon (Without), Langbourn, Lime-street, Portsoken, Queen-hythe, Tower-street, Vintry, Walbrook: the wards are subdivided into several precincts, each of which returns one common council-man; the total number of precincts being two hundred and thirty-six.

Aldersgate ward derived its name from the city gate, called Aldersgate, which has been thought by some antiquaries to have taken that denomination from being the oldest gate, by others from the alder-trees which anciently grew in the marshy soil in that neighbourhood. It comprises two divisions and adjoins Cripplegate and Farringdon wards, has eight precincts (four in each division), and includes, among its principal thoroughfares, Aldersgate-street, Foster-lane, Noble-street, Little Britain, and the liberty of St. Martin's-le-Grand: it has an alderman, two deputies (one within the gates, and the other without), eight common council-men, and inferior officers.

Aldgate ward is denominated from the gate of the same name. Its precincts are seven; and its principal streets, Aldgate and the eastern parts of Leadenhall and Fenchurch streets: it is under the superintendence of an alderman, a deputy, six common council-men, including the deputy, and inferior officers.

Bassishaw ward the smallest in the city, contains only two precincts, and consists principally of one large street, called Basinghall-street, the name of which is a corruption of Basings-haugh, or hall, a large mansion here, formerly belonging to the family of the Basings:

it has an alderman, a deputy, four common council-men, and inferior officers.

Billingsgate ward, situated on the side of the Thames, is divided into twelve precincts, and is governed by an alderman, ten common council-men, and inferior officers.

Bishopsgate ward took its name from the gate which stood almost in the centre of it, between the ends of Camomile-street and Wormwood-street, dividing it into two divisions Within and Without. It has nine precincts, five within, and four without, the gate. The principal streets are Bishopsgate-street and part of Fenchurch-street. The buildings in this ward are among the most ancient in the metropolis; the great fire of 1666 not having extended far in this direction, and not at all to that part of the ward situated without the gate. It has an alderman, two deputies (one within the gate, the other without), six common council-men, and inferior officers.

Bread-street ward is situated nearly in the centre of the city, between the ward of Farringdon Within, and Cordwainers', Queen-hythe, and Castle-Baynard wards. It takes its name from the bread market formerly held on the present site of Bread-street, the bakers anciently not being allowed to sell bread in their shops or houses, but only in the open market. The number of precincts is twelve; and the principal thoroughfares are Watling-street, with the streets in the same line to Old Fish-street, part of the south side of Cheapside, and several of the cross streets between the two: it has an alderman, a deputy, twelve common council-men, and inferior officers.

Bridge ward Within, so named from its contiguity to London bridge, (which, at the time it had houses upon it, formed three of its precincts,) is divided into fourteen precincts; the principal streets being Fish-street-hill, part of Gracechurch-street, Upper and Lower Thames-street, and Eastcheap: it has an alderman, a deputy, and fifteen common council-men, including the deputy, with inferior officers.

Bridge ward Without, although so long annexed to London, was never entirely incorporated with it, and is wholly unrepresented in the common council. Its civil government is administered by a steward and a bailiff, appointed by the court of the lord mayor and aldermen. The Surrey magistrates, notwithstanding the royal grants to the city, retain the power of appointing constables, and licensing victuallers, and exercise other powers of justices of the peace for the county within the limits of the ward. This ward includes nearly the whole of the borough of Southwark, and extends to Newington on the south, almost as far as Lambeth westward, and to Rotherhithe on the east, having the Thames on its northern side. The principal streets are, the Borough High-street, which is continued southward by St. Margaret's hill and Blackman-street, Kent-street, the new Dovor road, Tooley-street, and Union-street: there are, besides, numerous others, several of which are of considerable length, and the great thoroughfares are inhabited by respectable and wealthy tradesmen. The alderman who nominally governs this ward has the title of "Father of the City." Whenever a vacancy occurs in the aldermanry it is customary for the lord mayor and aldermen to appoint to it the senior alderman; this nominal office being regarded as an honourable sinecure, which relieves him from the fatigues of office. That portion of the borough of Southwark situated without the city jurisdiction, or borough liberty, is called the Clink liberty, and is under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Winchester, who appoints a steward and a bailiff for its government.

Broad-street ward is so denominated from a street in it which obtained the name of Broad-street from being, before the fire, one of the widest within the walls: its precincts are ten, and include within their limits Old Broad-street, Threadneedle-street, Bartholomew-lane, Throgmorton-street, Great and Little Winchester-streets, Austin-Friars, and part of Leadenhall-street: the inhabitants elect an alderman, a deputy, and nine common council-men, with inferior officers.

Candlewick ward, which took its name from Candlewick (now Cannon) street, formerly much occupied by wax and tallow chandlers, is a small ward divided into seven precincts, the principal streets of which are, Great Eastcheap, and the west end of Cannon-street: it has an alderman, a deputy, seven common council-men, and inferior officers.

Castle-Baynard ward takes its name from the ancient castle which stood on the site of the present Carron wharf, and was originally built by William Baynard, a soldier of fortune, who accompanied the Norman William in his invasion of England. It afterwards passed into the hands of the Fitz-Walters, who make a prominent figure in the early history of London, and who possessed, by virtue of this castellanship, the honour of being hereditary standard-bearers to the city. The soke, or liberty, anciently attached to this castle, forms the present ward, which is divided into ten precincts; the principal streets being, the west end of Upper Thames-street, St. Peter's-hill, St. Bene't's-hill, Sermon and Carter lanes, Paul's chain, part of St. Paul's churchyard, and the east sides of Creed, Ave-Maria, and Warwick lanes: it has an alderman, ten common council-men, and inferior officers.

Cheap ward, situated in the centre of the city, takes its name from the Saxon word Chepe, signifying a market; the present Cheapside having been anciently called "West Chepe," to distinguish it from another market called "East Chepe." Before the street called Walbrook, which intersects this ward, was covered in, barges were towed up it from the Thames, as far as Bucklersbury. It is divided into nine precincts: the east end of Cheapside, the Poultry, parts of Queen-street, Pancras, Ironmonger, Lawrence, and Bow lanes, King-street, and the north side of Cateaton-street, with Honey-lane market, from the principal thoroughfares of this ward, which is under the government of an alderman, twelve common council-men, and inferior officers. The standard, or cross, in Chepe, is familiar to the readers of civic history as the ancient place of execution within the city.

Coleman-street ward is so called from Coleman-street, the principal street in it, and supposed to derive its name from a family of the name of Coleman, who lie buried in St. Margaret's church, Lothbury, who might have been the builders, owners, or principal inhabitants of that part of the city. It contains six precincts, and is governed by an alderman, a deputy, six common council-men, and inferior officers.

Cordwainer's ward derives its name from Cord-wainers'-street, now Bow-lane, which was formerly a great mart for curriers, shoemakers, and others working in leather. It has eight precincts, the principal streets being Watling-street, Bow-lane, and Queen-street; and the inhabitants elect an alderman, nine common council-men, and inferior officers.

Cornhill ward is named from the principal street in it, which was anciently the great city market for corn; the precincts are four. The extent of this ward is small, the principal thoroughfare being Cornhill, which is a spacious street of large well-built houses, and part of the great central thoroughfare through the city: it has an alderman, a deputy, and six common council-men, including the deputy, with inferior officers.

Cripplegate ward took its name from the city gate, called Cripplegate, comprises two divisions, Cripplegate Within, and Cripplegate Without, the walls. It adjoins Cheap, Bassishaw, and Coleman-street wards, and contains thirteen precincts, including, amongst its principal streets, Fore-street, White, and Red, Cross streets, part of Jewin-street, and Barbican, and has an alderman, and (Within the walls) eight common council-men, and (Without the walls) four common council-men, with inferior officers.

Dowgate ward, supposed by some antiquaries to take its name from dwyr-gate, meaning, in the ancient British language, Water gate, which is by Stowe supposed to have been the trajectus, or ferry across the Thames, in the line of the Watling-street, has eight precincts. This ward extends from Martin's-lane on the east, to Cloak-lane on the west; and from Cannon-street on the north, to the Thames on the south, nearly in the form of a square, within which space are contained Dowgate-hill and Dowgate-dock, the Steel-yard, St. Lawrence-Pountney-hill, Duckfoot-lane, Suffolk-lane, Bush-lane, Chequer-yard, and Cloak-lane: it has an alderman, eight common council-men, and inferior officers.

Farringdon wards (Within and Without) were originally but one ward, the aldermanry of which was purchased by a family of that name. It was divided into two wards in the 17th of Richard II. Farringdon ward Within comprehends that part of the city which lay immediately within the walls, on the western side. Farringdon ward Without includes all that part which lay without the walls, to the westward, as far as Temple Bar: the former contains seventeen precincts, the latter sixteen; and the two wards include a considerable number of the principal thoroughfares of the town: viz., Ludgate-hill, Fleet-street, part of Cheapside, St. Paul's churchyard, Hatton Garden, Skinner and Newgate streets, and West Smithfield; besides the whole of Black and White Friars, St. Paul's cathedral, Christ's hospital, and numerous other buildings, important places, and objects. Farringdon ward Within, returns an alderman, a deputy, and eight common council-men; and Farringdon ward Without, an alderman, three deputies, and sixteen common council-men; inferior officers are appointed for each ward respectively.

Langbourn ward takes its name from a brook that formerly ran from Fenchurch-street to the Thames; the stream spread so much near the head of the spring, that the neighbourhood received from it the name of "Fenny about;" and this circumstance is still perpetuated in the name of Fenchurch-street. It is divided into twelve precincts: the principal streets are, Fenchurch-street and Leadenhall-street: an alderman, a deputy, ten common council-men, and inferior officers, are appointed for its government.

Lime-street ward is said to have received its name from the making and selling of lime here; or, according to others, from lime trees having been anciently planted on the spot. Though small, this ward includes parts of several parishes: it has four precincts, and its principal streets are, Lime-street and a part of Leadenhall-street: an alderman, a deputy, and four common council-men, including the deputy, with inferior officers, are appointed.

Portsoken ward takes its name from being situated without the wall, or gate, of the city, the word portsoken signifying the franchise ad Portam. It anciently included a considerable part of the Tower liberties: it is divided into five precincts, the principal streets within which are Whitechapel (as far as the bars), part of Aldgate High-street, the Minories, and Houndsditch; it has an alderman, deputy, five common council-men, including the deputy, and inferior officers.

Queen-hythe ward takes its name from the harbour of Queen-hythe, which was formerly a principal place of loading and unloading goods, and was so called because the customs payable there were assigned by King John to his queen Eleanor, and to the queens of England who should succeed her, for their private use. The ground, for a considerable space around the harbour, formed a soke, which was governed by the queen's bailiffs. In the time of Henry III., however, it came into the hands of Richard, Earl of Cornwall, who conveyed it, in return for an annuity, to the Mayor and Corporation of London. It lies between Dowgate and Castle-Baynard wards, on the banks of the Thames; it has six precincts, and its principal street is part of Upper Thames-street: the inhabitants appoint an alderman, six common council-men, and inferior officers.

Tower ward is the first in the eastern part of the city within the walls, and takes its name from its vicinity to the Tower. The precincts are twelve, and its principal streets are, Tower-street and a part of Thames-street: the inhabitants elect an alderman, twelve common council-men, and subordinate officers.

Vintry ward comprises a space on the northern bank of the Thames, where the merchants of Bourdeaux formerly bonded and sold their wines. This spot was at the south end of Three Cranes-lane, so called from the cranes with which the wine was landed; and at the north-eastern corner of this lane, in Thames-street, opposite to College-hill, anciently stood a spacious and stately edifice, called the Vintry, from its being appropriated to the stowage of wine. It is divided into nine precincts, the principal streets being part of Upper Thames-street, part of Queen-street, Great St. Thomas the Apostle, Garlick-hill, and College-hill: it has an alderman, nine common council-men, and inferior officers.

Walbrook ward was so called from the brook which intersected the city wall at Dowgate, and flowed into the Thames; it has seven precincts, the principal streets and lanes in which are, Walbrook, Bucklersbury, Budge-row, Dowgate-hill, Cannon-street, Bearbinder-lane, St. Swithin's-lane, and the west end of Lombard-street: the inhabitants elect an alderman, eight common council-men, and officers,

Corporate Seal.

Obverse.

Reverse.

The entire civil government of London is vested, by successive charters of the English sovereigns, in its own corporation, or body of citizens, confirmed, for the last time, by a charter passed in the 23rd of George II. As then settled, the corporation consists of the lord mayor, two sheriffs for London and Middlesex conjointly, twenty-six aldermen, the common council-men of the several wards, and the livery; assisted by a recorder, chamberlain, common serjeant, comptroller, city remembrancer, town clerk, and various other officers.

The Lord Mayor is elected annually on the 29th of September: the livery in Guildhall, or common assembly, choose two aldermen by shew of hands, who are presented to a court called the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen, by whom one of the aldermen so chosen (usually the senior) is declared lord mayor elect, and on the 9th of November following he enters on his office. He is supreme magistrate of the city: his title, since the reign of Edward III., has been "The Rt. Hon. The Lord Mayor." It is necessary that the nominee shall be free of one of the great city companies, shall have served the office of sheriff, and be alderman at the time of election. The prerogatives are of great extent and importance: as the immediate representative of the Sovereign, the lord mayor takes precedence of every other subject within the limits of the city, and, in the event of the monarch's decease, becomes the first officer in the realm, takes his seat at the privy council board, and signs before all other subjects in the kingdom. As civil governor of the city, no act of the corporation is valid without the concurrence of the lord mayor. According to a custom of nearly three hundred years' standing, he sits every morning at the mansion-house, to hear and determine causes of offence within the jurisdiction of the city. He is perpetual coroner and escheator for London, the Liberties, and Southwark; chief justice in all commissions for trial of felony and gaol delivery; and judge of all courts of wardmote for the election of aldermen. In other respects, his ordinary authority extends all over the city, and to part of the suburbs; and, as conservator of the Thames, it extends eastward on the river as far as Yardale, or Yantlet, and the mouth of the river Medway; and westward to Colne ditch, above Staines' bridge; and he is perpetual commissioner in all affairs relating to the river Lea. To the lord mayor also belongs the ancient court of Hustings, which preserves the laws, rights, franchises, and customs, of the city. He acts as chief butler at all coronations, receiving a golden cup and ewer for his fee; and is first commissioner of the lieutenancy, being invested with powers similar to those possessed by the lord-lieutenant of a county.

The Aldermen are chosen for life, by the free householders of every ward, that of Bridge Without excepted, to which the aldermen themselves elect. The lord mayor presides at the election of an alderman, and, if a poll be demanded, it terminates in three days. Those aldermen who have filled the civic chair are justices of the quorum; and all the other aldermen are justices of the peace within the city. They are subordinate governors of their respective wards, under the jurisdiction of the lord mayor, and they exercise an extensive power within their own districts. They hold courts of ward-mote, for the election of common council-men and other ward officers, the regulation of the business of the ward, the removal of obstructions, &c.; and, in the discharge of these duties, each alderman is assisted by one or two deputies, who are annually selected by himself from among the common council-men of his own ward: the aldermen are officially addressed by the title of "Your Worship."

The Common Council men represent the inhabitants of their respective wards. Their office is annual, and their number, which formerly varied, is at present fixed, according to the number of the city precincts, at two hundred and thirty-six, for the whole of the wards. They are chosen by the inhabitant householders, in the same manner as the aldermen, with this difference, that the lord mayor presides at the election of an alderman, and the alderman at the election of a common council-man. The election for each ward takes place on St. Thomas' day, the alderman deciding on disputed votes, and declaring the return.

The representatives of the wards, with the lord mayor and aldermen, constitute what is called the court of Common Council, or Three City Estates. The powers of this court are extensive. It has the entire disposal of the funds of the corporation, makes such by-laws as it thinks necessary for the regulation of its concerns, and possesses the right of nomination to several of the subordinate city offices; and, in addressing it by petition, or otherwise, it has the style of "Honourable." The court debates in a spacious and elegant chamber attached to the guildhall, the lord mayor officially habited and attended, with the city regalia before him, occupying a state chair on an elevated platform at one end, below whom sit the aldermen also in their official costume. The sittings of the court are usually public, but it has the power, though rarely exercised, of excluding strangers. The common council cannot assemble without a summons from the lord mayor, and then for one sitting only; but it is his duty to call a meeting whenever it is demanded by requisition, and the law compels him to assemble the court a certain number of times during his mayoralty. The common council annually elect six aldermen and twelve common council-men, as a committee for letting the city lands, and this committee generally meets at the guildhall, on Wednesdays; it also appoints another committee of four aldermen, and eight common council-men, for transacting the affairs of Gresham college, who usually meet at Mercers' hall, according to the appointment of the lord mayor, who is always one of their number. Besides the appointment of these and several other committees, they, by virtue of a royal grant, annually choose a governor, deputy, and assistants, for the management of the city lands in Ireland. In short, the civil administration, in all its branches, within the jurisdiction of the corporation (which in all cases embraces the city, and part of the borough of Southwark, and in some extends beyond), is exercised by the corporation, or its officers.

The Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who are, strictly speaking, officers of the king, are chosen by such citizens as are of the livery, out of their own number in the guildhall, upon Midsummer-day, but are not sworn into office until Michaelmas-day, when each sheriff enters into a bond of £1000 to the corporation to serve it faithfully; after which, they proceed in state to Westminster, to be accepted on behalf of the king, by the barons of the Exchequer. The mode of nominating the sheriff is, for the lord mayor to drink in succession to fourteen respectable citizens, two of whom are elected, and who are obliged to serve, according to a by-law made in 1748, under a penalty of £600, to be forfeited to the city, and £13. 6. 8. to the officers of the city prisons, unless the person chosen will swear that he is not worth £15,000. Of this £600, one hundred pounds is given to him who first agrees to fill the office. In the election of a sheriff, the opinion of the livery in common hall is not decisive, and if a poll be demanded, it continues open for seven days. The lord mayor cannot properly nominate a commoner as sheriff, if there be an alderman who has not served that office, though it is frequently done; but if the citizen drank to pays the fine, he is excepted from being again nominated for three years, unless within that term he becomes an alderman. No alderman can be exempted for more than one year after a previous payment, without the consent of the common council. The jurisdiction of the two sheriffs is, to a considerable extent, perfectly separate; but if either die, the other cannot act until a new one be chosen; for there must be two sheriffs for London, which, by charter, is both a city and a county, though they make but one jointly for the county of Middlesex. By grant of Edward IV., in 1473, the sheriffs are appointed to have sixteen serjeants, and every serjeant his yeoman; also a secondary, six clerks, a clerk of the papers, four under-clerks, and two under-sheriffs. In serving writs of process, where the king is a party, the sheriffs may break open doors, or untile houses, to gain admittance, if entrance be denied; but not upon private process, except upon outlawry after judgment.

Of the officers associated with the corporation in the city government, the principal is the Recorder, who is appointed by the lord mayor and aldermen for life, with a salary of £2500 per annum. He must be a grave and learned lawyer, and as such, usually acts as judge at the Old Bailey, and other courts: he takes precedence in councils and courts before all aldermen who have not filled the office of mayor. The Chamberlain, Common Serjeant, and Town Clerk, are officers ranking next to the recorder, and have respectively duties to perform of great importance, as have also the City Comptroller, and City Remembrancer. There are various other inferior city officers.

Common-Halls, which are assemblies of the livery, are convenable on requisition of several of its members to the lord mayor, who presides, and are only called on extraordinary occasions. The Livery, about twelve hundred in number, and who return four members to parliament, are composed of the respective livery-men of the city companies, of which there are ninety-one. The first twelve that stand on the list are called the Chief, or Twelve Great Companies, viz., Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Merchant-Tailors, Haberdashers, Salters, Ironmongers, Vintners, and Clothworkers, and are sometimes styled "The Honourable." The less important ones have the title of "Worshipful." Nearly fifty of the companies have halls, some of which are remarkable as buildings, and others for their curiosities and paintings; most of them have "clerks," or solicitors, with offices on the premises, who have the custody of the Company's records, and transact its legal business. Several of these Companies attend the lord mayor on his inauguration, in their livery gowns, with banners, streamers, music, &c., and on the water, conveyed in elegant state barges, concluding the ceremonies of the procession with splendid dinners at their respective halls. The freedom of the city is obtained by apprenticeship to a freeman; by redemption, fine, or ransom; and by gift of the corporation: to be a liveryman, however, it is necessary to be free of one of the incorporated companies.

The Guildhall, or common hall of the corporation of London, where all their courts, meetings, and festivals are held, is situated at the upper end of King-street, Cheapside, and comprises numerous buildings and apartments. It was originally erected by subscription, in 1411, prior to which period the corporation meetings (as before stated) were held in a small structure in Aldermanbury. This edifice, having been greatly damaged by the fire in 1666, the present pile was formed from such parts as remained, excepting the new front facing King-street, which, with several additions and repairs, was completed in 1789. The hall is a very noble room, being one hundred and fifty-three feet long, forty-five broad, and fifty-five feet high: the ceiling, since the fire, has been made flat and panelled. Two magnificent windows of stained glass diffuse over the whole a strong but mellowed light: in the eastern window, which is at the upper end of the hall, are emblazoned the arms of England; and in the western those of the corporation of London. The sides of the hall are decorated with blank Gothic arches and panelling, besides large marble monuments erected to the memory of the Earl of Chatham; his son, the late Rt. Hon. William Pitt; Admiral Lord Nelson; and the spirited lord mayor, William Beckford. The magnitude and grandeur of the hall may be estimated from the fact that it is capable of holding six or seven thousand persons, and actually accommodated that number at the great feast given to the allied sovereigns in 1814. The giants in guildhall are two immense figures, carved in wood, supposed to represent an ancient Briton and a Saxon. Of the apartments in the rear of the hall, appropriated to the use of the corporation, the principal is the council-chamber, a large room, the ceiling of which forms a dome, with a sky-light in its centre. In this room the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council, hold their courts, or city parliaments. It is decorated with a collection of paintings, most of which were presented to the city of London by the public-spirited Alderman Boydell; and at the upper end, immediately behind the chair of the lord mayor, upon a pedestal of white marble, stands a statue of George III. The chamberlain's apartment is elegantly decorated with framed and glazed copies, richly and beautifully illuminated on vellum, of the numerous votes of thanks from the corporation, to the heroes who signalized themselves in the late wars. The court of Aldermen hold their meetings in the Old Council-Chamber, the ceiling of which is highly decorated. Over the entrance in the front of the hall a library of works relative to the history of London and the counties immediately adjoining, has been recently formed, and is already of considerable extent. The courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Commissioners of Bankrupts, formerly situated at the back of the hall, now occupy the site of the ancient guildhall, chapel, and Blackwell hall; and near the same spot is the Court of Requests, the Irish Chamber, and other offices of the corporation, forming a mass of convenient though not very elegant buildings.

Mansion House. This building was finished in 1753, at an expense of £42,638. 18. 8., as a residence for the chief magistrate, who before had no suitable dwelling in which to exercise the duties and maintain the state and dignity of his office. It stands on the site of the Stocks market, at the western end of Lombard-street, and in the most central part of the city, and is a spacious and stately edifice, constructed entirely of Portland stone, but of rather ponderous aspect. In front is a fine portico, composed of six large fluted Corinthian columns, which rise from a massive rustic basement, and are surmounted by a pediment, the tympanum of which exhibits a good piece of sculpture by Taylor, emblematic of the dignity and opulence of the city of London, and the various virtues by which they have been established and maintained. In the centre of the basement story, under the portico, is the gateway leading to the kitchens and offices, and a double flight of steps leads over this story to the grand entrance beneath the portico. A stone balustrade encloses these steps, and is continued along the whole length of the front. The body of the building presents two tiers of lofty windows, and over these, and above the portico, is an attic story surmounted by a balustrade; the cornices are rich and deep, and supported by Corinthian pilasters. These parts, in themselves elegant and complete, have been universally allowed to be deformed by a supplementary piece of building (formerly two) raised on the top contrary to the architect's wish, to give a loftier ceiling to a ball-room, and from which he has derived unmerited censure. The interior is arranged with taste and judgment, possessing, amongst other state apartments, a magnificent banquet-room, called "The Egyptian Hall," ninety feet long, the whole width of the mansion, and sixty feet broad, with a lofty and richly-ornamented concave roof; a ball-room; a withdrawing-room; and a state chamber, containing a magnificent state bed.

COURTS OF LAW, &c.

The Lord Mayor's Court is held in the King's Bench, Guildhall, by the lord mayor, recorder, and aldermen, for actions of debt and trespass, for appeals from inferior courts, and for foreign attachments; giving decisions in all cases whatsoever, in fourteen days, at an expense not exceeding thirty shillings. The Court of Hustings is the ancient and supreme court of the city, for pleas of land, and common pleas. The sheriffs hold courts of record, every Wednesday and Friday, for actions entered at Giltspur-street Compter; and on Thursday and Saturday for actions entered at the Poultry Compter, which are for debt, trespasses, accounts, covenant-breaking, attachments, and sequestrations, to any amount. The sheriffs, or their deputies, may sit with the judges of these courts upon trials, if they please. The Court of Requests and of Conscience formerly took cognizance of no cause above 40s., but now extends to all debts under £5: the process is by summons; and if the party do not appear, the commissioners have power, after judgment is obtained, to apprehend and commit: the commissioners examine the witnesses on oath, and according to their own judgment pronounce a verdict, from which there is no appeal. The Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen appoints monthly such aldermen and commoners for commissioners as they think fit; and these, or any three of them, compose a court, held on Wednesday and Saturday, from 12 till 2 o'clock, in the new court-room near guildhall. The other city courts are—The Chamberlain's Court, held every day, to determine differences between masters and apprentices, and to admit such persons as are duly qualified to the freedom of the city. The Court of Orphans, held before the lord mayor and aldermen, as guardians of the children of deceased freemen under twenty-one years of age. The Pie Powder Court, held only during the continuance of Bartholomew fair. A Court of Conservancy, held by the lord mayor and aldermen four times a year, as before stated. A Court of Petty Session, for small offences, held daily at the Mansion House in the forenoon, by the lord mayor and one alderman, and daily at guildhall, by two aldermen in rotation. The Coroner's Court, to enquire into the causes of sudden death; and the Court of the Tower of London, held within the verge of the city, by a steward, appointed by the Constable of the Tower, by whom are tried actions of debt, trespass, and covenants.

The exercise of its own military government is one of the peculiar privileges possessed by the city of London from the earliest times; its forces formerly consisted of what were termed the trained bands, but now of two regiments of militia, raised, according to an act of parliament passed in 1794, by ballot, and consisting of two thousand two hundred men. The officers are appointed by the commissioners of the king's lieutenancy for the city of London, of whom the lord mayor is the principal; and one regiment may, in certain cases, be placed by the king under any of his general officers, and marched to any place not exceeding twelve miles from the capital, or to the nearest encampment; the other being, at all such times, to remain in the city.

With regard to the general civil government of London, it must be observed, that the suburbs in Middlesex are under the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace for the county, as part of the county. The county hall for Middlesex is on Clerkenwell-green; and at the sessions there, great part of the civil government of the suburbs in Middlesex is exercised. At the sessions-house in the Old Bailey, four general sessions of Oyer and Terminer are held, and four others by adjournment, (so that there are eight sessions every year,) for crime committed in London, or the county of Middlesex. Over this court one of the twelve judges, the lord mayor, the aldermen who have passed the civic chair, and the recorder, or common serjeant, preside. Both the sheriffs officially attend: the juries are composed of citizens, for offences committed in the city; and of house-keepers in Middlesex, for those committed in the county: the grand jury sits at the sessions-house on Clerkenwell-green.

The government of Westminster, until the Reformation, was arbitrary under the abbot and monks; then under a bishop, dean and chapter, and subsequently, by an act passed in the 27th of Elizabeth, the civil government was placed in the hands of the laity, the dean being, at the same time, empowered to nominate the chief officers: the principal magistrates are, a high steward, usually a nobleman, the office being generally held for life; a high bailiff, chosen by the high steward, also for life, and who has the chief management of parliamentary elections for Westminster, as well as the control of all the other bailiffs: he summons juries, and in the courts leet sits next to the deputy steward. To him all fines and forfeitures belong, which renders the situation very lucrative, and occasions a considerable sum to be given for it. Besides these, there are sixteen burgesses and their assistants, whose functions in all respects resemble those of the aldermen's deputies of the city of London, each having his proper ward under his jurisdiction; and from these are elected two head burgesses, one for the city, and the other for the liberties, who in the court leet rank next to the high bailiff. There is also a high constable, who is chosen by the court leet, and to whom all the other constables are subordinate. The four principal courts for the city and liberties of Westminster are, the Court of the Duchy of Lancaster, held in Somerset-place; the Court of Quarter Sessions of the peace, held by the justices for the city and liberties, four times a year, at the guildhall, Westminster; St. Martin's-le-Grand Court and the Westminster Court, or court-leet. The three first are courts of record; the duchy court being for all matters of law and equity relating to the duchy of Lancaster; that of quarter sessions, for all trespasses, petty larcenies, and other minor offences committed in Westminster and its liberties; that of St. Martin's-le-Grand, for the trial of all personal actions appertaining to that particular liberty; and the court leet, which is held by the Dean of Westminster, or his deputy, for choosing parochial officers, preventing and removing nuisances, &c. The city and liberties of Westminster return two members to parliament, who are elected by the inhabitant householders; the high bailiff being the returning officer.

Southwark was governed by its own bailiffs until 1327; but the city suffering great inconvenience from the number of malefactors that escaped thither from the jurisdiction of the city magistrates, the mayor of London was then, by charter, constituted bailiff of Southwark, and empowered to govern it by his deputy. Edward VI. granted the "Borough, or Town of Southwark" to the city of London, for a pecuniary consideration, and afterwards, for a further consideration of the same kind, it was made a twenty-sixth ward to the city, by the name of Bridge ward Without. It became, in consequence, subject to the lord mayor, who has under him a steward and a bailiff, the former of whom holds a court of record every Monday at St. Margaret's hill, for debts, damages, and trespasses. Here is also a court of record for the Clink liberty, held near Bankside, in Southwark, by the Bishop of Winchester's steward, for actions of debt, trespass, &c., within that liberty; The Borough returns two members to parliament, who are chosen by the inhabitant householders, and returned by the high bailiff.

For the Suburbs there are three principal courts, viz., the Sheriffs' Court for the county of Middlesex, for actions of debt, trespass, assault, &c.; East Smithfield Court, which is a court leet and a court baron held for that liberty, to inquire into nuisances, &c.: in the court baron pleas are held to the amount of 40s. General and Quarter Sessions of the peace, for the liberty of the Tower of London, are held by the justices of that liberty, eight times a year, for petty larcenies, trespasses, felonies, misdemeanours, &c. A Court of Requests is held for the Tower Hamlets, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

In the metropolis are also held the four great law courts of the kingdom, viz., The King's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, and High Court of Chancery. The two first are held alternately at Westminster hall and at Guildhall in the city; the Exchequer court at Westminster hall only; and the Court of Chancery alternately at Westminster hall and Lincoln's Inn, where causes are heard by the chancellor or vice-chancellor. There is also the Rolls' Court, held by the Master of the Rolls in the Rolls' chapel, Chancery-lane. Civil and ecclesiastical causes are tried at Doctors' Commons, at which place are also held the Courts of Admiralty. The ecclesiastical courts are, The Court of Arches, for appeals from inferior ecclesiastical courts in the province of Canterbury, of which the Court of Peculiars here is a branch; the Prerogative Court, for causes relative to wills and administrations; the Faculty Court, empowered to grant dispensations to marry, &c.; and the Court of Delegates, for ecclesiastical affairs.

London also contains, besides the courts already described, the following: The Palace Court, or Marshalsea, held formerly at the Old Court-house in the Borough, but now in Scotland-yard, opposite the Admiralty: it has jurisdiction of all civil suits within twelve miles of Whitehall, the city of London excepted, and takes cognizance of debts to any amount above 40s., but all actions for debts above £20 may be removed into any of the superior courts. The High Court of Admiralty, Doctors' Commons, which takes cognizance of all maritime pleas, criminal and civil, the latter being determined according to the civil law, the plaintiff giving security to prosecute, and, if cast, to pay what is adjudged; but the former, being tried by special commission, at the sessions-house in the Old Bailey, by a judge and jury, a judge of the common law assists. A Court for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, instituted a few years since, by act of parliament, for the purpose of releasing debtors in England and Wales, who have been imprisoned and apply by petition to be liberated, upon surrendering their effects to their creditors: the commissioners, who preside as judges, hold their sittings at a newly-erected court-house, in Portugal-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. Courts of Request for the summary recovery of debts not exceeding 40s. are situated in various parts of the town: there is one in Vine-street, Piccadilly; one in Kingsgate-street, Holborn; another in Trinity-street, near Stones-end, Borough; one in Osbourne-street, Whitechapel; one in Castle-street, Leicester-square; and one in Bowling-Green-lane, Southwark.

PRISONS, AND POLICE OF THE METROPOLIS

The prisons for criminals are, Newgate, Cold-bath-fields, the Penitentiary at Millbank, New Prison (Clerkenwell), Tothill-fields bridewell, and the gaol for the county of Surrey, Southwark. The prisons for debtors are, Giltspur-street Compter, Debtors' prison (White Cross-street), the King's Bench, the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and the Borough Compter. Of these the majority are extensive, and, in several instances, though gloomy, not inelegant piles of building: Newgate, the general criminal prison for the city of London and the county of Middlesex, may be particularly mentioned as being such. It is of stone, divided within into several court-yards, and possesses a handsome uniform front towards the west, consisting of two wings, with the governor's house forming the centre. Criminals are executed on a temporary scaffold fixed in front of this prison.

The city of London, as already stated, is under the control of its own magistracy, consisting of the lord mayor and aldermen, &c.; the marshalsmen, beadles, and constables, amount to three hundred and nineteen; and the watchmen and patrols to eight hundred and three: in the Tower hamlets, including the eastern part of the town, are two hundred and eighteen constables, and two hundred and eight watchmen and patrols; and in the liberty of the Tower of London are seventeen constables, and fourteen watchmen and patrols: for all the parts of the metropolis out of this jurisdiction stipendiary magistrates are appointed; four at Bow-street, with a jurisdiction long established, and twenty-four by virtue of a statute called the "Police Act," the latter having eight different offices assigned to them, namely, one in each of the following situations: Bow-street; Great Marlborough-street; Hatton Garden; Worship-street, Shore-ditch; Lambeth-street, Whitechapel; High-street, Marylebone; Queen's square, Westminster; and Union-street, Southwark. Besides these, there is the Thames Police Office, Wapping, established under a separate act of parliament, and almost wholly confined to the investigation of offences either committed on the river Thames, or connected with maritime affairs. Bow-street office is the most celebrated, being the chief, or head, of the London police, and wholly under the direction of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. This office has a principal, and three subordinate, magistrates, all of them in the commission of the peace for the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, Kent, and Essex: to it are attached three clerks and eight officers, with their attendants.

By the new police act the whole of the metropolis, exclusively of that part immediately denominated "the City and Liberties," is consolidated into one district, called "The Metropolitan Police district," and is not intended to interfere in any way with the police before noticed, but has been established with a view to the better security of the persons and property of the inhabitants, and to supersede the inefficient local police, previously existing in the several parishes within the district; which has been formed into seventeen divisions, comprising the whole of the metropolis, and extends eastward to Stratford, Poplar, and Greenwich; southward to Streatham, Tooting, and Wandsworth; westward to Acton, Ealing, and Brentford; and northward to Hampstead, Islington, Newington, and Hackney. Each of the divisions is under the charge of a superior officer, named a superintendent of police, who is considered responsible for the activity and good conduct of the men acting within his division: the total amount of force is three thousand three hundred. They are divided into four classes;—the superintendent above-mentioned, with a salary of £200 per annum;

the inspector, at a salary of £100 per annum; the police serjeant, paid at the rate of £1. 2. 6., and the ordinary police constable, at 19s., per week: each division has one superintendent, six inspectors, and twenty-two serjeants, except the letter K division, which has thirty-two serjeants: the men are provided with a plain blue uniform. Two magistrates, or commissioners, with salaries of £800 per annum each, control, with the approbation of the secretary of state, the whole metropolitan police force, for which a new police office has been established at Westminster, and they have the power, not only of regulating all matters respecting arms, accoutrements, &c., but of discharging any person who acts improperly; besides whom there is a general receiver, or treasurer, with a salary of £700 per annum. All appointments to the higher stations in the police are confined to those men who have distinguished themselves by good conduct in the lower ranks; they must be of vigorous constitution, not above thirty-five years old (excepting such as have served in the army), nor under five feet seven inches in height; and as the amount of pay is deemed sufficient for a comfortable livelihood, they are required to devote their whole time to the service, without exhausting themselves by other labour. The annual expense of the establishment, which is defrayed by rates chargeable on the several parishes and places where they act, is about £200,000.

INNS OF COURT, and COURTS OF JUDICATURE.

The London Inns of Court were originally like colleges in a university, but confined to the study of the law. Though their origin cannot be exactly ascertained, they may be presumed to have owed their rise to the establishment of the courts of justice at Westminster, by Henry III., which, collecting in their neighbourhood the whole body of common lawyers, or practitioners, in those courts, they began to form themselves into a society (supposed at Thavies Inn, Holborn,) in a collegiate manner; hence their place of residence was denominated an Inn (Hostell), or House of Court; and the king, in 1244, forbade the teaching of law in schools set up in the city, as had been accustomed, and restricted its study to these inns. Their increase, as well as division into Inns of Court and Inns of Chancery, is not recognized till the reign of Edward III., when their students are called apprentices of the law (from the Fr. Apprendre), and the Inns of Court became appropriated solely to the study of the common law, as were the latter to such clerks as studied the forming of writs and other process in chancery. Till late in the seventeenth century, the students of the various inns were exercised before the principals in sham pleadings, called mootings, and many antiquated customs were retained, as well as occasionally splendid ceremonies exhibited. At present these inns have become mere residences, not for lawyers only, but any persons who choose to hire chambers in them; and the law-student, before being called to the bar, is now only obliged to be entered of one of these places, and dine in the common hall a certain number of terms; after which, should his admission not be objected to by the members, an occurrence that rarely happens, he is legally qualified to plead and conduct causes. The Inns of Court are not incorporated, consequently the masters, principals, benchers, &c., by whom they are governed, can make no by-laws, nor possess estates, &c.; yet they have certain orders which, by consent and prescription, have obtained the force of laws: the societies are entirely supported by sums paid for admissions and for chambers; and from the benchers, or seniors, in whom the government is vested, a treasurer is usually chosen to manage these funds; the other members may be divided into outer barristers, inner barristers, and students.

The principal Inns of Court are four:—The Inner Temple, Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn: the Inns of Chancery are seven, viz., Clifford's Inn, Lyon's Inn, Clement's Inn, and New Inn, belonging to the two Temples; Furnival's Inn, belonging to Lincoln's Inn; and Staples Inn, and Bernard's Inn, belonging to Gray's Inn. Thavies Inn, Scroop's Inn, Chester Inn, or Strand Inn, as well as Johnson's Inn, and some others in the city, have long been disused. Of the two Serjeant's Inns, in Fleet-street and Chancery-lane, the latter only is appropriated as chambers for the Serjeants at law, who removed thither from Symond's Inn, which is falling to decay, and merely tenanted as chambers by any one who chooses to rent them. Serjeant's Inn, Fleet-street, consists now of private residences.

THE TEMPLE is so called from its original inhabitants, the Knights Templars, who, on quitting their old house in Southampton-buildings, Holborn, in the reign of Henry II., built a house in Fleet-street, thence called the New Temple, which occupied all the ground from White Friars to Essex-street. On their suppression by Edward II., the Temple, after two or three intermediate grants from the Crown, was, by Edward III., given to the monastery of St. John of Jerusalem, the prior and convent of which afterwards demised it to the lawyers, supposed to have emigrated here from Thavies Inn, at a yearly rent of £10, a sum for which they still enjoy from the Crown the whole of this splendid property. The Temple is at present divided between the two societies—the Inner and Middle Templars, each consisting of benchers, barristers, and students, the government being vested in the benchers. In term-time the members dine in the hall of the society, which is called keeping commons; to dine a fortnight in each term, is deemed keeping the term, and twelve of those terms qualify a student, after being called to the bar, to plead and manage causes in the courts: each society has also a treasurer, sub-treasurer, steward, chief butler, three under-butchers, upper and under cook, and various other officers and servants. The Temple Church is the chief architectural attraction belonging to these societies, though each has also a fine large hall, and an extensive library, as well as beautiful gardens: the garden of the Inner Temple affords a remarkably fine summer promenade. The houses are generally large plain brick edifices, divided into sets of chambers, most of which are spacious apartments.

Lincoln's Inn occupies, with its gardens and squares, a very extensive plot of ground on the western side of Chancery-lane. It has a fine ancient brick gateway opening from Chancery-lane, built by Sir Thomas Lovel in the reign of Henry VII.; a hall erected by the same person, wherein the Lord Chancellor holds his sittings; and a chapel built by Inigo Jones, in the English style of architecture. The buildings occupy four large squares, exclusively of the avenues to them, &c.; and the garden affords a most agreeable promenade.

Gray's Inn is chiefly remarkable for its large and beautiful garden. The buildings consist principally of two quadrangles, separated by a hall and chapel, and two handsome ranges of building recently erected, called Verulam and Raymond buildings: the chambers and regulations of both these last inns are similar to those of the Temple. Most of the other inns consist of double courts, surrounded by large brick buildings divided into chambers: all of them have halls, and several have good libraries and gardens. The finest, in point of architecture, is Furnival's Inn, situated in Holborn, which has been lately rebuilt in an excellent style, and forms a large and beautiful pile of buildings.

The four great courts of Judicature are, the High Court of Chancery, the Court of Exchequer, the Court of King's Bench, and the Court of Common Pleas, held in Westminster Hall. The rooms in which the business of these courts is transacted are situated on the western side of the great hall, and have been elegantly fitted up by Mr. Soane. This was the great hall of the ancient palace of Westminster, and is celebrated as the scene of many important events in English history: the first hall was founded by William Rufus, but the present edifice was for the most part erected by Richard II. The grand entrance is flanked by large square embattled towers, richly ornamented with canopies, once containing statues, in rows above each other. Westminster Hall is considered to be the largest apartment in Europe unsupported by pillars, being two hundred and seventy feet long, seventy-four broad, and ninety high: the floor is of stone; and the side walls and ends are pierced with elegant windows, the latter being of vast magnitude and highly-elaborate workmanship. The roof has always excited particular admiration; it is of chesnut, forming an immense arch, supported by carved angels bearing shields of the founder's arms. Parliaments were anciently held in this hall, and it was the court of justice in which the sovereign presided in person. The coronation feasts have been held here for many ages past, and it is also occasionally used for the trial of peers, or other persons impeached by the commons.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES and other PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The offices more immediately connected with the affairs of government occupy a grand line of buildings, stretching entirely across the eastern extremity of St. James' Park, from Spring Gardens to Downing-street. The most northern is the Admiralty; next is the War Office, or Horse Guards; then the Treasury; lastly, the offices of the three Secretaries of State.

The War Office, or Horse Guards, derives its latter appellation from the circumstance of that branch of the military mounting guard here. It is a noble, though rather heavy building, erected by Ware, at an expense of more than £30,000. A handsome portal leads through it from St. James' Park into Parliament-street. Here, in a variety of apartments, is transacted all business relative to the British army. The Admiralty and Treasury are both fine buildings; the former, originally called Wallingford House, and facing Parliament-street, has a beautiful screen by Adams, which, with its spacious portico, renders it on the whole a commanding pile: the Lords of the Admiralty have here their offices, together with spacious private apartments: on the top of the building is a semaphore telegraph, which communicates orders, by signal, to the principal parts of the kingdom. The Treasury is an extensive pile of buildings, partly formed out of the remains of Whitehall palace: the principal front, which is of stone, looks into St. James' Park, that next Parliament-street has been rebuilt in a splendid style by Mr. Soane. Besides the Board of Treasury, this edifice contains a variety of offices, amongst which is the Council Chamber. The buildings of the other government offices situated in the immediate vicinity of the above, and which consist of the offices of the Secretaries of State, the Board of Control for the affairs of India, the offices of the Crown Lands, and of the Board of Works, &c., have nothing in them particularly worthy of notice.

Somerset House, the most noble collection of the Government offices in London, derives its name from being built on the site of the magnificent palace erected by the Protector Somerset, in the reign of Edward VI. After being for several ages occasionally inhabited by the queens of England, it was rebuilt, as it now stands, under the superintendence of Sir William Chambers, in 1775. It comprises the Navy Office, Navy Pay Office, Salt Office, Stamp Office, the Offices of the Auditor of the Exchequer, those of the Chancellors of the duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, the Hawkers' and Pedlars' Office, Stage-coach Office, Legacy-duty Office, and the whole revenue establishment of the Tax Offices: all these are situated in the quadrangle which forms the main body of the pile. The beautiful front next the Strand has been munificently devoted to the use of the Royal Society, the Society of Antiquaries, and the Royal Academy of Arts. Somerset House occupies a space of about eight hundred feet in width, and five hundred in depth; and for magnitude, as well as architectural merit, ranks among the foremost of the public buildings in London. The magnificent Strand front, the extensive quadrangular court, the yet grander front next the Thames, with its terrace, one of the finest in the world, all combine, with the numerous spacious apartments and offices it contains, to excite admiration. The buildings of the King's College, just founded, under the patronage of His late Majesty, for the purpose of giving instruction to youth in the metropolis, are to form the eastern wing of the south front of this edifice, which, without it, was incomplete: this design is actively being carried into execution.

Tower of London. "The Tower," as it is familiarly called, stands on the northern bank of the Thames, and consists of a large pile of building, the irregularity of which arises from its having been erected and enlarged by various sovereigns, at distant periods of time: it served the purpose of a fortified palace to many of the early monarchs of England. Tradition ascribes the origin of this fortress to Julius Cæsar, but the earliest authentic account of it is, that William the Conqueror, having no great reliance on the fidelity of his new subjects of London, on fixing his residence in the metropolis, built a strong hold to overawe them, on part of the present site of the Tower. In 1078, he appointed Gundulph, Bishop of Rochester, a skilful architect, to superintend the building of a larger fort, being the same, though repaired or rebuilt by some of his successors, which is now called the White Tower. It is situated in the centre of the fortress, and is a square building with four watch-towers, one of which is used as an observatory: this part of the building contains, besides a small armoury for the sea service, an ancient Norman chapel, dedicated to St. John, in which the kings and queens who resided here performed their devotions: it is of an oblong form, circular at the east end, and supported by short round pillars: in this place the ancient records of the kingdom are now kept in presses. In 1082, William Rufus laid the foundations of a castle southward and near to the river, which was finished by his successor, Henry I.: beneath it were two gates, one called Traitor's gate, through which state prisoners were conveyed to their cells, the other bearing the name of the Bloody gate. Henry III. added a strong gate and bulwark to the west entrance, repaired and whitened the square tower, which probably gave it the name it still retains; and extended the fortress by a mud wall, which was superseded by one of brick by Edward IV., who built within this enclosure the present Lions' tower. Charles II. and the succeeding sovereigns down to His late Majesty George IV., have made various additions and alterations within the area enclosed by the ancient fortifications: the exterior walls of the tower now include an area of twelve acres and five roods. The exterior circuit of the ditch, which entirely surrounds it, is three thousand one hundred and fifty-six feet: it is separated from the Thames by a broad quay, behind which is a platform for mounting sixty-one pieces of cannon, which are brought out and fired on all occasions of public rejoicing. The principal entrance is by three successive gates on the western side, two of which are outside the ditch; the second gate, on entering, leads to a stone bridge thrown across the ditch; and the third, which is the strongest, stands at the inner end of the bridge: this is guarded by soldiers; and when these gates are opened in the morning, the formalities of a garrison are observed. The interior, which forms a parish within itself, but subject to the visitation of the Bishop of London, contains several streets, and a variety of buildings, including the Tower parish church, or Royal Free Chapel of St. Peter ad Vincula; the White Tower, the Ordnance Office, the Record Office, the Jewel Office, the Horse Armoury, the Grand Storehouse, the new or small Armoury, houses belonging to the officers of the Tower, barracks for the garrison, and two sutling-houses, commonly used by the officers of the garrison. Several of the public buildings just mentioned are of great interest, and others contain numerous curiosities well worthy of inspection, particularly the Horse Armoury, the small Armoury, the room where the spoils of the Spanish Armada are kept, the Menagerie, and the Jewel Office, in which are kept the crowns and other regalia, used at coronations. The government is entrusted to a Constable, who is generally a person of high rank: under his command are a lieutenant and a deputy-lieutenant, the latter being called the governor, with several other subordinate officers, besides forty wardens, who bear the same rich antique uniform worn by the corps at its formation by Henry VII.: the Tower is garrisoned by His Majesty's household troops.

The Mint, originally situated within the limits of the Tower, and the business of which was afterwards for some time carried on at Soho, near Birmingham, now stands at the north-eastern corner of Tower Hill, on the site of the old Victualling-Office. It is a noble building, from a design by Mr. Smirke, Jun., having an extensive stone front, it consists of a ground floor and two stories above, the whole surmounted by a handsome balustrade. The wings are ornamented with pilasters; and in the centre are several demi-columns, over which is a pediment bearing the arms of England: over the porch is a gallery with balustrades, &c., of the Doric order. This extensive establishment contains steam-engines, and all the numerous mechanical works for facilitating the operations of the coinage.

BRIDGES.

The bridges which unite the southern with the northern part of the metropolis are remarkable for their architecture, magnitude and solidity.

London Bridge, the most ancient of them all, was the only bridge connecting the Middlesex and Surrey shores of the capital until the eighteenth century, and may be regarded as the limit which separates the sea and river navigation of the Thames. It was founded in 1176, and originally supported a street of houses, with a chapel, entrance gate-ways, &c., which remained, with various alterations, until the year 1756, when it was cleared of the whole of its buildings, thoroughly repaired, and surmounted, as at present, by an open balustrade and lamps. In consequence of the inconvenience and danger to the navigation of the Thames by this bridge, it was determined to erect a new one.

The New London Bridge was begun March 15th, 1824, under the superintendence of Mr. Rennie, the architect; and, according to contract, was to be finished, for the sum of £506,000, in six years from that period, which sum was not to include the formation of approaches, nor the expense of removing the old bridge. The work is now nearly completed, and will be entirely finished early in the year 1831: it is built of granite; the number of its noble arches is five; and, when completed, the sides will be guarded by plain balustrades. The approaches at both ends are to be carried over arches, and will communicate with spacious streets; that next the Borough, from exposing to the view the whole of St. Saviour's church, will, in particular, give to the southern approach a novel and wonderful dignity.

Southwark Bridge is a magnificent structure of cast-iron, with stone piers and abutments, forming a communication from the central part of the city to Bankside, Southwark, and thence to the roads leading into Kent and Surrey: it was designed by Mr. Rennie, and consists of three arches: the centre arch rises twenty-four feet, with a span of two hundred and forty feet, the span of each of the side arches being two hundred and ten feet: the whole was completed in March, 1819, at an expense, including the approaches, of £800,000, being one of the most stupendous works of the kind ever formed of such materials. Many of the solid castings weigh ten tons each, and the total weight of the iron employed is about five thousand seven hundred and eighty tons. The abutments are of solid masonry, laid in radiating courses, with large blocks of Bramly-fall and Whitby stones. The work was commenced on the 23rd of September, 1814, and the bridge was opened in April, 1819.

Blackfriars' Bridge was named, at the time of its foundation, "Pitt's bridge," as a testimony of the respect entertained by the citizens of London for the character and talents of that eminent statesman, William Pitt, the first Earl of Chatham, whose name was accordingly inscribed on a plate laid under the foundation stone. The act of parliament empowered the corporation to raise £30,000 per annum, until the sum should amount to £160,000. The first stone was laid by the Lord Mayor, Sir Thomas Chitty, on the 31st of October, 1760; and in the course of 1770 the work was completed; its construction having occupied nearly eleven years: the architect was Mr. Robert Mylne. The expense amounted only to £160,000, and was defrayed by a toll for several years. The bridge has nine elliptical arches: the span of the centre arch is one hundred feet, those on each side decreasing gradually towards the shores, being respectively ninety-eight, ninety-three, eighty-three, and seventy feet wide, leaving a clear water way of seven hundred and eighty-eight feet. Each side of the bridge is guarded by an open stone balustrade, sufficiently low to allow to foot passengers a distinct prospect of the river. Over each pier there is a square recess, supported by double Ionic pillars and pilasters, which have a very light and ornamental effect: at each end of the bridge are two handsome flights of stone steps to the river.

Waterloo Bridge crosses the Thames from a little to the west of Somerset House to the opposite shore of Lambeth Marsh, uniting the Strand with the newly-formed line, or street, which extends to the Obelisk in St. George's Fields, and is regarded as one of the greatest magnificence. Of an extent larger than that of any of the other bridges over the Thames, it affords a fine level passage across the river; and, from the beauty and simplicity of the design, and its stability, it is calculated to remain a monument of architectural skill down to remote ages. The original projector was Mr. George Dodd, but, in consequence of a misunderstanding between him and the company, the execution of the work devolved on Mr. Rennie, who furnished two designs for the bridge, one having seven arches, and the other nine, the latter being adopted: the work was commenced in 1811, and completed in 1817. The bridge consists of nine elliptical arches, each of one hundred and twenty feet span, and thirty-five feet elevation: it is forty-two feet broad, being of the same width as Blackfriars' bridge; and its length is one thousand two hundred and forty-two feet, being nineteen feet longer, within the abutments, than Westminster bridge. The arches and piers are built of large blocks of granite, the latter being twenty feet thick, and surmounted by Tuscan columns, which support square recesses above. Upon the entire work, including the approaches, a sum greatly exceeding £1,000,000 sterling was expended.

Westminster Bridge was built between the years 1739 and 1750, and cost £389,500. It is one thousand two hundred and twenty-three feet long, and forty-four wide, having on each side of the carriage way a foot pavement; and it consists of thirteen large and two small semicircular arches, with fourteen intermediate piers and abutments: on its top are twenty-eight semi-octagonal recesses, twelve of which are covered by demi-cupolas. Under the arches is a free channel for the water, of eight hundred and seventy feet. The two middle piers contain each three thousand solid feet, or two hundred tons of Portland stone. The centre arch is seventy-six feet wide, the others diminish in width by four feet equally on each side, and the two smaller ones close in shore are each about twenty-five feet wide. The whole edifice is of stone, and rests upon a gravel bed, the piers having been sunk for that purpose to from five to fourteen feet under the bed of the river. At the period of its erection this bridge was esteemed one of the noblest structures of the kind in the world: its architect was M. Labyrie, an ingenious native of Switzerland: although not a century old, like that of Blackfriars, it exhibits evident marks of decay, from the decomposition of the stone of which it is constructed.

Vauxhall Bridge communicating with a new road across Tothill-fields, to Eaton-street, Pimlico, and Grosvenor-place, was commenced in the year 1813, and in August 1816 the bridge was completed and opened to the public: the architect was Mr. J. Walker. Although in magnitude and grandeur of proportions this bridge does not equal any one of the preceding, yet it merits praise for beauty and elegance. It is light and elegant, consisting of nine arches of cast-iron, each of seventy-eight feet span, having between eleven and twelve feet rise, and resting on rusticated stone piers laid with Roman cement. The breadth of the roadway is thirty-six feet, and the whole length of the bridge is eight hundred and nine feet: the cost was above £300,000. This bridge, as well as Southwark and Waterloo bridges, was erected by an incorporated company of share holders, who are authorised to levy a toll, that on foot passengers, being one penny each.

A bill has been recently brought into parliament for building a seventh bridge across the Thames at London, from the Horse-ferry road to Lambeth stairs, to be called the Royal Clarence bridge.

THAMES TUNNEL.

The idea of forming a subway under the bed of the Thames, to connect Rotherhithe with the opposite shore at Old Gravel lane, Wapping, was revived by Mr. Brunel, in 1824, a similar attempt having been made in 1809, upon a much smaller scale; and, though the project was then relinquished, yet the miners having extended their operations to within one hundred and thirty feet of the opposite shore, was thought sufficient encouragement for the present undertaking; accordingly, the sum of £200,000 was raised by transferable shares of £50 each, and the work was begun in March, 1825. Mr. Brunel's plan was, by means of frame-work, to excavate daily only such a space as could be immediately supported by brick arching, and a very considerable progress was made, with great promise of ultimate success, during several months: in the end, however, a similar accident to that which occasioned the abandonment of the former undertaking, but much more fatal in its effects, caused Mr. Brunel's attempt, like his predecessor's, to be suspended, and the excavation, after a great expenditure of money, and the loss of several lives, is for the present discontinued. The tunnel, if completed, was to have consisted of two arcades, lighted by gas, forming distinct ways for going and returning, and each containing a roadway and footway; the form of the arcades was to be cylindrical, about fifteen feet high, by twelve at their base, the two ways, with a separation wall of four feet, making twenty-eight feet breadth; the whole mass of masonry extending in breadth and height thirty seven feet by twenty-two.

ECCLESIASTICAL JURISDICTION.

At what precise period London was constituted the head of a diocese, is uncertain, but it is evident that it acquired this distinction not long after the introduction of Christianity into Britain. It appears to have been at first an archbishoprick, but after the metropolitan power was transferred to Canterbury, in consequence of the conversion to Christianity of Ethelbert, King of Kent, by Augustine, London sunk into a bishoprick, and Mellitus was made the first bishop, in 604. The diocese was co-extensive with the ancient kingdom of the East Saxons, comprehending the counties of Middlesex and Essex, and part of Hertfordshire, to which have been added the British plantations in America. Though locally in the province of Canterbury, it is exempt from the visitation of the Archbishop; and the Bishop of London enjoys precedence over all the other bishops, ranking in dignity next to the Archbishop of York. The ecclesiastical establishment is composed of a bishop, dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, five archdeacons, thirty prebendaries (three of whom are residentiary, and, with the dean, constitute the chapter), twelve petty or minor canons, six vicars choral, a sub-dean, and inferior officers. The twelve petty canons were incorporated a body politic, in 1399, by letters patent of Richard II.: they are governed by a warden, chosen from among themselves, and have a common seal.

a Christchurch was formerly a part of St. Saviour's parish, but the inhabitants have lost, through disuse, the right to vote at elections for the borough. The parish extends into the East division of the hundred of Brixton; but the entire population is given above.

b The population of the parish of St. George includes five hundred and fifteen persons in the King's Bench prison, ninety-nine in the Marshalsea prison, two hundred and forty-three in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, one hundred and eighty in the Philanthropic Reform, ninety-six in the School for the Indigent Blind, sixty-seven in the Freemasons' school, eighty-three in the Magdalene Hospital, and two hundred and forty-seven in Bethlehem Hospital.

c St Olave's parish extends into the city of London.

d The return from St. Thomas' parish includes the inmates of St. Thomas' and Guy's Hospitals.

There are likewise numerous extra-parochial liberties; namely, in the City of London Without the Walls, Barnard's Inn, the population of which is returned with St. Andrew, Holborn; Bridewell Hospital and Precinct, containing, according to the last census, 443 inhabitants; Clifford's Inn, 101; Furnival's Inn, 100; Gray's Inn, 208; Lincoln's Inn, 268; Serjeant's Inn, Chancery-lane, 31; Serjeant's Inn, Fleet-street, 94; Staple Inn, 41; White Friars' Precinct, 1247; Inner Temple, 405; Middle Temple, 298: adjacent to the City of London, Old Artillery Ground Liberty, containing 1487 inhabitants; Charter-house, 144; Ely-place, 268; Norton-Falgate Liberty, 1896; Rolls Liberty, 2737; Old Tower Without (Precinct), 205; East Smithfield Liberty, 6429: in the City and Liberty of Westminster, the Close of the Collegiate Church of St. Peter, containing 181 inhabitants; and the Verge of the palaces of St. James and Whitehall, 641.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL is the chief ecclesiastical edifice of London and of the empire, and the masterpiece of its architect, Sir Christopher Wren. This magnificent structure stands on the highest and most central spot of ground in the city, nearly covering the site of the ancient cathedral built by Bishop Maurice, which was destroyed by the fire of 1666. It is the cathedral of the diocese of London, the deanery of which is now held with the see of Llandaff, together with a spacious house in Doctors' Commons. The commission for building a new cathedral is dated in 1673, the interval between the fire and that period having been employed in endeavouring to repair the old fabric, which was at length found impracticable. The first stone of the present structure, which was built from the third design of the architect, was laid June 21st, 1675; the walls of the choir and side aisles were finished in ten years, together with the semicircular porticoes on the north and south sides, and the last stone was laid on the top of the lantern in 1710, in the lifetime of the architect, by his son Christopher. This stupendous edifice, of which only a general description can here be attempted, is wholly constructed of the best Portland stone, in the form of a Latin cross, the extreme length of which is five hundred and fourteen feet, and its breadth two hundred and sixteen. The interior consists of a nave, choir, side aisles, transept, side chapels, &c. From the intersection of the cross rises a stately cupola, universally admired for its grandeur and elegant proportions, being two hundred and fifteen feet in altitude, and measuring one hundred and forty-five in diameter, and four hundred and thirty feet in circumference. From the top of this springs a lantern, adorned with large Corinthian pillars, surrounded at its base by a gallery, and terminating at the top in a superb gilt ball and cross: the height, from the floor of the church to the summit of the cross, is four hundred and four feet, and the circumference of the entire fabric is two thousand two hundred and ninety-two feet. A dwarf stone wall, supporting a massy balustrade of cast-iron, surrounds the churchyard, separating it from a spacious carriage and foot way, on the west, south, and east sides, and from a wide foot pavement on the north. The principal architectural features of the exterior are two grand semicircular porticoes at the north and south ends of the transept; the magnificent western entrance, with its campanile turrets; and the cupola, or dome.

The northern and southern porticoes consist each of a semi-cupola, supported by six fluted Corinthian columns, of four feet diameter, with semicircular flights of black marble steps. The great western entrance is composed of a double story of twelve lofty Corinthian columns below, and eight of the Composite order above, supporting a grand enriched pediment crowned with a colossal figure of St. Paul, and other statues: the whole stands upon an elevated base, the ascent to which is by a flight of twenty-two square black marble steps, running the entire length of the portico. The enriched pediment represents the Conversion of St. Paul. At the extremities of this western elevation are elegant campaniles, or steeples of two stories, of light pierced workmanship, terminating in domes formed by curves of contrary flexure, like bells, and ornamented at the top with gilt pine-apples. At the eastern extremity is a circular projection, forming within a recess for the communion table. The walls are of rustic work, and strengthened and ornamented by two ranges of coupled pilasters, one above the other, the lower being Corinthian, and the upper Composite. Both the northern and southern sides have an air of uncommon elegance; having also richly-decorated windows and niches, scrolls, fruitage, and other suitable enrichments. The cupola, which is the most distinguishing feature of the pile, towers in majestic proportion above the rest of the structure: it is ornamented with thirty-two columns below, and a range of attic antæ above, the exterior circuit of which is flanked by a noble balustrade. The interior is of correspondent beauty, being, like the exterior, constructed in the purest style of classical architecture. It has lately been improved by the introduction of monuments and statues of British heroes, and other illustrious dead, which, being composed of the finest marbles, and generally of good design, add greatly to the rich appearance of this part of the cathedral. The interior of the grand cupola was painted by Sir James Thornhill, the designs being illustrative of some of the most remarkable occurrences in the life of St. Paul. The entire pavement, up to the altar, is of marble, chiefly consisting of square slabs, alternately black and white: the floor round the communion table is of the same kinds of marble, mingled with porphyry. The communion table is ornamented with four noble fluted pilasters, painted and veined with gold, in imitation of lapis lazuli. The organ gallery is supported by eight Corinthian columns of blue and white marble, of exquisite beauty. The stalls in the choir are beautifully carved by the celebrated Gibbons, and the other ornaments are of equal workmanship. There is a chapel, where divine service is performed every day, Sundays excepted, and opposite is the consistory; each of them having a magnificent screen of carved wainscot of the Corinthian order. In the crypt beneath the church, and immediately under the centre of the great dome, is the tomb of Admiral Lord Nelson. The building was erected at the national expense, and cost a million and a half of money. The iron balustrade surrounding the churchyard, which, with its seven iron gates, weighs two hundred tons, cost £11,202. 0. 6. The extent of the ground plot occupied by the edifice is two acres and sixteen perches: in the area of the west front is placed a statue of Queen Anne.

The parochial churches may, for the most part, be divided into two classes,—those built by Sir Christopher Wren, or his pupils, since the great fire, and those which escaped that calamity. Of the former, the following most deserve notice: St. Mary's-le-Bow, in Cheapside, and St. Bride's, in Fleet-street, are allowed to possess the most elegant steeples of any in London. The first is a most successful endeavour to perpetuate the origin of its additional name of De Arcubus, or Le Bow, which arose, not only from the body being erected on arches, or a Norman crypt (which still remains), but from having a steeple, or lantern, resting on bows. This singularity is retained in the present structure, the spire of which is partly supported by flying buttresses, Corinthian columns, and an elegant circular gallery, terminating in a lofty spire; the whole being a masterly display of the five orders. The steeple of St. Bride's is of a totally different form, but equally beautiful: it consists of a series of elegant stories, diminishing in exact proportion as they ascend, and which, with the spire, originally reached the altitude of two hundred and thirty-four feet, but it was obliged lately to be reduced, on account of its having been damaged by lightning. Other churches which are remarkable for fine or lofty steeples are St. Antholin's, Watling-street; St. Dunstan's in the East; St. Magnus', London-bridge; Christ Church, Newgate-street; and St. Vedast's, Foster-lane. St. Stephen's, Walbrook, deserves the next mention to St. Paul's, on account of the unrivalled beauty of its interior. It was erected in place of the old church built in 1420, and burnt down in the great fire. The plan of this structure is original, yet simple; the elevation surprising, yet chaste and beautiful. It is a small church, in the form of a cross, being eighty-seven feet ten inches in length, and sixty-four feet ten inches in breadth. The dome, springing from the intersection, is supported by eight arches, rising from as many Corinthian columns, so disposed as to give the whole an effect of great lightness and spaciousness. Over the altar is a fine painting, by West, of the Stoning of St. Stephen.

The above-named churches are amongst the finest of the fifty built by Sir Christopher Wren after the conflagration of 1666. The following claim notice either from their architectural character, or historical interest. St. Michael's, Wood-street. This church is of the Ionic order, and was erected in 1669. The original tower has of late years been replaced by a clumsy spire. So early as the year 1359, the church was liberally endowed; and Stow asserts that the head of James IV. of Scotland was buried here, after the battle of Flodden Field. St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, having a large western tower with angular pinnacles, occupies the site of an old church refounded by Alderman Keeble, in the fifteenth century. Judge Jeffreys was buried in this church. St. Mary's at Hill, Lower Thames-street, was only partially destroyed by the great fire. This church is remarkable for containing some old and curious records, extracts from which have been published: it has a plain square brick tower. St. Vedast's, Foster-lane, besides its stone spire before-mentioned, which is very handsome and of exact symmetry, possesses an altar-piece of singular elegance. The railing before it is peculiarly rich; and the border that surrounds the nimbus, or glory, is composed for the most part of three cherubim, half immersed in clouds, and six winged infants, in the highest possible relief, one sounding two trumpets, and the others bearing palm branches, the carving being either from the chisel of Gibbons, or some successful rival of that great artist. St. Sepulchre's, Snow hill, is a spacious stone structure, modernized from the remains of the former church built in 1440, and which escaped the great fire. It has a fine groined porch, or entrance, and a lofty square tower with tall angular pinnacles, which, together with the interior, show that it must, before its modernization, have been a noble edifice of English architecture. St. Mary's Woolnoth, Lombard-street, is a fine specimen of the Tuscan order, erected by Nicholas Hawksmoor, a pupil of Sir Christopher Wren. The whole exterior is of stone, the northern elevation being decorated with large semicircular rusticated arches, and the western end having a double tower with composite columns, a balustrade, and other ornaments. The interior is a fine specimen of the most exquisite proportion, as well as of chaste decoration. St. Michael's, Cornhill, has a beautiful tower, which renders it one of the most conspicuous ornaments of the city. It is surmounted by four fine fluted turrets, and is admirably light and elegant; and the various orders of architecture are harmoniously combined. There is a monument to the memory of Fabian, the Chronicler, who was an alderman of London. St. Lawrence's, Jewry, was rebuilt in 1677. It is a neat edifice: the interior has lately been rendered very elegant, and contains a monument of Archbishop Tillotson. St. Peter's, Cornhill, according to an inscribed brass plate in it, was the first Christian church erected in Britain, being said to have been built by King Lucius, so early as the year 79. The present structure is plain but neat: it has a steeple of red brick, with a lofty spire terminating in a large key, the emblem of the patron saint. St. Benet's, Paul's Wharf, was built in 1181, and rebuilt in 1682. Inigo Jones is said to have been buried in this church, but there is no record of the circumstance. St. Swithin's, Cannon-street, a small but elegant church, with a tower and spire, was built in 1680, on the site of one of very ancient foundation. This church attracts notice from the famous "London stone" being placed in front of it. Christ Church, Newgate-street, is a spacious and elegant stone church, having a lofty tower, and is much frequented on account of the singing by the scholars of Christ's hospital, who attend divine service in it, and whose combined voices, from their great number, produce an extraordinary effect. Previously to the dissolution of monasteries, this was the site of the Grey friars' church, which was three hundred feet long, and decorated with noble monuments: the portion re-edified was only the choir of the ancient structure. St. Alban's, Wood-street, is a handsome stone edifice, with a lofty turretted tower, the interior being in good proportion, and containing a richly-ornamented altar-piece, and a pulpit finely carved. The Saxon king, Athelstan, is said to have had a palace adjoining this church, and his name, somewhat corrupted and abridged, is thought to be preserved in Addle-street, formerly called King Adel-street, running by the side of it. St. Margaret's Pattens, Rood-lane, was rebuilt in 1687. The carving of the altar-piece is by the celebrated Grinlin Gibbons. St. Michael's, Crooked-lane, rebuilt in 1688. Sir William Walworth, who killed the rebel Wat Tyler, was buried in this ancient church, where he founded a college of Priests. St. Michael's, College-hill, is celebrated as the burial-place of the famous lord mayor, Richard Whittington, who here founded a college. The ceiling, which is finely coved, is said to be the largest church ceiling in London unsupported by a single column. The tower is surmounted by a singularly beautiful turret, decorated with Corinthian columns: the altar-piece has carving by Grinlin Gibbons.

Some of the city churches which escaped the great fire are of very considerable architectural merit; and most of them contain a number of curious and interesting monuments; they are as follows:—

St. Andrew's Undershaft, Leadenhall-street, obtained its adjunct from a May-pole, or shaft, having formerly been set up every year on the first of May, which was higher than the church steeple. The style of architecture is the later English, having been rebuilt in 1522, at the expense of William Fitz-William, the founder of the noble house of Wentworth. The interior is decorated with great taste; the ceiling is adorned with angels, and the compartments over the pillar which support it painted in imitation of basso relievo. The eastern window is richly ornamented with stained glass, in five compartments, representing the sovereigns Edward VI., Queen Elizabeth, James I., Charles I., and Charles II. The pulpit is a fine specimen of carving. The most remarkable monument is that of John Stowe, the London historian, who is represented sitting at study. St. Helen's, Bishopsgate-street. Dr. Stukeley affirms that this church is built on the site of one which existed in the time of the Roman dominion in Britain, and was dedicated to the Empress Helena. The present fabric was the conventual church of an adjoining priory of Benedictine nuns, part of which was appropriated to the use of the parishioners. It is chiefly remarkable for a number of ancient and curious monuments. St. James', Duke's Place, was built in the reign of James I., on the site of the priory of the Holy Trinity, at Aldgate, from the materials of the conventual buildings. St. Bartholomew's the Less, and St. Bartholomew's the Great, were both conventual churches, and are situated near Smithfield. The former, which belonged to the hospital of St. Bartholomew, has been altered and modernized so much, that it retains no ancient feature worthy of description. St. Bartholomew's the Great is a fine specimen, and the only one remaining in London, of the massive Norman architecture, the nave being supported by ponderous low round columns: the present church is only the choir of that of the priory. Both churches were founded by Rayhere, said to have been minstrel, or jester, to Henry I., who has a tomb, with his effigy, in the structure last mentioned. St. Giles', Cripplegate, was erected in 1546, on the site of the ancient church, built by Alfune, the first master of St. Bartholomew's hospital, in 1090, and burnt down in the year 1545: it is a light well-proportioned structure. Speed the historian, and Fox the martyrologist, were buried here. Oliver Cromwell, afterwards Protector, was married in this church.

The ecclesiastical structures without the city exhibit as great a variety in their age and construction as those within its limits. They may be divided into three classes; the churches of ancient erection; those erected in the reign of Queen Anne and her successors; and the newly-built churches of His late Majesty's reign.

The churches of the first class are, in the City and Liberties of Westminster, the abbey church of St. Peter, St. Margaret's, St. John's the Baptist, in the Savoy, and the Temple church. In Southwark, St. Saviour's church; and in other parts of the town and suburbs, St. Pancras' and Stepney churches; to which, as next in age, though different in style, may be added St. James', Westminster, and St. Anne's, Soho. The principal churches built in the reign of Anne and her successors, George I., George II., and George III., are, St. Martin's; St. George's, Hanover-square; St. Giles' in the Fields; St. George's, Bloomsbury; St. Mary's le Strand; St. Clement Dane's; St. Paul's, Covent Garden; and St. John's the Evangelist, Milbank; all situated in Westminster, or its Liberties; St. Olave's, St. George's, St. Thomas', St. Mary's, and Bermondsey and Christ churches, situated in Southwark; and on the northern and eastern sides of the metropolis, the churches of Bishopsgate, Spitalfields, Shoreditch, Old-street, St. James, and St. John Clerkenwell, Aldgate, Whitechapel, Bethnal Green, Limehouse, St. George in the East, Shadwell, and Wapping. The more modern churches, scattered through various parts of the metropolis and its suburbs, will be noticed hereafter.

London contains no churches of the Anglo-Saxon period, excepting small portions of Westminster abbey church, concealed from view in consequence of their subterranean situation. Of the Anglo-Norman style, St. Bartholomew's the Great, and the chapel at the White Tower, two of the finest specimens in the city, have been noticed. Those religious edifices in the Anglo-Norman style, and of later English architecture, most deserving of notice in Westminster, Southwark, and the suburbs, are the following:—

WESTMINSTER ABBEY, or, more properly, the collegiate church of St. Peter at Westminster, is ascribed to Sebert, King of the East Saxons. The neighbourhood by degrees became peopled, partly from this circumstance, and partly from the erection of a palace near it, which induced the chief nobility to erect town houses in its vicinity. Edward the Confessor rebuilt the church in 1065; and by Pope Nicholas II. it was appointed the place of inauguration for the kings of England. On the general suppression of religious houses, Henry VIII., converted the Benedictine abbey attached to this church into a college of Secular canons, under the government of a dean, and afterwards appointed a bishop, making it the head of a diocese, comprising the entire county of Middlesex, except Fulham, which was retained by the Bishop of London; but this establishment was, a few years afterwards, dissolved by Edward VI., who restored the college, which was again changed by Queen Mary into an abbey. Elizabeth put an end to that institution in 1560, and founded the present establishment, which is a college, consisting of a dean and twelve Secular canons, or prebendaries; to which she attached a school for forty scholars, called the Queen's Scholars, to be educated in the liberal sciences, preparatory to their removal to the University. Private scholars are also admitted; and some of the most illustrious characters in the kingdom have received their education here. To this establishment belong choristers, singing men, an organist, and twelve almsmen. It is imagined that a school was annexed to the abbey so long ago as the time of Edward the Confessor. The present church was built by Henry III. and his successors, and completed by the last abbot, with the exception of the two towers at the western entrance, which are the work of Sir Christopher Wren, and the northern doorway, called "the beautiful gate," which was erected at the expense of the unfortunate Bishop Atterbury. Its length is three hundred and sixty feet, the breadth of the nave seventy-two feet, and the length of the transept one hundred and ninety-five feet. Some late improvements have exposed this venerable structure to the view, by pulling down the houses on its northern side, and forming a square before it, neatly planted with low shrubs. On entering the western door, the whole body of the church presents itself at one view, terminated at the further end by the fine painted window over the portico of Henry the Seventh's chapel, and is highly impressive from its loftiness, lightness, and symmetry. The nave is separated from the choir by a screen; the choir, in the form of a semi-octagon, was formerly surrounded by eight chapels, but there are now only seven, that which was then the central chapel at present forming the porch of that of Henry VII. The roofs of the nave and transept are supported by two rows of arches, one above the other, resting on beautiful lofty clustered columns of Purbeck marble. Corresponding with the central range of pillars are demi-pillars in the side walls, which, as they rise, spring into semi-arches, and meet others opposite in acute angles; by which means the roof is thrown into a variety of segments of arches, decorated with ornamental carvings. The side aisles receive light from a middle range of windows, which, with the four large ones at the ends of the nave and the transept, give light to the whole of the main building. The great western window is splendidly painted, representing figures of the patriarchs Moses and Aaron, the arms of Edward the Confessor, those of Westminster, and other devices. The choir, one of the most beautiful in Europe, is terminated towards the east by the ancient high altar, beyond which, at a small distance, is seen the magnificent shrine of Edward the Confessor, rising from the centre of the chapel which bears his name. The pavement before the altar-table is a splendid specimen of ancient Mosaic work, and one side of the enclosure is formed by the venerable tombs and effigies of Aymer de Valence, Edward Crouchback, the monuments of King Sebert, Anne of Cleves, &c. The choir is enclosed on the northern and southern sides by handsome stalls, the floor being paved with black and white marble, and the roof ornamented with white tiles, divided into compartments, which are bordered with gilt carved work. The ceremony of the coronation of the kings and queens of England is performed in this part of the abbey. The best executed monuments are the productions of Roubilliac, Rysbrach, Flaxman, Westmacott, and Bacon. In the southern extremity of the transept are monuments to the memory of many of the most eminent British poets, whence this spot has received the name of Poets' Corner; and here are to be found, amongst others, the names and memorials of Chaucer, Spencer, Shakspeare, Ben Johnson, Milton, Dryden, Butler, Thomson, Gay, Goldsmith, Addison, Samuel Johnson, &c.; together with the tombs of Handel and Garrick. In the southern aisle the most remarkable monuments are those of Dr. Watts, W.

Hargrave, Esq., and Captain James Cornwall. At the western end of the abbey are those of Sir Godfrey Kneller, Dr. Mead, Sir Charles Wager, the Earl of Chatham, &c. On the northern side of the entrance into the choir is the monument of Sir Isaac Newton, and near it is that of Earl Stanhope. Near the great gates, and opposite the tomb of the Earl of Chatham, lie the remains, about twelve feet from each other, of the two great political rivals, Charles James Fox, and William Pitt; the monument of the latter is over the western entrance. Lord Mansfield's monument is erected under one of the lofty arches at the northern end of the transept.

Around the choir are eight chapels, dedicated respectively to St. Benedict, St. Nicholas, St. Paul, St. Erasmus, St. John the Baptist, St. John the Evangelist, St. Michael, and St. Andrew; and in them is a variety of tombs, erected to the memory of distinguished persons: the three last-named chapels have been converted into a single one. Besides these are two other chapels deserving particular mention, viz., the chapel of Edward the Confessor, and Henry the Seventh's chapel.

Edward the Confessor's Chapel stands immediately behind the altar of the church, upon an elevated floor, leading to which there is a flight of steps. It is remarkable for containing the shrine of its patron saint, King Edward the Confessor, and the tombs of several of the ancient English monarchs, from which circumstance it has been denominated "the Chapel of the Kings." The saint's shrine, erected pursuant to the orders of Henry III., by Peter Cavallini, stands in the centre, and was curiously ornamented with Mosaic work of coloured stones, with gilding and other ornaments, but only some fragments now remain. Of the regal monuments around, that of Henry III. is distinguished by large panels of polished porphyry, enclosed with Mosaic work of scarlet and gold, and that monarch's effigy of brass gilt, the size of life. The remains of Edward I. are contained in a plain coffin of grey marble. The tomb of Edward III. has his statue of brass gilt, and is surrounded by statues of his children, and others. There is a tomb erected to the memory of Richard II. and his queen, Anne of Bohemia, with their effigies. Editha, consort of the Confessor; Eleanor, the affectionate wife of Edward I.; the heroic Philippa, consort of Edward III., have tombs with their effigies, the former of brass gilt, and the latter of alabaster. The tomb of Henry V. is enclosed in a beautiful chantry chapel. The coronation chairs, and the stone brought from Scone by Edward I.; the sword and shield of King Edward III.; the saddle and helmet used by Henry V. at the battle of Agincourt; and various models of churches, by Sir Christopher Wren, are shewn among the curiosities here. Along the frieze of the screen of this chapel are fourteen legendary sculptures, relating to the history of Edward the Confessor, which were executed in the reign of Henry III., and which are well worthy the attention of the antiquary.

Henry the Seventh's Chapel, universally admitted to be one of the richest specimens of later English architecture in the kingdom, adjoins the eastern extremity of the abbey. It was erected as a mausoleum for himself and his family by the king whose name it bears, on the site of a smaller chapel, dedicated, like the present, to the Virgin Mary, and cost £14,000, a sum estimated to have been equal to a quarter of a million of our present currency. The exterior of this edifice is remarkable for richness and variety, which are greatly increased by fourteen buttresses, with crocketed turrets, projecting from the several angles of the building, and are beautifully ornamented with canopies, niches, and other decorations: these buttresses add strength as well as beauty to the edifice, being connected with the upper part of the walls of the nave by pointed arches. The interior, lighted by a double range of windows of magnificent dimensions and elegant workmanship, consists of a nave and two small aisles, and is entered by a flight of black marble steps, under a noble arch, that leads to a pair of large wrought brazen gates, thickly plated with gold, each panel being adorned with a rose and portcullis, alternately. The nave is ninety-nine feet long, sixty-six broad, and fifty-four high, and terminates at the eastern end in a curve, having five deep recesses, entered by open arches. The lofty stone ceiling, with its innumerable ornaments, excites the highest admiration. Numerous oratories, canopies, and other embellishments, adorn the sides and ends of this chapel. In the centre stands the altar-tomb of Henry VII., executed by Torregiano, in basaltic stone, ornamented with the royal effigy, and surrounded by a magnificent screen of the same material, the whole of which is said to have cost £10,000. Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, Mary Queen of Scots, Margaret of Richmond, several of the Brunswick family, and numerous other royal and distinguished persons, have been interred within the walls of this celebrated chapel.

St. Margaret's church, an elegant specimen of the architecture of the period of Edward IV., stands near the northern entrance of the abbey, and is remarkable for its beautiful eastern window of painted glass, representing the Crucifixion, which was presented by the magistrates of Dort, in Holland, to Henry VII., and intended for his chapel, then erecting; but he dying before it was finished, after passing through the hands of various owners, it was at last purchased for its present situation for the sum of £420. A board in this church is inscribed to the memory of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, who was beheaded in 1618, in Palace-yard adjoining. The members of the House of Commons attend divine service in this church on particular occasions. The Temple Church, dedicated to St. Mary, deserves especial notice for its antiquity and peculiar architecture. It is supposed to have been first erected in the year 1185, and to have been afterwards, partially or wholly, rebuilt by the Knights Templars, in the year 1244. The form of the most ancient portion of the edifice is a peristyle, having six massive pillars, with fillets on the shafts, and Norman capitals. This portion, which forms the vestibule of the present church, contains the tombs of eleven Knights Templars. The main body of the edifice is of more modern English architecture, consisting of a nave, with two aisles, and a transept, divided by elegant clustered columns, supporting a fine arched roof. Selden, Plowden, Lord Thurlow, and the eminent physician, Dr. Mead, lie interred in this church. The Norman arch, forming the entrance to the church, is much admired for the richness of its mouldings. St. John's the Baptist, now almost the only remnant of the ancient palace of the Savoy, in the Strand, (which was built in 1245, and converted into an hospital in 1509, when the present church appears to have been erected), has a beautiful roof, divided into panels, on which numerous religious and heraldic devices are carved, and contains several ancient monuments of the Willoughby, Howard, and Compton families: it was very tastefully repaired in 1820. St. Saviour's, Southwark, formerly collegiate, is the most spacious parochial church in the metropolis, and one of the finest specimens of ancient architecture. It has a nave and aisles, with a choir and transept, Lady chapel, &c. Part of it appears to be of the period of Henry II., or III., and the remainder of that of Henry IV., in whose reign it was partly rebuilt. Twenty-six pillars, in two rows, support the roof of this interesting edifice; and the chancel, and galleries in the walls of the choir, are adorned with arches, in a similar manner to Westminster abbey. The tower, which is supported on four very strong pillars, is one hundred and fifty feet high, to the top of the large angular pinnacles, and contains a ring of twelve fine-toned bells. During the progress of considerable embellishment and repairs, in the month of July, 1830, the remains of Dr. Lancelot Andrews, Bishop of Winchester, who died Sept. 21st, 1626, were discovered, in a state of great preservation, in a leaden coffin, walled up with brick, within his monument in Bishops' chapel; a subterraneous passage leading from the church was also exposed to view soon afterwards. Gower, one of the ancient English poets, has a small monument in this church, and several other eminent men lie interred here. The churchwardens of St. Saviour's, with others of the parish officers, form a corporate body, by charter of Henry VIII., granted at the dissolution of the college, or priory of Augustine canons here, when the inhabitants purchased the conventual church, and made it parochial. St. James', and St. Anne's, Soho, are only remarkable, the former for containing a beautiful marble font, sculptured by Grinlin Gibbons; and the latter for being the burial-place of Theodore, King of Corsica, who lies in the churchyard, beneath a gravestone inscribed with some affecting lines from the pen of the late Lord Orford.

Although Sir Christopher Wren was the architect principally employed in rebuilding the churches after the great fire of London, yet the erection of a few in different parts of the metropolis was confided to his contemporaries. There were also several good churches built in the succeeding reigns, by other architects; and the following, as the most interesting of these, are entitled to a brief notice.

St. Martin's in the Fields has been invariably admired for its portico, which is the finest of any church in London, and the entire edifice is entitled to a comparison with the best works of Sir Christopher Wren. It was erected between the years 1721 and 1726, from a design by James Gibbs, and unites the light and picturesque beauty of the modern temple with the sober grandeur and solidity of Grecian architecture. The opening so long desired, for obtaining a proper view of this fine portico, has lately been made. St. George's, Hanover-square, is also remarkable for a very fine portico of the Corinthian order, consisting of six columns, with an entablature and pediment: the steeple is an excellent piece of architecture. Over the altar-piece is a tolerably good painting of the Last Supper, attributed to Sir James Thornhill. St. Mary's-le-Strand, though sometimes censured for its affected display of the five orders of architecture, and otherwise too lavish ornament, is a handsome edifice, erected by Gibbs in 1717, just after his return from Italy. The western entrance is by a flight of semicircular steps, which leads to a similarly-shaped portico of the Ionic order, surmounted by a dome. Two ranges of columns, the lower Ionic, the upper Corinthian, run round the body of the church, with pilasters of the same orders at the corners, and in the intercolumniations are, in the lower range, niches, and in the upper, windows, both tastefully ornamented. St. Clement's Danes has a fine lofty steeple by Gibbs, but the body of the church is said to have been designed by Sir Christopher Wren. It is built of stone, with two tiers of windows, the lower plain, the upper ornamented. The western entrance consists of a portico on each side of the steeple, having domes supported by Ionic columns. St. Paul's, Covent Garden, was originally erected by Inigo Jones, at the expense of the Earl of Bedford. On the 17th of September, 1795, this church was burnt down, but it was rebuilt in imitation of the original edifice. It has a noble massive portico of the Tuscan order, and the interior is of great neatness and simplicity. Butler, the author of Hudibras, and Dr. Walcot, better known under the assumed name of Peter Pindar, lie buried in the churchyard. St. Giles' in the Fields, erected from a design by Mr. Henry Flightcroft, is constructed entirely of stone, in a simple yet elegant style, having a lofty handsome steeple, and was finished in 1734, at an expense of £10,000. The entrance gateway has a fine sculptured entablature, representing the Day of Judgment. St. George's, Bloomsbury, was erected by Mr. Nicholas Hawksmoor, and finished in 1731. It is a singular, and not very harmonious, compound of the Tuscan and Corinthian orders, constructed entirely of stone, with a good portico in front, and a pyramidal steeple, grotesquely ornamented. St. John's the Evangelist, Milbank. This church, designed by Sir John Vanbrugh, is remarkable for having four steeples, one at each corner, which give it rather a whimsical appearance; several of its details are, however, beautiful.

The churches erected since the commencement of the present century are numerous, and some of them eminent specimens of architectural display, particularly St. Pancras, Marylebone, All Souls, Langham-place; St. Luke's, Chelsea, &c. There are in various parts of the metropolis, about four hundred and fifty places of worship, of which nearly two hundred belong to the establishment: there are forty-seven for Baptists, six for the Society of Friends, upwards of one hundred for Independents, thirty-two for Wesleyan Methodists, four for Swedenborgians, six for Unitarians, four for Welch Calvinists, and numerous others for different classes of Protestant dissenters. There are also nine chapels in connexion with the church of Scotland, fourteen Roman Catholic chapels, seven synagogues, and eighteen Foreign Protestant churches and chapels.

COLLEGES, SCHOOLS, AND ESTABLISHMENTS FOR INSTRUCTION AND STUDY OF VARIOUS KINDS.

London contains two colleges, forty-five free schools with perpetual endowments, seventeen schools for poor and deserted children, and upwards of two hundred parochial schools, in which the children are both clothed and educated: there are also numerous National and Lancasterian schools, upwards of five hundred Sunday schools, and about four thousand private schools in and near the metropolis.

King's College was so named from its having been founded under the immediate patronage of his late Majesty, George IV., who presented the proprietors with the site, on the condition that the college should be completed in conformity to the design of Somerset House. Considerable progress has been made towards the erection of the buildings, which, when finished, will form the eastern wing of that noble pile, of which it has hitherto been deficient, and will, by corresponding with the other parts of the building, render it complete. The estimated expense, as given by the architect, Mr. Smirke, is £140,000, exclusively of £17,000 for the purchase and removal of houses next the Strand, to make room for the principal front, and £10,000 for furniture; making, with other additional items, £170,000, besides the cost of furnishing the library and museum. The design of the institution is to afford to the youth of the metropolis a course of instruction similar to that pursued at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The principal, with a competent number of professors, will be appointed by a council, consisting of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, Secretary of State for the Home Department, Speaker of the House of Commons, Deans of St. Paul and Westminster, and the Lord Mayor: by this body all the fundamental regulations, respecting the discipline and course of education are to be approved. The Archbishop of Canterbury is appointed perpetual visitor. The funds for the erection and support of the institution have been raised by donations, and by shares of £100 each, the dividends on which are not to exceed four per cent., the surplus to be applied exclusively to the benefit of the college.

The London University was established with a view to afford a liberal education principally to students who are excluded from Oxford and Cambridge by the statutes of religious conformity: the students are not admitted until they are able to perform certain exercises, and are divided into three classes, according to the different departments of literature in which they are engaged. The institution is governed by a council of twenty-four, six of whom are chosen annually; these appoint a warden and professors, each of whom receives a fixed stipend, until the fees paid by the students constitute a sufficient support, and are entitled to superannuated allowances: the University year excludes only the months of August, September, and October. The funds of the institution are to be not less than £150,000, nor more than £300,000: each proprietor has the right of appointing one pupil, and receives four per cent. on every £100 share. The building, the first stone of which was laid on the 30th of April, 1827, by his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, the contract for its completion being £107,000, occupies, with its appendages, seven acres of ground, near the New road, purchased for £90,000: that portion already built is entirely constructed of stone, and the whole will, when completed, consist of a central portico of ten Corinthian columns, with enriched entablature and pediment, and two wings projecting at right angles, with tetrastyle porticoes to correspond : over the whole, springing from the vestibule, is an elevated dome, surmounted by a Grecian temple of eight pillars ; and there are smaller corresponding domes to the wings : two other wings of equal length extend from the back of the central part, and there are other connecting buildings : the theatres, lecture-rooms, and apartments of the interior, are all of elegant architecture, and commodiously adapted to their respective purposes.

Westminster School, founded, in 1560, by Queen Elizabeth, for forty scholars, who receive an education preparatory for the University, besides whom are educated, as private scholars, many of the sons of the nobility and gentry : the school is situated within the precincts of Westminster Abbey. Eight boys are elected annually on the foundation : and four more, called "Bishop's boys," who wear gowns of a different colour from those of the "King's scholars," are appointed by the Dean, on the establishment by Dr. Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, in 1628, who directed an annual pecuniary allowance to be made to each, which is withheld until the boys are entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, when the Dean and Chapter add so much as will make up £20 a year for four years. The bishop also endowed four scholarships in the same college, for boys of this school, preference being given to those on his own foundation, each of the value of £20 per annum, for four years. The other University advantages are, eight studentships and scholarships at Corpus Christi and Trinity Colleges, Cambridge, the former of the value of from £50 to £60 per annum, the latter £25 ; three scholarships at St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Sir Robert Wood, Knt., in 1659 ; a second nomination to three more at Corpus Christi College, of the annual value of £20 each, founded by Archbishop Parker, in 1569 ; and a rent-charge of £20, assigned by Dr. Triplett, in 1668, towards the support of four boys from this school at the University.

The Charter-house, which comprises an hospital as well as a school, is so named from the word Chartreuse, the site having been occupied by a convent of Carthusian monks. It was built and endowed, in the reign of James I., by Mr. Thomas Sutton, a merchant of great opulence and liberality : the purchase and completion of the buildings cost upwards of £20,000. The establishment of this noble seminary consists of a master, a preacher, two schoolmasters, and forty-four scholars, who are supported free of every expense. The boys, presented by the Governors in rotation, are instructed in classical learning, and wear an academical dress, resembling that worn by the scholars of Eton and Westminster. The hospital is for eighty decayed gentlemen, who have been merchants, or military officers, each of whom is allowed £14 a year, besides a gown, provisions, fuel, and two handsome apartments : they dine in a common hall, and attend prayers daily in the chapel. The buildings occupy the whole site of the ancient monastery, which, with its gardens and grounds, was of great extent, and several portions of the ancient monastic edifice, still remaining, present a very antique and venerable appearance. From the revenue of the institution, twenty-nine exhibitioners, at either of the Universities, are allowed £80 per annum for the first four years, and, if they graduate regularly, £100 per annum for the next four years. It has also ten exhibitions at Christ Church, Pembroke, Worcester, and University, Colleges, Oxford, founded by Dame Elizabeth Holford, in 1720 ; its governors have the patronage of nine ecclesiastical benefices.

St. Paul's School, at the east end of St. Paul's churchyard, was founded in 1509, by the celebrated Dr. Colet, Dean of St. Paul's, for the free education of one hundred and fifty-three boys, by a master, an usher, and a chaplain, under the direction of the Mercers' Company, who are perpetual trustees, and on the appointment of the master of the company, as senior surveyor of the school. The revenue of the school is upwards of £5000 ; in addition to which the Company are in the receipt of £1000 annually, on an average, arising from £18,834. 15. three per cent. reduced annuities, and the produce of tithes in the county of Northumberland, bequeathed by Viscount Campden, about 1685, for the endowment of exhibitions at Trinity College, Cambridge, in behalf of this school, for which nine exhibitioners are allowed £100 per annum each for five years. There are also, an unlimited number of exhibitions, of the value of £50 a year each, tenable for seven years, at either University ; one, of £30 a year, at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, founded by John Stock, Esq., in 1781, tenable for seven years ; five at Trinity College, Cambridge, of £10 per annum each, founded by Mr. Perry ; four scholarships at Corpus Christi College, founded, in 1766, by George Sykes, Esq. ; and two exhibitions of £10 per annum each, jointly with the free grammar school at Dorchester, at St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Dr. Gower, for clergymen's sons : the school has also an interest in Sir Robert Wood's scholarships, in default of candidates from the schools at Canterbury and Westminster. The school apartments were rebuilt in 1824, entirely of stone, in an elegant style, and with several enlargements, particularly a fine arcade for the recreation of the boys.

Merchant Taylors' School, founded in 1561, by Sir Thomas White, and liberally endowed by him and other members of the company, is conducted by a principal, and three under-masters, who teach the classics ; and two writing-masters, recently appointed, for whom a room has been lately constructed out of some smaller apartments, previously occupied by the junior masters : the number of boys is limited to two hundred and fifty, who are presented by the members of the court, each member exercising the privilege in rotation : on admission the boys pay £5. 2. each, and £2. 2. per quarter, with some other trifling charges : one half of the admission fees is set apart for founding exhibitions at the Universities. It has thirty-seven fellowships at St. John's College, Oxford ; six scholarships at Pembroke College, Cambridge, of the value of £40 a year each, tenable for seven years, founded by the Rev. C. Parkyn ; six civil law fellowships of £50 per annum each, at St. John's College, Oxford ; two exhibitions, of £50 per annum each, one at St. John's College, Oxford, and the other at Pembroke College, Cambridge, founded by Dr. Stuart : five Divinity scholarships, of £4. 8. each, founded by Walter Fish ; four of £4 per annum each, founded by John Vernon, in 1615 ; and one scholarship of £4 per annum, founded by John Wooller, all at St. John's College, Oxford ; and an exhibition, of uncertain value, to either University, arising from the amount of donations by individuals educated at this school: there are also a by-fellowship and two scholarships at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, founded by Thomas Holwey, for boys from Eton, or Merchant Taylor's school; and it has an interest in Sir Robert Wood's scholarships, in default of boys from Canterbury and Westminster schools. By a recent arrangement the boys in the two upper forms are taught mathematics: no boy can derive any advantage from the foundation if he enters higher than the third form. The buildings of the establishment, situated on the east side of Suffolk-lane, Cannon-street, consist of the school, apartments for the usher, a house for the head master, a library, and a chapel.

Christ's Hospital, Newgate-street, founded by Edward VI., in 1552, on the site of a dissolved monastery of Grey friars, is the noble and celebrated establishment commonly denominated the Blue-coat school, from the costume of the children supported and educated there. This institution, famed for its antiquity, extent, and high character, occupies the site of the Grey friars' monastery, the buildings of which, having gone to decay, have just been magnificently re-edified in the original style. Upon this foundation there are generally from one thousand to fourteen hundred boys, who are clothed, boarded, and educated. The lord mayor and corporation of London are governors and directors, ex officio, and there are other governors, amounting in all to about three hundred and fifty, who must be donors of £400 and upwards. The New Hall, from a design by Mr. John Shawe, is one of the grandest and most imposing modern attempts at later English architecture. It stands on the site of the little cloisters of the monastery, measuring more than one hundred and eighty feet in length, and of proportionate height and width. The structure is of stone, and the style, agreeing with the date of the charity, has been copied from the hall of Hampton Court palace, from which noble model, however, it differs in many respects, but yet in strict accordance with the style adopted. The staircases, and a fine cloister beneath, correspond, and concur, with the interior of the hall itself, to render this one of the most magnificent banqueting-rooms in England. There is an establishment at Hertford, to which the younger boys are generally sent preparatory to their entering on the foundation in London. The revenue of the hospital, arising from landed and funded property, purchased with the donations of numerous private individuals, amounts to about £45,000. There are six exhibitions at Pembroke College, Cambridge, each of the value of £90 for the first four years, and £50 for the last three years, each scholar receiving £50 for an outfit; an exhibition of £70, with the same outfit, at any college in Oxford, every seventh year; two scholarships, of £40 per annum each, at Pembroke College, Cambridge, founded by Mr. Sergeant Moses; six of £10 per annum each, three at Emanuel College, and three at Christ College, Cambridge, founded by John Brown, in 1662; and two exhibitions of £12 per annum, at Emanuel College, founded by Emanuel Richards, the holders of which receive also an extra allowance.

The edifices in which many of the other schools are held are handsome, and the establishments extensive.

HOSPITALS, AND OTHER CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.

London contains thirty hospitals, for the sick and diseased: one hundred and seven almshouses, for the maintenance of the aged; eighteen asylums for the support of indigent persons of various other descriptions; numerous dispensaries for gratuitously supplying the poor with medicine and medical aid at their own dwellings; and in each parish a workhouse, for maintaining its own poor. Exclusively of this ample list, the Livery Companies alone distribute above £75,000 annually in charities; and there is a multitude of institutions for the relief of the distressed, of a less public and prominent nature than those above specified. The aggregate amount of the sums annually expended in public charities in London is estimated at little less than one million sterling. The hospitals were chiefly founded by the munificence of private individuals; some of them being endowed with permanent revenues, and others supported by annual or occasional voluntary subscriptions. The almshouses were built and endowed either by individuals or by the incorporated companies. Many of the hospitals are buildings of immense extent and imposing architecture, and their internal regulations are worthy of their magnitude and importance. The medical assistance is the best the profession can supply; the attendance ample, and the rooms and wards, bedding, &c., clean and wholesome. The almshouses and other institutions for the support of the aged and indigent exhibit not merely an appearance, but the real possession, of competence and ease. The hospitals and other institutions for the benefit of the sick, diseased, maimed, and afflicted, are as follows:

St. Bartholomew's Hospital was incorporated in the last year of the reign of Henry VIII., having formerly belonged to the priory of St. Bartholomew, in Smithfield, founded, in 1102, by one Rayhere, said to have been jester to King Henry I. The present edifice was constructed by Gibbs, in 1729, and consists of four magnificent piles of stone building, forming the four equal sides of a quadrangle, and connected by stone gateways. The establishment is provided with three physicians, three surgeons, three assistant surgeons, an apothecary, and chaplain, with numerous nurses and attendants. Persons injured by accident are received into this hospital at all hours; those afflicted with disease are only admitted on petition. It administers relief upon an average to between ten and twelve thousand persons annually. St. Thomas' Hospital, of ancient monastic foundation, but refounded by Edward VI., stands in High-street, Southwark. It was rebuilt in 1693, in three beautiful squares, to which the governors, in 1732, added a fourth magnificent pile of building at their own expense. It is now composed of four quadrangular courts, comprising numerous wards, and having a chapel, and parochial church. Belonging to the establishment are also hot and cold baths, a surgery, a theatre for the delivery of lectures, capable of accommodating three hundred persons, and a dispensary. The annual expenditure is about £10,000, and the number of persons relieved nearly the same as at St. Bartholomew's Hospital. Both are under the control of the lord mayor and aldermen. Guy's Hospital stands at a small distance from St. Thomas', and receives its name from its founder, Thomas Guy, Esq., citizen of London, who expended £18,793 on its erection during his lifetime, and endowed it with the immense sum of £220,000 at his death. The building consists of a centre and two wings, with a separate edifice in the rear, for lunatic patients. It includes thirteen large wards, a hall and chapel, a theatre for lectures, a laboratory, a museum of anatomical preparations, and a library. It also contains above four hundred beds, and affords relief to two thousand out-patients yearly; possessing an establishment of three physicians, three surgeons, and an apothecary, besides numerous attendants: the funds of this hospital have lately been augmented by a very considerable benefaction, so as to have caused the intention of greatly enlarging its dimensions. The London Hospital, in White-chapel-road, was first established in 1740, and the present building was erected in 1759. The patients relieved are, sick and wounded seamen, and other persons connected with the river and maritime affairs; their number amounts annually to many thousands. This institution has an accumulating fund, under the management of twenty-one guardians, chosen once in three years, intended to secure a provision for its permanent support. The building is extremely large, possessing an extensive front towards the road. The Middlesex Hospital, situated in Charles-street, Oxford-street, was built in 1745, for the reception of sick and lame patients, the relief of lying-in married women and of out-patients, and the admission at all hours of persons wounded by accidents: in 1792, an addition was made to it by a beneficent individual for affording relief to persons afflicted with cancers, who, if they choose, may remain in the hospital for life: it is capable of receiving three hundred patients. The Westminster Hospital, James-street, Westminster, was founded in 1719, "for the relief of the sick and needy from all parts." The building is neat and extensive, and the medical assistance ample. The New Bethlehem Lunatic Hospital, Lambeth, is on a scale of real magnificence, the grand front being five hundred and eighty feet in length, and resembling rather a palace than an erection for the purposes of charity. This establishment was founded by Henry VIII., and was removed from its old situation in Moorfields, in 1812. The building is of brick, and comprises a centre and two wings, the former being surmounted by a dome, and decorated with an Ionic portico of six columns, supporting the arms of the United Kingdom, and was completed at an expense of about £100,000, from a design by Mr. Lewis. It is capable of receiving four hundred and sixty patients, who are under the superintendence of a steward, apothecary, matron, keepers, &c.; the whole being subject to the government of the lord mayor and aldermen. The annual income of the hospital is about £18,000. St. Luke's Hospital, also for lunatics, established by voluntary contributions, on account of the inadequacy of the last-mentioned establishment "for the relief of all indigent lunatics," is a noble building, situated in Old-street, having a front four hundred and ninety-three feet long, remarkable for simple grandeur. Its interior arrangement constitutes a perfect model for similar charities; the number of patients is limited to three hundred. The original building was erected, in 1732, on the north side of Upper Moorfields; the present was commenced in 1751, but not completed till 1786, at an expense of £55,000. Bridewell Hospital occupies the site of Bridewell palace, near Fleet-street; before the fire of London, it consisted of several quadrangles, and is still of great extent. This establishment was founded by Edward VI., for the relief of distress, and the punishment of vagrants, to which latter purpose it is still partly applied, being at present used as a house of correction for dissolute persons, and idle apprentices, committed by the chamberlain of the city; and for the temporary maintenance of distressed vagrants till they can be passed to their places of settlement: it is under the government of the mayor and corporation.

Besides these principal hospitals, there are several others of considerable magnitude; such as St. George's hospital, Hyde Park Corner, now being rebuilt; the Lock hospital, Grosvenor-place; the Small-Pox hospital, Gray's Inn-lane; the hospitals for Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, and German Jews, Mile-End-road; the hospital for aged French Protestants, St. Luke's; the Fever hospital, Battle-bridge, &c. The Lying-in hospitals are numerous, and receive upwards of five thousand poor women annually. The principal are, The British, The City of London, The Queen's, Westminster, Middlesex, and Brownlow-street hospitals; all which are spacious buildings, and some of them, particularly the City of London and the Westminster hospitals, are of very handsome construction. The subordinate institutions of this class furnish attendance to females at their own houses, and are situated in different parts of the town. The Dispensaries, for affording medical relief in cases of sickness, accident, &c., amount in London, as has been stated, to upwards of twenty, exclusively of the various establishments for vaccine inoculation.

The principal miscellaneous charitable establishments are, the Foundling hospital, Guildford-street, founded originally for the reception and maintenance of exposed and deserted children, and open for the reception of illegitimate children of females of good character, whose future prospects are not likely to be affected by a temporary dereliction of the path of virtue; the Magdalen hospital, Blackfriars-road; the London Female Penitentiary, Pentonville, and the Metropolitan Asylum, Hackney, for the relief and reformation of repentant prostitutes; the Asylum for Female Orphans, Westminster-road; the Marine Society, for fitting out indigent, distressed, and even depraved boys, for the naval service; the Asylum for the Indigent Blind, St. George's Fields, and that for the Deaf and Dumb, Kent-road; the Philanthropic Society, St. George's Fields, for the children of convicted criminals; the Refuge for the Destitute, Hackney-road; the Royal Humane Society, for recovering persons from apparent death by drowning, &c.; the National Vaccine Society, for the extermination of the small pox, by means of vaccination; the Samaritan Society, for the relief of patients discharged cured from the London hospital; the Society of Schoolmasters, for the benefit of the necessitous orphans and widows of that useful class of men; the Society for the relief and discharge of persons imprisoned for small debts, Craven-street, Strand; the Scottish hospital, for relieving distressed natives of Scotland, Crane-court, Fleet-street; the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, having, in regard to the natives of Ireland, the same objects as the Scottish Corporation; the Caledonian Asylum, for supporting and educating the children of soldiers, sailors, marines, &c., natives of Scotland, or born of indigent Scottish parents resident in London; the Society of Ancient Britons, Gray's-Inn-lane, for maintaining, instructing, clothing, and apprenticing children of Welch parents, born in and near London; the National Benevolent Institution, Freemasons' hall, for the relief of distressed persons in the middle ranks of life, of any country or persuasion; the Corporation for the relief of poor widows and children of clergymen, being an extremely well-supported establishment, under the especial patronage of the established church, the anniversary meetings of which are held in St. Paul's Cathedral, in the second week in May, when a grand musical festival is given for the "benefit of the sons of the Clergy;" the African Institution, Westminster library, Jermyn-street; the Society for the relief of distressed foreigners; the London Maritime Institution; the Society for the relief of the widows and orphans of medical men in and near London; the Artists' Benevolent Fund, and the Artists' Joint Stock Fund; the Sheriffs' Fund; Raine's Charity, St. George's in the East; the Literary Fund Society, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; the Royal Society of Musicians; the Choral Fund, and the New Musical Fund; the Philological Society, King-street (West), Bryanston-square; the Female Friendly Society, &c. The Infirmarys are, the Sea-bathing Infirmary, Tower-street; the Royal Infirmary for disorders of the eye, Nassau-street; the London Infirmary, for similar complaints, Finsbury; the New Rupture Society, Great Russell-street; and the City of London Truss Society, at the City Dispensary, Grocers'-hall-court. The Infirmary for the diseases of the spine, Upper St. Martin's-lane. Among the buildings of the above institutions which are worthy of notice, for their magnitude or architectural merit, may be particularised those of the Foundling hospital, the Magdalen, the Asylum for Female Orphans, the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, the Caledonian Asylum, and the Welch Society, Gray's-Inn-lane. There are also numerous Religious Societies, of which the following are the principal: The British and Foreign, The Naval and Military, and the Merchant Seamen's, Bible Societies; The Church of England, The London, the Wesleyan Methodist, The Baptist, and The Moravian, Missionary Societies; The Prayer Book and Homily Society; The London Hibernian, and The Irish Evangelical, Societies; The Society for promoting Christianity in Foreign parts; The Religious Tract Society; The Home Missionary, and the Christian Instruction, Societies; The Societies for promoting Christianity among the Jews, and for the conversion of Negro Slaves; The Society for the support and encouragement of Sunday schools, throughout the British dominions; and The National Society, for the education of the poor in the principles of the Established Church in England and Wales.

LIBRARIES.

London possesses a great number of public libraries, independently of those attached to different charitable foundations.

The British Museum.—This national repository, as well of antiquities and curiosities as of books and manuscripts, was established, by act of parliament, in 1753. Its originator was Sir Hans Sloane, who bequeathed his museum to the nation, on condition that parliament should pay £20,000 to his executors, and provide a house for its reception. This was accomplished, by means of £85,000 raised by lottery for the purpose; and other collections being added, the whole were deposited in the noble mansion formerly belonging to the Duke of Montague, in Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, which had been purchased for the purpose. To the Sloanean museum parliament have added, at various times, the Cottonian library, given by Sir R. Cotton to the public, and removed from Cotton-house, Westminster; Major Edwards' library; the Harleian library; Dr. Burney's rare and classical library, and the Lansdowne manuscripts: various literary men and others have also increased the treasures of this establishment by donations and legacies. George II. gave the whole of the important library of printed books and manuscripts which had been gradually collected by the kings of England, from Henry VII. to William III. George III. gave a large and valuable assortment of pamphlets, published between the years 1640 and 1660; and Garrick bequeathed to the Museum his collection of old plays. Some of the principal private donations are, Dr. Birch's library, left by will, together with £522. 18. per annum in the funds for ever; a select library of classical works, by Thomas Tyrwhitt, Esq.; a similar bequest by Sir William Musgrave; and a magnificent collection of printed books and prints by the late Rev. M. Cracherode. The most recent, and one of the most important donations, is that of the magnificent library collected by George III., and presented to the trustees of this great national repository by His late Majesty, George IV., for the reception of which, an extensive and elegant gallery has been recently added to the buildings of the Museum. Numerous other libraries, and valuable collections of pieces of ancient sculpture, curiosities, &c., have been added, by gift or purchase, rendering the British Museum, at the present time, in books, manuscripts, sculpture, antiquities, and the curiosities of art and nature, one of the richest in Europe. The whole of the building, which is decaying in many parts, it has been proposed to re-edify, from the elegant designs of Mr. Smirke. The parts finished in the rebuilding of it consist of the splendid pile for the reception of the library given by the late king: it has a front looking towards Bedford-square, faced with stone; and the projections in the centre are ornamented with four half columns of the Ionic order, fluted, and a pilaster at each end, of the same order, which support a pediment; the cornice, &c., of wrought stone, being placed at the top of the wall along the whole of this side. The entrance is at the end of Montague-place. The first and right-hand apartment is of very great length, extending to the projection in the centre of the building, where it is ornamented on each side with two superb Corinthian columns, having shafts and bases of highly-polished marble, with beautiful capitals of variegated marble: it is adjoined by a second apartment of nearly equal dimensions, and two smaller rooms beyond. The whole of this noble suite of apartments are very lofty, of equal height, and have an enriched cornice and frieze, with ceilings of the most magnificent description; they are supported with iron, which renders the building fire-proof, and which is itself further supported by very strong iron girders, placed at intervals across the walls. All the rooms are lighted on both sides with windows of equal dimensions, extending the entire length of the building, and the walls which separate the apartments are decorated at the angles with double-faced pilasters of polished marble; the upper suite of rooms, stone staircase, entrance-hall, and other portions on this side, as well as the whole of its exterior, is of correspondent grandeur. The immense number, and splendid binding, of the works in the royal collection, in the principal library, amounting to sixty thousand volumes, many of them most costly and exquisite, are in harmony with the fitting-up of the apartment in which they are placed, and, with the books in the other apartments, form a collection of nearly one hundred and seventy thousand printed volumes, and twenty thousand volumes of manuscripts.

The London Institution was formed in the autumn of 1805, by the exertions of a few public-spirited individuals, as a public library for the more especial use of the city, and a charter of incorporation was obtained in January, 1807. The temporary house fixed upon for this purpose, until a suitable building could be erected, was, in the first place, the old mansion of Sir Robert Clayton, in the Old Jewry, and subsequently a house in King's Arms Yard, Coleman-street. In 1815, the present elegant building, which has the advantage of a peculiarly fine situation, in Finsbury-circus, was constructed, partly from the funds of the society, and partly from the voluntary contributions of such of its members as were friendly to the measure: the first stone was laid by the lord mayor (S. Birch, Esq.), accompanied by the civic state officers, and the proprietors; and the edifice was completed and opened in 1819. The building is of stone, and has a beautiful front, the length of which is one hundred and forty feet. The centre is adorned with a handsome portico, consisting of four Tuscan pillars, supporting an equal number of the Corinthian order on an upper story, the whole being surmounted by a pediment. An entrance-hall of great elegance, decorated with columns and pilasters, leads by a grand double stone staircase to the library, a fine apartment, ninety-seven feet long, forty-two broad, and twenty-eight high, elegantly fitted up, with stone galleries running round the whole upper part, and containing a very extensive collection of books in recesses, being particularly rich in works relating to English history and Topography. Besides committee-rooms, reading-rooms, and every other requisite convenience, there is an elegant theatre for the delivery of lectures. The acquisition of a fine library, the diffusion of knowledge by means of lectures and experiments, and the providing for the subscribers a reading-room, furnished with the best English and foreign periodicals, are the principal objects of this institution. To accomplish these, nearly one thousand gentlemen and merchants subscribed seventy-five guineas each, and selected a committee who framed the laws by which the institution is governed: this committee, consisting of twenty-six members, is chosen annually, and the whole direction is vested in them.

The Red Cross-street Library was founded for Protestant dissenting ministers by Dr. Williams, about the year 1716, and, in consequence of gifts and purchases since that time, it now contains about twenty thousand volumes. The books are for the most part on Theological subjects; and admission may be procured by application to the librarian on any day in the week, except Saturday.

Sion College, London Wall, is both a charitable and a literary institution. The building was originally an hospital for blind paupers, and, after passing through various hands, was purchased for the purpose of erecting Sion college, for the use of the London clergy, who were incorporated by Charles I. The purchase was made in consequence of the will of Dr. Thomas White, vicar of St. Dunstan's in the West, who left £3000 for the purpose. The library was the gift of the Rev. John Simpson, rector of St. Olave's, Hart-street, one of Dr. White's executors; but it was afterwards considerably increased, both before and after the fire of London, which destroyed a great number of the books. It now consists of a very extensive collection, like the former, chiefly Theological: all rectors and vicars within the city are fellows of this college.

LITERARY, PHILOSOPHICAL, AND OTHER LEARNED AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTIONS, &c.

The number of these is very great, and is daily increasing. The first in consequence and antiquity are, the Royal Society, and the Antiquarian Society, the meetings of both which are held at Somerset House; and next in order are the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, situated in John-street, Adelphi; the Royal Institution of Great Britain, Albemarle-street; the London Institution, already described; the Russell Institution, Great Coram-street; the Mechanics' Institution, Southampton-buildings; the City of London Literary and Scientific Institution, Aldersgate-street; and the Westminster Literary and Scientific Institution, Leicester-square: all these possess fine libraries, and the buildings in which they are held generally merit observation. The names of the other principal institutions are, the British Mineralogical, and Entomological Societies; the Philosophical Society of London; the Astronomical Society, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; the City Philosophical Society; the Mathematical Society, Spitalfields; the Horticultural Society; the Linnæan Society; the Geological Society; Gresham College, &c. The Medical and Surgical Institutions consist of the College of Physicians, removed from the fine building by Sir Christopher Wren, in Warwick-lane, to Pall-Mall (East); the Surgeons' College, Lincoln's-Inn-square; the Apothecaries' Company and Hall, Blackfriars; the Medical Society, Bolt-court, Fleet-street; and the Medical and Chirurgical Society, in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. The principal Theatres of Anatomy and for Medical lectures are, Dr. Bell's theatre in Great Windmill-street, and those of the several hospitals; and in different other places numerous miscellaneous lectures are delivered on various branches of medical science.

The Public Exhibitions of Paintings are those of the Royal Academy, Somerset House; the Gallery of the British Institution, Pall-Mall; the Society of Painters in Water Colours, Pall-Mall (East); the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street; the National Gallery, Pall-Mall; the various Panoramas, &c. Of these, The National Gallery was begun by the purchase by government of the Angerstein collection of pictures, subsequently to which were purchased some of the finest paintings of Corregio, A. Carracci, Murillo, Titian, &c., and twenty additional paintings were presented by Sir George Beaumont, including a beautiful landscape by Rubens. The new building, from a design by Nash, was determined on by the late king and the proper authorities, in July 1828: it is to be called the New National Gallery and Royal Academy, and to be erected on the site of the present riding-house, in the King's Mews, having a front towards Charing Cross, three hundred yards in length, with a beautiful Corinthian portico and centre dome, a small one on each wing, and a still smaller on each of the principal extremities. Being intended to have an elevation about twice the height of the first-rate houses already erected, it will form a very grand and noble line, extended, in a direction from Pall-Mall (East), nearly across to St. Martin's church. The space immediately in front will be occupied by the New Royal Academy, which is intended to represent an extensive Grecian temple, having at the exit and entrance a long flight of steps, and standing at right angles with the National Gallery.

Zoological Society and its Gardens. The gardens of this society, in the Regent's Park, are delightfully laid out in walks, interspersed with pheasantries and aviaries, sheds and enclosures, &c., for the preservation and rearing of the animals belonging to the society, brought from all parts of the globe. Besides the museum, which contains six hundred species of mammalia, four thousand birds, one thousand reptiles and fishes, one thousand testacea and crustacea, and thirty thousand insects, the vivarium contains upwards of four hundred and thirty living quadrupeds and birds, the whole of which are accommodated in buildings and places calculated to afford them the opportunity of enjoying every approximation, consistent with a captive state, to their natural habits; such as the bears' pit, the lama house, beaver dam, kangaroo hut, and aviaries for hawks, owls, small birds, &c. The society has lately received a valuable addition to its rapidly increasing collection from His present Majesty, who has munificently presented the collection of birds and beasts made by the late King, George IV.; and so interesting and attractive has the establishment been found, that, in the short period of seven months, the gardens and museum are stated to have been visited by upwards of one hundred and thirty thousand persons.

The Coliseum is a large building in the Regent's Park, bearing a considerable resemblance to the Pantheon at Rome, and was originally intended only for the exhibition of an immense panoramic picture of London, taken from the very summit of St. Paul's Cathedral by Mr. Horner, who projected the design of the building: as at present finished, however, there is a variety of additional departments, such as a conservatory filled with a great variety of foreign and choice plants and shrubs; an aviary, grottos, waterfalls, jets d'eau, a library, a reading-room, a refectory, and various other sources of amusement or recreation. The work altogether is novel and unique in its kind, and nearly £70,000 has been expended in its execution.

ANTIQUITIES.

The antiquities of London, for the most part destroyed with the city in 1666, but, till within the last sixty or seventy years, still numerous, have of late, through the extension of commercial enterprise, and the progress of modern improvement, externally almost disappeared. The monasteries, forming the first class, amounted to nearly fifty, the names, situations, founders, dates, and orders of which were as follows:

—Convents of Monks. St. Peter's, Westminster, founded by Sebert, in 605, for Benedictines; St. Saviour's, Bermondsey, by Ailwin Child, in 1082, for Cluniacs; St. Mary's of the Graces, or Eastminster abbey, Tower-hill, by Edward III., in 1359, for Cistercians; the Chartreuse, or Charter-house, near Smithfield, by Sir Walter Manny, Knt., in 1371, for Carthusians. Nunneries. St. Mary's, Clerkenwell, by Jordan Brisset and Wife, in 1100, for Benedictines; St. John's the Baptist, Holywell, Shoreditch, by Richard I., in 1189, (refounded by Sir Thomas Lovel, Knt., in 1510,) for Benedictines; St. Helen's, Bishopsgate-street, by William Basing, in 1212, for Benedictines; and St. Clare's, or Nuns Minor-esses, Minorities, by Blanch, Queen of Navarre, in 1293. Friaries. Franciscan, Newgate-street, by John Ewin, Mercer, in 1225; Carmelite, Fleet-street, by Sir Richard Grey, in 1241; Dominican, by Hubert de Bourgh, in 1242, in Holborn, and refounded at Ludgate, by Archbishop Kilwarby, in 1279; Augustine, Throgmorton-street, by Humphrey Bohun, in 1253; and Crouched or Crutched, Hart-street, Tower-hill, by Ralph Hosier and Richard Laberne, in 1298. Colleges. St. Mary Overey's, or St. Saviour's, Southwark, by Mary Overey, in 1000, for Augustine canons; St. Martin's-le-Grand, by Ingelric and Girard, in 1056, for Augustine canons; Holy Trinity, Aldgate, by Queen Maud, in 1108; London College, Guildhall, by Peter Fanlone, Adam Francis, and Henry Frowick, in 1299; Corpus Christi, St. Lawrence', Poultney-lane, by Sir John de Poultney, in 1346; St. Michael's, Crooked-lane, by Sir William Walworth, in 1380; the Holy Ghost and St. Mary's, College-hill, Thames-street, by Sir Richard Whittington, Knt., in 1418; and Jesus's College, St. Paul's Cathedral. Hospitals. St. John's of Jerusalem, Smithfield, by Jordan Brisset and Wife, in 1100; St. Giles' in the Fields, Bloomsbury, by Queen Matilda, in 1102, for lepers; St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield, by one Rayhere, in 1102; St. Thomas' of Acon, Cheapside, by Thomas Fitz-Theobald de Heily and Wife, in 1170; St. Mary's Spital, Norton-Falgate, by Walter Brune and Wife, in 1179, for Canons Regular; Knights' Templars, Holborn, and afterwards Fleet-street, in 1185, refounded in 1245; St. Mary's Bethlehem, Bishopsgate-street, by Simon Fitz-Mary, in 1246; Elsnige Spital, London Wall, by William Elsnige, in 1329; St. Thomas', Southwark; St. James', Pall-Mall, and the Savoy, for lepers and infirm. Priory. St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield, by Rayhere, in 1102, for canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine. Domus Conversorum. Rollis Chapel, Chancery-lane, by Henry III., in 1233, for Converted Jews. Guilds, or Fraternities of Priests, &c. All-hallows Barking, Tower-street; Leadenhall, Leadenhall-street; St. Peter's, Cornhill; St. Augustine's, Papey, Camomile-street; Holy Trinity, Aldersgate-street, &c. There were also in London the five cells, or hermitages, of St. Catherine, Wapping; St. James in the Wall, Cripplegate; St. Mary Rouncival, Charing Cross; the hermitage of St. James, opposite, and Our Lady of Pien, Westminster. Of the above, the following only exhibit any external remains:—Westminster abbey, independently of its fine church and cloisters, still retains its beautiful chapter-house, the shell of the great hall, the abbot's residence (now the deanery), and to which is attached the ancient kitchen, and the celebrated Jerusalem chamber; the abbey close, with numerous old buildings, and the exterior walls of its spacious gardens. The remains of Bermondsey abbey, consisting of a few fragments of walls, and the side of the east gate leading into Grange-walk. The Charter-house still retains its original gateway in Charter-house-square, several of the monks' cells, now blocked up, part of the exterior wall surrounding the convent and gardens, and other inferior parts incorporated in walls and passages, &c. Clerkenwell nunnery has a few square yards of ancient stone wall next Corporation-row. "The Nonnes Quies," at St. Helen's, still exists, with the original nuns' seats of oak, and the ancient grating, through which they could see divine service performed from the vaulted crypts beneath the hall of the nunnery. Of the nunnery in the Minories very considerable remains were discovered after a fire there in 1797, and there still exists a portion of the south, or street, front of the abbey mansion, behind the houses in the Minories, besides much of its reverse front, now modernised into Haydon House. Black friars' has diminished to a solitary piece of dingy stone wall, standing at the top of a passage in Glo'ster-court, St. Andrew's Hill. Of the White friars' there are only a few fragments of wall behind the houses in Bouverie-street, partly incorporated with the buildings of the Bolt and Tun Inn. The vestiges of the Grey friars consist of the great cloisters and Whittington's library, both about to be demolished, as have other parts, for continuing the present improvements there. Augustine friars' has the fine nave of its church now occupied as a Dutch place of worship. Of Crutched friars' there only remain Sir John Milbourne's almshouses, which adjoined the east end of the friary church; they have a curious tablet of the Virgin Mary, encircled by angels. The remains of St. Mary Overey', which will speedily give way to the approaches to the new London bridge, consist, besides the fine conventual church, of a considerable length of ancient stone vaulting, supporting a chapel, or hall; and various detached parts, in doors, archways, &c., in Montague-close. Part of the vaulting of Corpus Christi College remains between St. Lawrence Poultry churchyard and Suffolk-lane. Large remains of St. Martin's-le-Grand college chapel were discovered in digging the foundations of the New Post-office, the whole of which, as well as every other vestige of this very ancient institution, are now annihilated. The priory, or college of the Holy Trinity, Aldgate, retains part of the south aisle of its Norman church, in a passage leading from Duke's place to St. James' churchyard. The priory of St. Bartholomew the Great has the whole choir of its Norman church converted into the present church; its east cloister, the shell of its dining-hall, with fine vaults beneath, and various smaller parts: the fraternity, galleries, prior's house, and various other remains, were destroyed by fire, in May, 1830. Of the Temple, there remain the very beautiful church, with its circular vestibule, and the tombs of the ancient cross-legged knights, part of the cloisters entering into it, and some ancient Norman arch-work incorporated in the walls of the Inner Temple Society's kitchen. The Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem retains its large and well-known gateway from St. John's-lane, the choir of the conventual church converted to the present parish church of St. John (and beneath which is the fine original crypt), with part of the chapels of the south aisle, and some smaller remains. St. Mary's Spital has the abutment of its principal gateway still standing at the corner of White Lion-street. Elsnige Spital has part of its entrance porch and steeple incorporated in the present parish church of St. Alphage. In St. James' palace may still be discerned many parts of the ancient hospital. The Savoy church is that of its ancient hospital. Of the Domus Conversorum there still remains the ancient chapel, called the Rolls chapel: and the hall of the Holy Trinity, Aldersgate, now Trinity chapel, is all that exists of the smaller monastic foundations.

Amongst the remaining metropolitan antiquities, which are too reduced in number to render a classification necessary, may be enumerated several large fragments of the walls of London, at the back of Fore-street, in Cripplegate churchyard; at the back of the houses in Falcon-square; beneath the houses next Aldersgate, and in St. Botolph's churchyard there; at the back of the Old Bailey; at the Cock in the Corner, Ludgate; and at the back of George Alley, next Tower-hill: the last, which is by far the largest, oldest, and most perfect portion, is intermixed with an abundance of Roman brick. There are some crypts, or stone arched cellars, anciently belonging to religious structures, or mansions: one of the finest specimens of the former was the priory of Lewes chapel, Tooley-street, just demolished for the approach to the New London bridge; there are also remains of another subterranean chapel, or church, beneath the house at the north-east corner of Leadenhall-street: the most remarkable crypts belonging to ancient mansions are the vaults beneath Gerrard's hall, Basing-lane, and at Crosby House, Bishopsgate-street: the great hall, with much of the superstructure, of the latter princely residence is also standing, and may rank as the finest specimen of domestic architecture in London. The churches which, either wholly or in part, exhibit fine specimens of ancient building, and were not conventual, are, Bow church, Cheapside, which still retains its fine Norman crypt; and St. Sepulchre's, which latter boasts a beautiful groined avenue from Snow-hill: there are also various ancient parts, or incorporations, deserving notice in the churches of St. Olave, Hart-street; St. Giles, Cripplegate; St. Andrew, Under-shaft, &c. Of the ancient military architectural remains in various parts of the Tower of London, a brief account has already been given; besides which, there were, until destroyed very recently, vestiges of camps and fortified earthworks at Highbury, near White-Conduit-house and Battle-bridge, and at the descent from Gray's-Inn-lane, the Fleet ditch, &c. The remains of Roman roads connected with the metropolis are nearly obliterated, but may be still imperfectly traced by the diligent investigator, particularly in the old bridle way of Hugbush-lane, and in the continuation of Eald street, through Shoreditch churchyard, by Bethnal Green, &c. The most celebrated remnant of antiquity, of all which appertains to London, however, is the supposed Roman milliary, in Cannon-street, denominated London stone, which, whether of Roman or British origin, was undoubtedly once of considerable magnitude, and is the first and oldest of our metropolitan antiquities. Of the result of numerous excavations, at various times, in the discovery of Roman tessellated pavements, altars, coins, &c., mention has been made under their proper heads.

Among the numerous distinguished individuals born in the metropolis may be enumerated the following:—

Ingulphus, Abbot of Croyland, an English historian, who lived at the time of the Norman Conquest; Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury; Matthew of Westminster, a Monkish historian of the fourteenth century; Geoffrey Chaucer, the first great English poet, born in 1328; Dr. John Colet, the founder of St. Paul's school, born in 1466; Sir Thomas More, author of a political romance, entitled "Utopia," Lord Chancellor under Henry VIII., in whose reign he was beheaded for denying the king's supremacy, born in 1480; John Leland, the English antiquary; John Stow, author of the "Survey of London," born in 1525; William Camden, author of the "Britannia," born in 1551; Edmund Spenser, author of the "Fairy Queen," born about 1553; Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, the father of modern philosophy, born in 1561; Edward Alleyn, a celebrated actor, the founder of Dulwich College, born in 1566; Inigo Jones, the reviver of a taste for classical architecture in England, born in 1572; Dr. John Donne, a distinguished poet and divine, born in 1573; Ben Jonson, the dramatist, poet laureate in the reign of James I., born in 1574; John Milton, the author of "Paradise Lost," who was Latin Secretary to Oliver Cromwell, born in 1608; Algernon Sidney, a republican writer, executed on account of the Rye-house plot in 1683, born about 1617; Abraham Cowley, the poet, born in 1618; Sir William Temple, eminent as a statesman and public writer, born in 1629; Dr. Isaac Barrow, a celebrated divine and mathematician, born in 1630; Dr. Edmund Halley, celebrated as a mathematician and an astronomer, born in 1656; Daniel Defoe, the author of "Robinson Crusoe," born in 1660; Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury, a distinguished writer on morals and metaphysics, born in 1671; Colley Cibber, a dramatic writer and actor, poet laureate to George I., born in 1671; Sir John Vanbrugh, an eminent architect and dramatist, born about 1672; Alexander Pope, the poet, born in 1688; George Lillo, a goldsmith, who wrote "George Barnwell," and other popular dramas, born in 1693; Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield, distinguished as a statesman and a cultivator of polite literature, born in 1694; William Hogarth, the painter, born in 1698; Dr. John Jortin, a learned theological writer, born in 1698; Dr. Philip Doddridge, an eminent dissenting divine and scripture commentator, born in 1702; John Dollond, the inventor of an achromatic telescope, born in 1706; Dr. Thomas Augustine Arne, a distinguished musician, born in 1710; Richard Glover, author of "Leonidas," and other poems, born in 1712; James Stuart, author of the "Antiquities of Athens," born in 1713; Thomas Gray, author of the "Elegy written in a Country Churchyard," and other works, born in 1716; Sir William Blackstone, author of "Commentaries on the Laws of England," born in 1723; John Wilkes, author of the "North Briton," born in 1726; Charles Churchill, the celebrated satirist, born in 1731; Richard Gough, F.A.S., the editor of Camden's "Britannia," born in 1735; Dr. Samuel Horsley, a celebrated theological writer, born about 1737; Arthur Young, Secretary to the Board of Agriculture, born in 1741; William Mitford, author of a valuable "History of Greece," and other works, born in 1744; Sir William Jones, a celebrated Orientalist and juridical writer, born in 1746; The Hon. LONDON-COLNEY, a chapelry in the parishes of ST. PETER and ST. ALBANS, hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBANS, county of HERTFORD, 3 miles (S.E.) from St. Albans. This place derives its name from its situation on the road to London, which crosses the river Colne here, over which there is a substantial brick bridge of seven arches. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of St. Albans, and diocese of London. The chapel is a neat modern edifice, dedicated to St. Peter, erected for the use of the inhabitants of the parishes of St. Peter, Shenley, and Ridge, by subscription amounting to £2700, including a grant of £400 from the parliamentary commissioners for the erection of churches: it contains about seven hundred sittings, one-half of which are free. The site was given by the Earl of Hardwicke, who at the same time settled £40 per annum towards the support of the minister.

LONDONTORPE, a parish in the soke of GRANTHAM, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 3½ miles (E.N.E.) from Grantham, containing 195 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage not in charge, with those of North Grantham and Great Gonerby, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

Longborough, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Stow on the Wold, containing, with the hamlet of Bankfee, 526 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Seasoncote united, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £5. 15., and in the patronage of Chandos Leigh, Esq., and Sir Charles Cockerell, Bart., the former having two presentations, and the latter one. The church, dedicated to St. James, has lately received an addition of one hundred and ninety sittings, of which one hundred and seventy-two are free, and towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels contributed £90. The source of the river Evenlode is in this parish, and the Fosse-way passes through it.

Longburgh, a township in the parish of BURGH upon the SANDS, ward and county of CUMBERLAND, 6¼ miles (W.N.W.) from Carlisle, containing 154 inhabitants.

Longcot, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of SHRIVENHAM, county of BERKS, 3½ miles (S. by W.) from Great Farringdon, containing 419 inhabitants.

Longdon, a chapelry in the parish of PONTESBURY, hundred of FORD, county of SALOP, 5 miles (S.W. by S.) from Shrewsbury, containing 387 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united with the rectory of Pontesbury, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The chapel is dedicated to St. Ruthen.

Longdon, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, 4 miles

(N. W. by N.) from Lichfield, containing 1115 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Longdon in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield, rated in the king's books at £5. 5., and in the patronage of the Prebendary, but, after his demise, in that of the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The church, dedicated to St. James, has lately received an addition of one hundred sittings, of which sixty-four are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £30 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Independents. Several small bequests have been made for the instruction of children. St. Mary's almshouses, founded by Mrs. Jane Cotton, are ten in number, nine of which are inhabited by poor women, each of whom receives three shillings and sixpence weekly; the tenth is occupied by a schoolmistress, who instructs twelve girls and five boys. A court leet is held twice a year by the lord of the manor. Indications of coal are observable here, but none has been raised. The Trent and Mersey canal passes about two miles northward of the church. At Castle Ring, a point in the Marquis of Anglesey's park at Beaudesert, are the remains of a British encampment. The Society of Friends have a very ancient burial-ground at Gentle Shaw, in this parish.

LONGDON, a township in that part of the parish of LEEK which is in the northern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by S.) from Leek, containing 350 inhabitants.

LONGDON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Upton upon Severn, containing 640 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Castle-Morton and Chaseley, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £14. 17. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is surmounted by a tower of brick. A free school was founded, about 1660, and endowed with land by Giles Godwin, Esq., for the instruction of children belonging to this parish; the master receives £28 per annum, for which he instructs about forty children in reading, writing, and arithmetic. A court leet is held annually, for Longdon, Castlemeston, and Chaseley.

LONGDON upon TERNE, a parish in the Newport division of the hundred of BRADFORD (South), county of SALOP, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Wellington, containing 95 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of Pontesbury, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Manorial Court of Longdon upon Terne. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. The Shrewsbury canal passes through this parish and village, and is here crossed by the river Terne.

LONGFIELD, a parish in the hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Dartford, containing 113 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £5. 17. 6., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Rochester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, contains the remains of the beneficent Archdeacon Plume, founder of the Plumean Professorship at Cambridge.

LONGFLEET, a tything in the parish of CANFORD-

MAGNA, hundred of COGDEAN, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 1 mile (N. N. E.) from Poole, containing 810 inhabitants.

LONGFORD, a parish in the hundred of APPLE-TREE, county of DERBY, comprising the townships of Alkmonston, Hollington, and Longford, the liberty of Hungry-Bentley, and the hamlet of Rodsley, and containing 1264 inhabitants, of which number, 573 are in the township of Longford, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Ashbourn. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £3. 8. 9., and in the patronage of Thomas William Coke, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Chad, has some portions in the Norman style of architecture, and three stone stalls in the chancel. In 1688, Dame Catherine Coke bequeathed land for the education and apprenticing of poor children: the income is £20 per annum; twenty poor boys are instructed by a master, and other children by a schoolmistress. In 1687, Sir Robert Coke, Bart., founded an almshouse for six poor men or women, and endowed it with £55 per annum, £10 of which is paid to the vicar, whose duty it is to read prayers to the almspeople. The foundations of some ancient religious house may be traced at Alkmonston.

LONGFORD, a hamlet in those parts of the parishes of ST. CATHERINE and ST. MARY de LODE, GLOUCESTER, which are in the upper division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. E. by N.) from Gloucester, containing 215 inhabitants.

LONGFORD, a parish in the Newport division of the hundred of BRADFORD (South), county of SALOP, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W. by S.) from Newport, containing 234 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$.. R. Leeke, Esq. was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LONGHAM, a parish in the hundred of LAUNDITCH, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from East Dereham, containing 298 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of T. W. Coke, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LONGHOPE, a parish in the duchy of LANCASTER, county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Newent, containing 790 inhabitants, of which number, 503 are in Lower, and 287 in Upper, Longhope. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £9. 7. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Probyn. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Courts leet and baron are held annually. An annuity of £5 was given by Mr. Thomas Nourse, for apprenticing one poor boy. May hill, in this parish, forms a land-mark from the Bristol channel; it is planted with a clump of fir-trees on the summit, and is visible at a considerable distance from all parts of the adjacent country.

LONGNEY, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WHITSTONE, county of GLOUCESTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Gloucester, containing 443 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £12. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence. The navigable river Severn runs on the west of this parish.

LONGNOR, a parish in the hundred of CONDOVER, county of SALOP, 8 miles (S.) from Shrewsbury, containing 222 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Archdeacon Corbett. The church was a free chapel belonging to the abbey of Haughmond, and purchased of the vendees of the crown soon after the dissolution of the abbey, by the then proprietor of Longnor hall. A school is endowed with the interest of £200, the bequest of Sir Richard Corbett, Bart.; and there is a Sunday school, at which about sixty children attend. This is the birthplace of the Rev. Samuel Lee, Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge, an eminent self-taught linguist.

LONGNOR, a market town and chapelry in the parish of ALLSTONEFIELD, northern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 10 miles (N.E.) from Leek, and 162 (N.N.W.) from London, containing 460 inhabitants. This town is situated in the most northern part of the county, near the source of the river Manifold; and here a small canal terminates, which commences in the parish of Sheen, where it joins the Manifold. The market is on Tuesday: fairs are held on the Tuesday before Old Candlemas, Easter-Tuesday, May 4th and 17th, Whit-Tuesday, August 5th, Tuesday before Old Michaelmas, and November 12th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with a rent-charge of £7. 10., private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Allstonefield. The chapel, which is dedicated to St. Giles, is a neat edifice of stone, with a lofty pinnacled-tower: in the cemetery is a tombstone to the memory of W. Billinge, a native of Fairfield, who, after a long military career, died in the year 1791, at the age of one hundred and twelve years. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A small school, founded by subscription, is endowed with about £7 per annum, the proceeds of bequests made, in 1794, by John Robinson and Moses Charlesworth.

LONGPARISH, a parish in the hundred of WHERWELL, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3¼ miles (S. W.) from Whitchurch, containing 693 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. H. Woodcock, D. D. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The river Test runs through the parish. A trifling rent-charge, the gift of Thomas Baker, in 1696, is applied in teaching poor children.

LONGPORT, commonly styled a borough in the parish of ST. PAUL, CANTERBURY, but partly in the hundred of WESTGATE, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, contiguous to the eastern side of the city of Canterbury, containing 684 inhabitants.

LONGPORT, a manufacturing district within the parish and township of BURSLEM, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD. This place was formerly called Longbridge, from a number of stepping-stones, forming a causeway across the meadows; but after the construction of the Trent canal, a branch of which passes through the district, its name was changed to Longport. On the banks of the canal are several wharfs: there are likewise some very considerable manufactories for earthenware and china, and a glass-house. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here.

LONGRIDGE, a township in the parish of NORHAM, otherwise Northumberland, county palatine of DURHAM, though locally to the northward of Northumberland, 4 miles (S. W.) from Berwick upon Tweed, containing 81 inhabitants.

LONGRIDGE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of RIBCHESTER which is in the lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 7¼ miles (N. E.) from Preston. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £600 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. Sir H. Hoghton, Bart. was patron in 1780. A festival, or guild, is held on St. Lawrence's day; and there are fairs on March 16th, April 16th, the Monday preceding Holy Thursday, and November 5th, for cattle, pedlary, &c. Here was an ancient hospital for a master and brethren, dedicated to the Virgin Mary and our Saviour.

LONGSHAWS, a township in the parish of LONGHORSLEY, western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5½ miles (W. N. W.) from Morpeth, containing 38 inhabitants. Here are some remains of a very ancient edifice called the Launches.

LONGSTOCK, a parish in the hundred of KING'S SOMBOURN, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 1½ mile (N.) from Stockbridge, containing 397 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £10. 15., and in the patronage of Sir Charles Mill, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LONGSTONE (GREAT), a chapelry in the parish of, BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, 3 miles (N.N.W.) from Bakewell, containing, with Holme, 442 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Bakewell. The chapel, which is dedicated to St. Giles, contains several monuments belonging to the family of Eyres, Earls of Newburgh. The chapelry is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The commissioners for enclosing lands granted to trustees an allotment of waste land of about fourteen acres, for the support of a schoolmaster, which lets for £9. 13. per annum; this sum, with £5 per annum, the bequest of William Wright in 1656, and an annual contribution of £5 from the Duke of Devonshire, is paid to the master for teaching twenty-five poor children gratuitously: the school-room was built by subscription, and there is a house and garden for the master.

LONGSTONE (LITTLE), a hamlet in the parish of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bakewell, containing 145 inhabitants.

LONGTHORPE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of ST. JOHN the BAPTIST, PETERBOROUGH, which is within the liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (W.) from Peterborough, containing 240 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

LONGTON, a chapelry in the parish of PEN-WORTHAM, hundred of LEYLAND, county palatine of LANCASTER, 5 miles (S.W. by W.) from Preston, containing 1719 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £850 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant. J. Rawstorne, Esq. was patron in 1820. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The free school was founded and endowed, in 1793, by Robert Moss, with a bequest of £400, for the instruction of the children of the inhabitants: the present school-room was built by subscription in 1817; the income is £27 per annum; all the children of the chapelry who apply are taught gratuitously.

LONGTON, a township in the parish of STOKE upon TRENT, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Newcastle under Line. The population is returned with Lane-End.

LONGTOWN, a market town in the parish of ARTHURET, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Carlisle, and 309 (N. N. W.) from London, containing 1812 inhabitants. This is a small town on the south bank of the river Eske, over which is a stone bridge, near the junction of that river with the Liddel. The situation is pleasant and healthy, the houses are neatly built, and the streets are spacious, but not regularly paved nor lighted: the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells. Many of the lower class are employed in weaving for the manufacturers at Carlisle. The market, originally held on Thursday, is almost disused, except for provisions; but there is another on Monday, principally for bacon and butter: a fair is held on the Thursday before Whit-Sunday, for horses; and there are statute fairs on the Thursday in Whitsun-week, and the Thursday in Martinmas, for hiring servants. The county magistrates hold a meeting here on the last Thursday in every month. Courts leet and baron are held at Easter and Michaelmas; at the former the constables are appointed. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. In 1754, Lady Widdrington gave a rent-charge of £40, for the support of charity schools in the parishes of Arthuret and Kirk-Andrews, of which, £8 per annum is paid to a schoolmaster at Longtown; and a school for the instruction of an unlimited number of children is supported by Sir James R. G. Graham, Bart. This place is eminently indebted to the liberality and public spirit of the late Dr. Graham, who was mainly instrumental in raising it from the state of a poor village to its present improved condition.

LONGTOWN, a chapelry in the parish of CLODOCK, hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 17 miles (S.W. by W.) from Hereford, containing 842 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecon, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The Rev. James Rogers was patron in 1816. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. Courts baron for the parish and hundred are held here annually. Lewis Gilbert, Esq. bequeathed £4 per annum for the instruction of children. There are some few vestiges of a castle; and to the eastward is an eminence called Money Farthing hill, probably from coins having been found there.

LONGWOOD, a chapelry in the parish of HUDDESFIELD, upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Huddersfield, containing 1942 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £2400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Huddersfield. A free school was founded and endowed with lands, in 1731, by William Walker, for the education of forty children of both sexes, to be elected from Longwood, Golcar, and Milnes Bridge: the annual income is £97. 11., and the master occupies the school-house, garden, and croft.

LONGWORTH, a parish comprising the chapelry of Charney in the hundred of GANFIELD, and the hamlet of Draycot-Moore in the hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Great Farringdon, and containing 974 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £27. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a small sum for the instruction of children, the bequest of John Carter, by means of which eight boys and girls are taught to read and write. This parish is entitled to send five boys to the school at Kingston-Bagpuze. A National school has been lately established here. The ancient intrenchment called Cherbury Camp is in a detached part of the parish: it is of an oval form, surrounded by a triple vallum; the diameter in the widest part is three hundred and ten paces, and in the narrowest, two hundred and eleven. The river Isis runs through this parish. In the parochial register is an entry of the baptism of Bishop Fell, July 16th, 1625, whose father was rector of Longworth.

LONGWORTH, a township in the parish of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Great Bolton, containing 238 inhabitants.

LOOE (EAST), a sea-port, borough, market town, and chapelry, having separate jurisdiction, in the parish of ST. MARTIN, locally in West hundred, county of CORNWALL, 16 miles (W.) from Plymouth, and 232 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 770 inhabitants. This place was formerly the only sea-port in Cornwall of any importance, excepting Fowey, and hence was derived its name, Lo, in Cornish, signifying a port. In the reign of Edward III. it furnished twenty ships and three hundred and fifteen mariners towards the equipment of the English fleet for the siege of Calais. Its situation is beautifully romantic, on the eastern bank of Looe bay, near the mouth of the river Looe, over which is a narrow bridge of thirteen stone arches, one hundred and forty-one yards in length, and only six feet wide, built about the year 1400: the sea view is very fine, and the land scenery richly diversified; the air is salubrious, and the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water. On the beach is a fort mounted with ten guns; and opposite to the town is Looe island, or St. George's, which is much frequented by flocks of sea-fowl during the spring. The pilchard fishery is carried on to a considerable extent; the exports consist of tin, copper, and lead ore, bark, timber, salt, pilchards, and pilchard oil; and coal, culm, and limestone are imported. Here is a custom-house; and a collector, a comptroller, and a surveyor of the customs, are resident. Four British vessels entered inwards from foreign parts, and three cleared outwards, in 1826; three vessels were built and registered here the same year; and in 1828, there were two vessels of more than one hundred tons', and twenty-four of less, burden belonging to the port. This town derives considerable advantages from the Liskeard and Looe canal, recently completed. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held, February 13th, July 10th, September 10th, and October 10th.

East Looe is a borough by prescription; the charter of incorporation, granted by Elizabeth in 1587, was confirmed by charters of James I. and II. The corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, eight aldermen, and an indefinite number of burgesses, with a town-clerk, four serjeants at mace, and inferior officers: the mayor and recorder are elected by the aldermen; the aldermen and free burgesses by the mayor and aldermen; the town clerk is appointed by the recorder, and the serjeants at mace are nominated by the mayor: the mayor, the late mayor, the deputy mayor, the recorder, and the deputy recorder, are justices of the peace, within the borough. Sessions for the borough are held once or twice a year, at which prisoners charged with petty larceny are tried, but those committed for transportable, or capital, offences, are generally tried at the assizes or sessions for the county, though there is a clause in the charter to prohibit the judicial interference of the county magistrates. The charter of James II. gives the mayor and aldermen authority to hold a court of record every three weeks, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £100; but no business has been transacted in this court for many years. There is a common gaol for felons and debtors. A court leet, with view of frank-pledge, is held for the manor. This borough, conjointly with Fowey, sent a representative to a great council at Westminster, in the reign of Edward I., but members were not sent to parliament until the 13th of Elizabeth, since which two members have been returned, who are elected by a majority of the corporation: the mayor is the returning officer, and the influence of the Buller family is predominant. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, and in the joint patronage of James Buller, Esq., and the Rev. Sir H. Trelawney, Bart. The chapel, rebuilt in 1806, is a small but handsome structure. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Wesleyan Methodists.

LOOE (WEST), a borough and chapelry (formerly a market town) in the parish of TALLAND, WEST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 16 miles (W.) from Plymouth, and 231 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 539 inhabitants. This place, also called Port Pigham, a corruption of Port Vichan, which signifies in Cornish the "Little Port," is situated on the opposite bank of the river to that of East Looe, with which it is connected by a bridge. The town is of inconsiderable size; the harbour is small but commodious, and is defended by a strong battery; the river is navigable for vessels of one hundred tons' burden, and divides itself into two branches, just above the bridge. There is no market; but a cattle fair is held on the 6th of May. A charter of incorporation was granted by Elizabeth, in 1573, whereby the municipal body consists of a mayor and eleven burgesses, who are empowered to choose a steward, with a town clerk, and other officers: the mayor and steward are justices of the peace. A court leet, with view of frank-pledge, is held. The charter authorises the mayor to hold a court for the recovery of debts under £5, every week; but no proceedings have taken place in this court for several years. There is a small prison, called the Dark house. The borough first sent members to parliament in the 6th of Edward VI., since which period it has returned two representatives, who are elected by a majority of the corporation: the mayor is the returning officer, and the influence of the Buller family is predominant. The chapel, formerly dedicated to St. Nicholas, but now desecrated, has been converted into a guildhall. There is a place of worship for Independents. A mathematical free school was founded here, in 1716, by the trustees under the will of John Specott, Esq., who in 1730 bequeathed the sum of £1000 for charitable uses; £30 per annum was appropriated by them for the instruction of poor children in the mathematics, particularly in those branches which relate to navigation; and the appointment of the master, after the death of the original trustees, was vested in the heirs of Charles Trelawney, Esq., and the proprietor of Trelawney house. In the vicinity of West Looe are the remains of a mound, supposed to have been on the line of a Roman road, and some vestiges of military works.

LOOSE, a parish in the hundred of MAIDSTONE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Maidstone, containing 882 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has recently received an addition of one hundred and thirty-five sittings, of which seventy-nine are free, the Incorporated Society for enlarging churches and chapels having contributed £100 towards defraying the expense. A stream of water runs through this parish, which, in the space of three miles, turns no less than twelve mills. Here is a quarry of rag-stone; and in the vicinity are large plantations of hops.

LOPEN, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of PETHERTON, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Crewkerne, containing 425 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The manufacture of coarse linen is carried on to a limited extent.

LOPHAM (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of GUILT-CROSS, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (S. E.) from East Harling, containing 741 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of South Lopham, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £17. 0. 5. George H. Barrow, Esq. was patron in 1822. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In this parish is Lopham ford, where the rivers Waveney and Little Ouse take their rise, about three yards from each other, and, diverging, pursue opposite courses.

LOPHAM (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of GUILT-CROSS, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from East Harling, containing 821 inhabitants. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to that of North Lopham, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

LOPPINGTON, a parish in the hundred of PRIMHILL, county of SALOP, 3 miles (W.) from Wem, containing 622 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LORBOTTLE, a township in the parish of WHITTINGHAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Rothbury, containing 100 inhabitants.

LORTON, a parish in ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, comprising the chapelry of Wythop, and the townships of Brackenthwaite and Lorton, and containing 593 inhabitants, of which number, 353 are in the township of Lorton, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Cockermouth. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale. The church is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. A school is endowed with the interest of £100.

LOSCOW, a joint township with Codnor, in the parish of HEANOR, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Alfreton. The population is returned with Codnor. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LOSTOCK a hamlet in the parish of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Great Bolton, containing 576 inhabitants. An unendowed school was erected by subscription, on an allotment of land given by the commissioners of enclosures for the instruction of poor children of the neighbourhood: about thirty children are instructed at a small charge. Here are the remains of a very ancient mansion, called Lostock hall, bearing date 1563: the gateway is of stone, and the royal arms, with the date 1590, are over the highest bay window: it is supposed to have been the residence of the Andertons.

LOSTOCK-GRALAM, a township in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Northwich, containing 525 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes westward of this place.

LOSTWITHIEL, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the eastern division of the hundred of Powder, county of CORNWALL, 6 miles (S.) from Bodmin, 26 (S. W.) from Launceston, and $236\frac{1}{2}$ (W. S. W.) from London, containing 933 inhabitants.

This place is supposed by some to have been the Roman station called Uzella by Ptolemy, but this opinion does not appear to be warranted by the discovery of any certain traces of Roman residence. According to tradition, Lostwithiel was so called as having been the residence of Withiel, anciently Earl of Cornwall, who had a palace at Penkneth, now part of the borough, but in the parish of Lanlivery. In the reign of Richard I., the town was held under the Earl of Cornwall, by Robert de Cardinham, who procured for it the privilege of a market; and Richard, Earl of Cornwall, the brother of Henry III., made Lostwithiel, including Penkneth, a free borough. His son Edmund, Earl of Cornwall, was a great benefactor to the town, in which he erected a shire hall, an exchequer office, and other handsome buildings, and ordered that the coinage and sale of the tin from the Cornish mines should take place at Lostwithiel only, and that all county meetings should be held there. These exclusive privileges were not preserved inviolate, for, in 1314, the burgesses complained to the parliament that the men of Bodmin, Truro, and Helston, had caused tin to be sold at those towns, and that the prior of Bodmin had then recently procured the county meetings to be held at Bodmin; but notwithstanding these grievances were redressed, Lostwithiel was gradually deprived of its exclusive advantages, the only remnant of which is the election of the knights for the county of Cornwall, which still takes place here, though the previous meetings for the nomination of the candidates are held at Bodmin. In the summer of 1644, this place was the head-quarters of the parliamentary general, the Earl of Essex; previously to which, a battle had been fought near the town, in which a body of the king's troops, under Sir Richard Grenville, was defeated by Lord Robartes. Dugdale asserts that the parish church was profaned by the parliamentary soldiers, and injured by an explosion of gunpowder.

This town is situated in a beautiful vale, on the banks of the river Fawey, on the high road from Plymouth to Falmouth; the river, which is crossed by a bridge, is navigable for small barges as far as the quay, during the spring tides. The town consists of two parallel streets, extending from the river to the foot of a steep hill: it is lighted and paved, and there is a good supply of water. The houses are chiefly built of stone, and covered with slate, which abounds in the neighbourhood. An annual regatta, or boat race, with a ball, takes place in August, and assemblies are held in the winter. There is a tan-yard in the town, but its trade chiefly depends upon the importation of timber, coal, and other articles for the miners; and the recent increase of the copper mines in the neighbourhood has been attended with a correspondent advance of commercial prosperity. About three miles from the town are the extensive mines of Lanescot and the Fowey Consols., surpassing, in the variety, extent, and power of their machinery, all others in the kingdom, their produce amounting to an eleventh part of all the copper-ore furnished by the mines of Cornwall. The market is held on Friday; and the establishment of a corn market, free of toll, was recently attempted, but without success: the market-house was erected at the expense of Viscount Mount-Edgcumbe, in 1781. There are fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep, March 31st, July 10th, September 4th, and November 13th. The borough includes portions of the adjoining parishes of Lanlivery and St. Winnow. A charter of incorporation was granted by James I., in 1623, and renewed by George II., in 1738, under which the corporation consists of seven aldermen or capital burgesses, including the mayor, and seventeen assistants, or common council-men. The mayor is elected by the aldermen and assistants, on the first Tuesday after Michaelmas; and the assistants are chosen by the aldermen, who likewise fill up vacancies in their own body. The mayor, the late mayor, and the recorder, are justices of the peace; and the mayor is also coroner. A court leet is held annually by the mayor, when presentments are made concerning matters relating to the borough and the river; and all persons having boats on the river are required to yield suit and service at this court. The petty sessions are generally held here on Friday. The quarter sessions for the county, formerly held here in the summer, were, a few years since, removed to Bodmin. In the old shire hall, erected by the Earl of Cornwall, and in which the stannary parliaments were held, is the original stannary court-room, with a prison adjoining, which is the only one in the county belonging to the stannaries. The town hall is a neat building, with a prison underneath, erected, in 1740, at the cost of Lord Mount-Edgcumbe. The borough first returned members to parliament in the 33rd of Edward I., and then ceased till the 4th of Edward II., since which the returns have been regular: The right of election is vested in the corporation; and the mayor is the returning officer. The Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe possesses paramount influence.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £ 2. 13. 4., endowed with £ 600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is a handsome edifice in the early English style, with a lantern tower at the west end, surmounted by a fine octagonal spire, erected in the fourteenth century: it contains an ancient stone font, on the sides of which are sculptured grotesque figures and armorial bearings, rudely executed, and now much defaced. There are places of worship for Bryanites, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A free grammar school was established by the corporation about 1776, the master of which has a salary of £ 50 per annum. A writing-school is kept in the town hall, the corporation allowing a salary of £ 10 per annum to the master. There is likewise a school with an endowment of £ 5 per annum, paid out of the proceeds of a fund left for charitable uses, by the Rev. St. John Eliot. A Sunday school, supported by voluntary contributions, affords instruction to about one hundred and twenty children of both sexes. About a mile northward of the town, on the edge of a lofty hill, are the magnificent and venerable ruins of Restormel castle, supposed to have been erected by Robert, Earl of Mortaigne, and anciently the residence of the Earls of Cornwall. At the commencement of the great civil war, although then ruinous, it was garrisoned for the parliament, and was taken by the royalist general, Sir Richard Grenville, in August, 1644. The remains are comprised within a circular area, one hundred and ten feet in diameter, the walls of which are nine feet thick, and are surrounded by a deep moat; at the southern entrance, where was formerly a draw-bridge, are two arches supporting a square tower; traces of suites of apartments and stone staircases are visible; and the whole, being richly overgrown with ivy, presents a very picturesque appearance. The chapel of the Holy Trinity, anciently appendant to the castle, is also in ruins.

LOTHERS, a parish in the liberty of LOTHERS and BOTHENHAMPTON, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Bridport, containing 857 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £ 14. 5. 7½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. Here was an Alien priory subordinate to the abbey of Mountsburch in Normandy: at the suppression by Richard II., being then valued at £ 80 per annum, it was bestowed on the priory of St. Anne, near Coventry; but, in the time of Henry IV., it was restored to its ancient owners, and after the dissolution by Henry V., it became part of the endowment of Sion abbey, Middlesex.

LOTHERTON, a township in the parish of SHERBURN, upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Tadcaster, containing, with a part of Aberford, 427 inhabitants.

LOUDWATER, a chapelry in the parish of HIGH WYCOMBE, hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3¼ miles (S. E.) from High Wycombe, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £ 1200 private benefaction, £ 400 royal bounty, and £ 2400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of certain Trustees. The chapel was built and endowed, in 1788, by W. Davis, Esq.

LOUGHBOROUGH, a market town and parish in the western division of the hundred of GOSCORE, county of LEICESTER, comprising the townships of Knight-Thorpe and Wood-Thorpe, and containing 7494 inhabitants, of which number, 7365 are in the town of Loughborough, 11 miles (N.) from Leicester, and 109 (N. W.) from London. The name is probably derived from Lough, a lake, or a large extent of meadow occasionally overflowed. The noble family of Despenser, anciently possessors of the manor, obtained the grant of a market and fairs for the town. In 1564, the assizes for the county were held here, on account of the plague raging at Leicester at that time. From its size and population this may be considered the second town in the county, and it was so reckoned three centuries ago: it is a great thoroughfare, being situated on the high road from London to Manchester. The buildings in general are of brick, and a great proportion of the houses is modern: plaster, which is made of alabaster obtained from the quarries of Burton on the Wold, is mostly used for the floors of the lodging-rooms. The streets are paved and partially lighted by subscription, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. A neat theatre has been recently built: there is likewise a subscription library. The manufactures comprise hosiery of all kinds, cotton goods, and bobbin net-lace, for which last article a patent was obtained by the manufacturer, and the machinery is worked here under his license, giving employment to nearly five hundred persons: the manufacture of what is termed patent fleecy hosiery is confined entirely to this town. The Loughborough canal, which communicates with the Union canal, the Leicester navigation, the river Soar, and the lime-works at Barrow hill, has been very beneficial to the town, and abundantly profitable to the proprietors: the shares, which originally cost but £120 each, are now worth about £4000. There are some quarries of slate in the neighbourhood. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held February 14th, March 28th, April 25th, Holy Thursday, August 12th, and November 13th, for horses, cows, and sheep; March 24th and September 25th, for cheese; and November 14th is a statute fair for hiring servants. An ancient cross and the old market-house having been removed, the market-place is now open. The town is under the superintendence of a constable, headborough, meadow-reeves, and street-masters, all of them chosen at the annual court leet of the lord of the manor. A court baron is held annually, and the petty sessions for the hundred are held here weekly.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £40. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Emanuel College, Cambridge. The church, which is dedicated to All Saints, is a handsome edifice, in the later style of English architecture, and has a fine tower, which was built by subscription towards the close of the sixteenth century. There are places of worship for General and Particular Baptists, Independents, the Society of Friends, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. The free grammar school is endowed with rents arising from lands originally bequeathed by Thomas Burton, in 1495, for the maintenance of a chantry in the parish church, but appropriated, at the Reformation, to the endowment of a free grammar school, the repair of certain public bridges in the parish, and in aid of parochial rates; these estates are called "Burton's Trust," and their present rental is about £1500 per annum: as a principal object in the expenditure is the repair of the roads and bridges, an officer is annually elected, under the name of bridgemaster, to superintend its execution. The school is open to all the children residing in the parish: it is entirely under the direction of the trustees, and consists of three establishments, under separate masters; namely, a Latin school, in which there are from fifteen to twenty scholars; a school in which reading, writing, and arithmetic are taught to about twenty-five boys; and a National school for two hundred and fifty more: the surplus of the annual income is appropriated by the trustees to charitable uses. Two exhibitions, of £30 each, to Emanuel College, Cambridge, are attached to this institution: the school-house is a handsome new building, erected near the churchyard. A free school for twenty girls was founded, in 1683, by means of a bequest from Bartholomew Hickling, and endowed with land; and, in 1717, Joseph Clark bequeathed land, directing the proceeds to be applied for the instruction of children. Various benefactions have been made, at different periods, for apprenticing poor children, and for annual distribution to the poor. A public dispensary is supported by voluntary contributions. Dr. Richard Pulteney, a distinguished physician and writer on botany, was born here in 1730. Loughborough conferred the title of baron on Alexander Wedderburn, an eminent lawyer, who held the office of Lord High Chancellor, and who was subsequently created Earl of Rosslyn.

LOUGHRIGG, a joint township with Rydal, in the parish of GRASMERE, KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ambleside. The population is returned with Rydal.

LOUGHTON, a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Fenny-Stratford, containing 293 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bucks, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £14. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LOUGHTON, a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 14 miles (N. E. by N.) from London, containing 979 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of London, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £18. 3. 9. Miss Whitaker was patroness in 1805. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

LOUGHTON, a chapelry in the parish of CHETTON, hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, 9 miles (N. E. by E.) from Ludlow, containing 119 inhabitants.

LOUND, a joint township with Toft, in the parish of WITHAM on the HILL, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Bourne. The population is returned with Toft.

LOUND, a township in the parish of SUTTON, liberty of SOUTHWELL and SCROOBY, county of NOTTINGHAM, 4 miles (N. by W.) from East Retford, containing 370 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LOUND, a parish in the hundred of MUTFORD and LOTHINGLAND, county of SUFFOLK, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Lowestoft, containing 416 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. The Rev. J. Blanchard was patron in 1826. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

LOUTH, a market town and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the Wold division of the hundred of Louth-Eske, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 28 miles (E. N.E.) from Lincoln, and 150 (N. by E.) from London, containing, with the hamlet of Louth-Park, 6055 inhabitants. The ancient name of this town was Luda, from its vicinity to the Lud, a small stream formed by the junction of two rivulets. It was distinguished for the number of its religious houses previously to the Reformation, and the inhabitants were the first to resist the measures enforced by Henry VIII. for their suppression. In 1536 they took part in an insurrection called the "Pilgrimage of Grace," and the prior of Barlings, their leader, the vicar of Louth, four other priests, and seven laymen, were executed at Tyburn in the following year. A destructive plague, which raged here in the year 1631, from April until the end of November, swept away seven hundred and fifty-four persons. The town is pleasantly situated in a fertile vale, eastward of the wolds, bounded on the north and south by chalk hills, which command beautiful and varied prospects: it is neat and well built, the houses being chiefly of brick covered with tiles; the streets are paved, and lighted with gas, under the authority of an act passed in 1825; and the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water from several springs in the neighbourhood, some of which issuing from the northern hills, form a rapid and overflowing stream during the summer, and in winter are generally dry: the air is considered to be highly salubrious. The theatre is opened every alternate winter. Assemblies and concerts are held in the mansion-house, which contains an elegant suite of apartments, ornamented in the Grecian style; and a public subscription library, billiard, and news rooms, are always open. The vicarage house, denominated the hermitage, is especially worthy of notice, from the ingenious and rustic style in which the garden is laid out; the walks are planted with shrubs, interspersed with appropriate buildings, seats, and cloisters, for the use of the supposed hermit, and decorated with obelisks and vases, bearing numerous devices and mottos: the principal building contains the study, kitchen, chapel, and dormitory, and is adorned with moss, flints, bark, bones, and other natural productions, the whole producing a picturesque effect. The mode of obtaining water for irrigating the land here, or for domestic purposes, is somewhat unusual: the stratum of argillaceous soil, which descends to a depth of twenty-seven yards, is perforated, and a hollow tube of tin or copper is inserted into the bed of gravel beneath, through which the water rises, and thus a perpetual fountain is formed, from which a copious supply is readily obtained throughout a district of thirty miles in length, and ten in breadth. A carpet and blanket manufactory, established a few years ago, is conducted on an extensive scale, and is in a very flourishing condition; and a paper-mill and soap-house furnish employment to a considerable number of persons; there are likewise several worsted manufacturers and wool-staplers. In 1761, an act of parliament was obtained for cutting a canal between this town and the Humber, which was completed at an expense of £12,000; by means of this mode of communication, vessels of considerable burden regularly trade with London, Hull, and several parts of Yorkshire, carrying out corn and wool, and bringing back coal, timber, iron, grocery, and other articles of commerce. The wool market is a commodious building, opened in June 1825. The general market days are Wednesday and Saturday; there is a market for cattle and sheep every Friday during the spring, and fairs are held on the third Wednesday after Easter, August 5th, and November 22nd. The government of the town is vested in a warden and six assistants, who were incorporated by charter of the 5th of Edward VI., and are empowered to choose a high steward, town clerk, and bailiff: to the corporation Elizabeth gave, by charter, "the manor of Louth and divers lands there," the annual value then being £78. 14. 4½; their privileges were subsequently confirmed and extended by James I. The warden and one of the assistants, called the justice, are elected annually, and are magistrates in and for the town and parish; and an application has lately been made for a charter, for the appointment of two additional magistrates. Sessions for the town are held quarterly, usually in January, April, July, and October. The general quarter sessions for the southern parts of the division of Lindsey are held here and at Spilsby alternately. Petty sessions are held every Wednesday in the guildhall; and there is a court of requests, under an act passed in the 47th of George III., for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, the jurisdiction of which extends over a considerable portion of the parts of Lindsey. The sessions-house and prison is a handsome modern pile, with a portico of Roman Doric architecture. The tread-mill is used to grind corn for sale.

The living of St. James' is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Louth St. Mary, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Louth in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £12, and endowed with £200 royal bounty. Here were formerly two churches, dedicated respectively to St. Mary and St. James; of these, the latter only remains, and it is one of the finest structures in the county, consisting of a nave, aisles, and a chancel, and exhibiting a remarkably good specimen of the later style of English architecture: at the east end is a window of seven lights, with very beautiful tracery, and at the western extremity is a lofty tower, with a rich crocketed spire, the building of which was completed about 1516: the spire, having been blown down some years ago, was rebuilt on the original plan. The tower consists of three stories; at its summit are four octagonal embattled turrets, with flying buttresses to the spire, the height of which, to the cross by which it is surmounted, is one hundred and forty-one feet, and the total height, from the base of the tower, two hundred and eighty-eight feet. The chancel is of later date than the body of the church, and probably coeval with the steeple. The burial-ground has not been used for upwards of half a century, the churchyard formerly belonging to the church of St. Mary being the general place of interment. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The free grammar school was founded and endowed by Edward VI., with the property of some ancient guilds in this town, consisting of about one hundred and sixty acres of land, with several messuages and tenements, and the tolls of markets and fairs: the trustees are the warden and six assistants, with their successors, who are authorised to make laws for the government of the school: the present income is about £600 per annum, of which sum half is directed to be given to the head master, a quarter to the usher, and the remainder to be appropriated to the maintenance of twelve poor women, who reside in almshouses under the school-room. The school is open for gratuitous classical instruction to the children of all parishioners. A fund is raised from the terms of admission on the annual "speech day," and from a subsequent ball, out of which assistance is afforded to any young man of superior abilities at either of the Universities, who had been previously educated here. A free school for poor boys was founded and endowed by the will of Dr. Robert Mapletoft, Dean of Ely, in 1677, with a rent-charge upon his estates, for the support of a master to teach reading, writing, arithmetic, and the church catechism: the income is about £5 per annum. Thomas Espin, F.S.A., whose views of the cathedral, churches, and ruins, in this county, are universally admired, was master of this school for thirty years, and on his death, in 1822, was interred in a mausoleum near his late residence in the town. A National school, erected in 1818, and enlarged in 1820, is supported by voluntary contributions, and contains about three hundred children. A dispensary for the relief of the sick poor is also supported by subscription. About a mile from the town is the hamlet of Louth-Park, where are some slight vestiges of an abbey founded by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln, in 1139, for monks of the Cistercian order, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary: it was a cell subordinate to Fountain's abbey in Yorkshire, and at the dissolution its revenue was estimated at £169. 5. 6.

LOVEDALE, a township in the parish of PENKRIDGE, eastern division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD. The population is returned with the parish.

LOVERSALL, a parish in the soke of DONCASTER, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Doncaster, containing 131 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Doncaster.

LOVINGTON, a parish in the hundred of CATSASH, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Castle-Cary, containing 206 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Wells, endowed with £800 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket. John Whitehead, in 1715, bequeathed certain land, and James Clarke subsequently gave a house, the income arising from which is £9, and is applied to the instruction of twelve poor children.

LOWDHAM, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Nottingham, comprising the townships of Caythorpe and Gunthorpe, and containing 1334 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 4., and in the patronage of Earl Manvers. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There was formerly a chapel of ease at Gunthorpe, where is now a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The manufacture of stockings is carried on here.

LOWE, a joint township with Ditches, in that part of the parish of WEM which is in the Whitechurch division of the hundred of BRADFORD (North), county of SALOP, 1 mile (N. W.) from Wem, containing, with Ditches, 93 inhabitants.

LOWESBY, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $9\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Leicester, containing, with the chapelry of Cold Newton, 217 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 1. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £800 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant. Sir F. G. Fowke, Bart. was patron in 1820. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LOWESTOFT, a sea-port, market town, and parish, in the hundred of MUTFORD and LOTHINGLAND, county of SUFFOLK, 44 miles (N. E. by N.) from Ipswich, and 115 (N. E. by N.) from London, containing 3675 inhabitants. The name of this town, anciently Lothnwistoft, or Lays-toft, is derived, as some suppose, from Lothbroch, a noble Dane, who obtained a part of the kingdom of the East Angles, and resided here; or, according to others, from Low-toft, a market formerly held beneath the cliffs. In 1349, the great plague which devastated the continent of Europe, raged here with such fury, that not more than one-tenth of the inhabitants escaped the contagion; and in 1547 and 1579 the same malady again prevailed: in 1605, it suffered severely from fire, and during the usurpation of Cromwell it was exposed to heavy exactions from its attachment to the royal cause: in 1643, Cromwell entered the town at the head of one thousand cavalry, and seizing several persons, sent them prisoners to Cambridge. In the war with the Dutch, two sanguinary engagements took place off this coast in 1665 and 1666; two of the British admirals on that occasion were natives of Lowestoft. In consequence of the repeated occurrence of shipwreck, two lighthouses were erected by the inhabitants: that on the cliff consisted at first of a circular tower of brick and stone, the upper story of which was sashed and glazed, and a coal fire was constantly kept burning, but having become dilapidated, it has been taken down, and replaced by a cylindrical revolving lantern, furnished with powerful reflectors: the other, on the beach beneath, is constructed of timber, and is moveable at pleasure. By steering in such a direction as to make the upper and lower lighthouses coincide, vessels are guided to a channel of a quarter of a mile in breadth, between the Holme and Barnard sands; the course of this channel, called Stanford, varies so much, from the violence of currents, and the effect of storms, to which this coast is exposed, that a change in the position of the lower lighthouse is frequently necessary: the fort at the south end of the beach having become ruinous in 1744, a battery was erected at the north end, and fortified with two pieces of cannon. In 1782, a new fort was built at the south end, and furnished with thirteen pieces of cannon; another fort has also been erected at the north end, and a battery near the Ness.

The town is situated on a lofty cliff, bordering on the German ocean, and consists principally of one street, nearly a mile in length, which is well paved, and of several small ones, which diverge from it obliquely, the whole being well lighted: the houses, chiefly of brick, are neat and modern, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water from springs; the air is considered highly salubrious, especially to invalids, and the shore, gradually descending to the sea, and having a firm pebbly bottom, is commodious for bathing, which circumstances have made Lowestoft a great resort of fashionable visitors during the summer. Races have been recently established on the downs northward of the town, which form an admirable course; the cliffs, rising in a gentle slope, make a natural amphitheatre, capable of containing an immense number of spectators. There is a good theatre, in which performances take place every alternate year; also a spacious and elegant assembly-room, where balls are held at Christmas, and concerts twice a week during the bathing season, and a subscription reading-room and library. A new bathing-house, fitted up with hot and cold baths, was erected by subscription among some of the inhabitants in 1824: it is a handsome building of pebble stones, with rusticated angles, and is situated at the south end of the High-street. The trade principally arises from the herring fishery, in which about forty boats, from twenty-five to forty tons' burden each, are engaged, and which employs the inhabitants from the end of May till the end of June, after which time great quantities of mackarel and soles are caught, and sent to the Norwich and London markets: the herrings are prepared and dried in houses at the base of the cliff, extending the whole length of the town, and the process of curing is entirely devoid of offensive effluvia. There are rope and twine manufactories of considerable extent. An act of parliament has been recently granted to a company, for making a navigable communication from Lowestoft to Norwich; they have already erected a lock and swing bridge at Oulton, and are now carrying on the excavation between Lake Lothing and the sea, in order to form a harbour of refuge for vessels in distress. Facilities for water carriage are also afforded by communication from Lake Lothing to the Yare at Yarmouth, and by the Waveney to Beccles and Bungay. The market is on Wednesday, for grain and provisions; and toy fairs are held May 12th and October 10th. The county magistrates hold petty sessions weekly at this place, and manorial courts are occasionally held by the steward of the manor. By charter of George II., who landed here, the inhabitants are exempted from serving on juries out of the town. There are a commodious town hall, and a market cross.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 0½, endowed with £250 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, is a large and handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a tower, surmounted by a wooden spire covered with lead, and a south porch, over which was a chamber, said to have been formerly inhabited by two recluse females, who caused wells to be dug between the church and the town, called Basket wells, vulgarly supposed to be a corruption of their names, "Bess and Kate." The interior consists of a nave, two side aisles, and a chancel, with a fine east window of stained glass; the ceiling is ornamented with a rude painting intended to represent the Holy Trinity, and two antique shields contain a representation of the Crucifixion; there is a large brass eagle, formerly used as a reading-desk, also a very ancient and handsome font, decorated with a double row of saints sculptured upon it, and approached by an ascent of three steps, but now greatly defaced. Sir John Holt, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench in the reign of George I., was buried here, and a handsome monument, bearing a Latin inscription, was erected to his memory. In 1698, a chapel of ease was rebuilt by subscription, near the centre of the town. Here are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A free grammar school was founded, in 1571, by Thomas Annot, Esq., whose endowment of it was increased by his heir to £16 per annum; the master is chosen by the vicar and churchwardens, subject to the approval of the chancellor of the diocese; his salary is now £23 per annum, for which he instructs twenty-three boys. Another free school, on the east side of the High-street, was founded and endowed by Mr. John Wilde, in 1735, for the instruction of forty boys in Latin and English: the school-house, in which the master resides, was built in 1788; the master receives a salary of £40 per annum, arising from an estate at Worlingham, the surplus produce of which, amounting in the whole to about £154 per annum, is vested in the churchwardens for charitable purposes. A National school for boys is supported by voluntary contributions. There are various charitable bequests for the relief of the poor. In 1758, a skeleton was discovered in a barrow on Bloodmore hill, near this town; round its neck was a chain, with a gold medal bearing an inscription and device, and an onyx set in gold, bearing a device. In the centre of the High-street are some vestiges of a religious house, consisting of a curious Norman arch, and cellars with groined arches, evidently part of an ancient crypt. The surrounding cliffs abound with organic remains, such as the bones and teeth of the mammoth, the horns and bones of the elk, with Cornua Ammonis, and shells and fossils of various kinds. The celebrated William Whiston, Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge; and Mr. Potter, the learned translator of Æschylus and Euripides, were vicars of this parish.

LOWESWATER, a parochial chapelry in ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 7½ miles (S. by E.) from Cockermouth, containing, with Mockerkin, 440 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale. The church was erected by subscription among the inhabitants, in 1827, on the site of an ancient chapel founded by a prior of St. Bees, to which parish this was formerly a chapelry, and it still pays a small annual tribute to the mother church. The river Cocker runs through this deep and extensive vale, which is bounded by lofty mountains, and contains the picturesque lake of Loweswater, part of Crummock lake, and Scale force, the last the most stupendous cataract in this celebrated region, the water of which, falling to the depth of one hundred and fifty-six feet, sinks into a great chasm surrounded by rocks overhung with trees, and profusely fringed with a variety of smaller shrubs. A lead mine has lately been opened here. On a hill near the village of Mock-erkin a school-room was erected in 1781, and endowed by Mary Mirehouse with £200.

LOWICK, a chapelry in the parish of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Ulverstone, containing 378 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant. W. F. Blencowe, Esq. was patron in 1786.

LOWICK, a parish in the hundred of HUXLOE, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Thrapstone, containing 419 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £16. 8. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Duke of Dorset. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a handsome edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a remarkably elegant tower crowned with pinnacles and a large octagonal lantern: the windows exhibit some brilliant specimens of ancient stained glass; and near the chancel is a mutilated monument of alabaster, to a knight and his lady, of which there are sufficient remains to give an idea of its original splendour. Here was a chantry, or college, of Secular priests, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, founded by an ancestor of Stafford, Earl of Wiltshire, about the time of Edward II., and granted, at the dissolution, to Sir Edward Montague. Drayton-house, built by Henry Green, Esq., is a noble specimen of the prevailing style of architecture in the time of Henry VI. There is a charity school, founded and endowed by Sir John Germain, for teaching and clothing twelve boys and eight girls.

LOWICK, a parish in the eastern division of GLENDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Wooler, containing 1799 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham. The church was rebuilt in 1794. A more commodious place of worship for Presbyterians was erected in 1821, the former one having stood on the spot now occupied by Barmoor castle. Coal and limestone are obtained here.

LOW-QUARTER, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-IRELETH, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, 5 miles (W.) from Ulverstone, containing 572 inhabitants.

LOWSIDE, a township in the parish of WHICKHAM, western division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, containing 1150 inhabitants.

LOWSIDE-QUARTER, a township in the parish of ST. BEES, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, containing 353 inhabitants. The township lies between the river Ehen on the east, and the Irish sea on the west, and contains the venerable remains of Egremont castle, built soon after the Conquest, by William de Meschines, the first Baron of Copeland, and still exhibiting evident traces of its ancient strength and grandeur.

LOWTHER, a parish in WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Penrith, containing 599 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £25. 7. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, was almost wholly rebuilt in 1686, and the tower underwent considerable repairs and alterations in 1824. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Lowther. It formerly contained a village of the same name, which was demolished in 1682, by Sir John Lowther, who soon afterwards built another, called New-Town, in which carpet and linen manufactories were established, but did not succeed. Richard Lowther, in 1638, gave £100 in support of a schoolmaster, and subsequently, — Allgood, Esq., left a rent-charge of £10, for a similar purpose; these, with other donations, produce an income of about £19 a year, for teaching poor children, who pay also a small quarterage. In 1738, two schools for girls were founded by the Rev. Richard Holme, and endowed with £100, which was laid out in land now rented by the Earl of Lonsdale, his lordship paying £10. 10. per annum to each school.

LOWTHORP, a parish in the wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Great Driffild, containing 149 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. W. St. Quintin, Esq. was patron in 1808. The church is dedicated to St. Martin; in it was a college, or chantry, for a rector, six chaplains, and three clerks, founded in the reign of Edward III., by Sir John Haselarton.

LOWTON, a chapelry in the parish of WINWICK, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Newton in Mackerfield, containing 1988 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Winwick. The church is dedicated to St. Luke. A school-room was erected in 1751, with a dwelling-house for the master; it is endowed with three acres of land, for the income arising from which six poor children receive free instruction.

LOXBEAR, a parish in the hundred of TIVERTON, county of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Tiverton, containing 138 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. 14. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. Sir T. D. Acland, Bart. was patron in 1802. The church has a rich Norman doorway and a Norman font. There was formerly a chapel at Leigh in this parish.

LOXHORE, a parish in the hundred of SHERWILL, county of DEVON, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Barnstaple, containing 241 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 14. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. J. P. Bruce Chichester, Esq. was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

LOXLEY, a liberty in the parish of UTTOXETER, southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Uttoxeter, with which the population is returned. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

LOXLEY, a parish in the Snitterfield division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Stratford upon Avon, containing 311 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The parish abounds with limestone. British and Roman coins have been frequently found here.

LOXTON, a parish in the hundred of WINTERSTOKE, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Axbridge, containing 165 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £15. 15. 5. W. Moncriefe, Esq. was patron in 1801. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. Eight poor children are instructed for a trifling bequest by Ann Gadd, in 1765.

LOXWOOD-END, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WISBOROUGH-GREEN which is in the hundred of ROTHERBRIDGE, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Horsham. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel was built about 1540, at the expense of three maiden ladies, who endowed it with £6. 5. per annum. The Arun and Wey Junction canal passes through the parish, and then enters Surrey.

LOYNTON, a township in the parish of HIGH OFFLEY, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, containing 40 inhabitants.

LUBBESTHORPE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of AYLESTONE which is in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Leicester, containing 81 inhabitants. The chapel is demolished.

LUBENHAM, a parish in the hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, 2 miles (W.) from Market-Harborough, containing 531 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 5., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of — Grimes, Esq., by sequestration. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The Union canal passes along the eastern boundary of the parish.

LUCKER, a chapelry in the parish of BAMBROUGH, northern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Belford, containing 194 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Bambrough, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. The village is situated on the western bank of the river Warn. There is a school supported by donations amounting to about £5 per annum.

LUCKHAM, a parish in the hundred of CARHAMPTON, county of SOMERSET, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Minehead, containing 481 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £14. 3. $6\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The river Horner runs through the parish. Iron ore is found in great abundance, and is said to have been worked here more than a century ago. There are several mineral springs in the neighbourhood.

LUCKINGTON, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of KILMERSDON, county of SOMERSET. The population is returned with the parish.

LUCKINGTON, a parish in the hundred of CHIPPENHAM, county of WILTS, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Malmesbury, containing 280 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 7. $8\frac{1}{2}$.. The Rev. John Turner and others were patrons in 1821. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

LUCTON, a parish in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, 6 miles (N. W.) from Leominster, containing 181 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Governors of Lucton school. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. The school was founded, in 1708, by John Pierrepont, Esq., for three masters to teach fifty children, not paupers, of the five adjoining parishes: the endowment consists of land and tithes in Orlton, Yarpole, Luston, Eyton, and Lucton, the annual value of which is now about £800: it is vested in a body corporate, styled "The Governors of Lucton school," viz., the master and preacher of the Charter-house, London, the common serjeant, the rectors of St. Botolph's Bishopsgate, and St. Peter's Cornhill, the preacher of Gray's Inn, the master of Merchant-Tailors' school, and the president of Sion College. The present number on the establishment is sixty-four, viz., fifty sons of poor farmers and labourers, and fourteen of more opulent parents, the latter of whom pay £1. 5. per annum each: they are taught the classics, English, writing, &c., and are allowed £10 as an apprentice fee, and £20 at the termination of their apprenticeship.

LUDBOROUGH, a parish in the wapentake of LUDBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Louth, containing 284 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £20. 19. $4\frac{1}{2}$.. Mrs. Thorold and others were patrons in 1826. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LUDDENDEN, a chapelry in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Halifax, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Halifax. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LUDDENHAM, a parish in the hundred of FAVERSHAM, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 2 miles (N. W. by W.) from Faversham, containing 178 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £12. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the early style of English architecture.

LUDDESDOWN, a parish in the hundred of TOLTINGTROUGH, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Rochester, containing 235 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £11. 11. 3. The Rev. Dr. R. Thomson was patron in 1819. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

LUDDINGTON, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Crowle, containing, with the township of Garthorp, 962 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. M. J. Lister, Esq. was patron in 1824. The church is dedicated to St. Oswald. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LUDDINGTON, a hamlet in the parish of OLD STRATFORD, Stratford division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Stratford upon Avon, containing 164 inhabitants. Here was formerly a chapel, the ruins of which are still visible. The navigable river Avon runs through the township.

LUDDINGTON in the BROOK, a parish partly in the hundred of LEIGHTONSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, but chiefly in the hundred of POLEBROOK, county of NORTHAMPTON, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Oundle, containing 119 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £8. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Duke of Manchester, and the Earl and Countess of Cardigan. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a trifling bequest by Nicholas Latham, in 1620, for teaching poor children.

LUDFORD, a parish partly in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, but chiefly in the hundred of MUNSLow, county of SALOP, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (S.) from Ludlow, containing 280 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of E. L. Charlton, Esq. An hospital for six poor infirm persons was founded here, in 1672, by Sir Job Charlton, who endowed it with certain messuages and lands now let for £63 per annum. It was incorporated by the style of the "Warden and Poor of the Hospital of Ludford," who had a common seal, but the distinction of Warden has long ceased to exist.

LUDFORD (MAGNA), a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Market-Rasen, containing 426 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 18. 4., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of G. R. Heneage, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Roman coins have been discovered in the neighbourhood.

LUDFORD (PARVA), a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Market-Rasen.

The population is returned with Ludford Magna. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, and in the patronage of Ayscoghe Boucherett, Esq. The church has been demolished.

LUDGERSHALL, a joint parish with Tetchworth, in the hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Bicester, containing, with the hamlet of Kingswood, 576 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £17. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Mrs. Martyn. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Here was formerly an Alien priory, a cell to the great hospital of Santingfield in Picardy, which, at the suppression, was given to King's College, Cambridge.

LUDGERSHALL, a borough and parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of AMESBURY, county of WILTS, $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Salisbury, and 71 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 477 inhabitants. This place, formerly called Lurgeshall and Lutgashall, was anciently of considerable extent, and is supposed to have been the residence of some of the Anglo-Saxon kings. A castle existed here soon after the Norman Conquest, wherein, about 1141, the Empress Matilda took refuge, in her flight from Winchester towards the castle of Devizes: no mention of this fortress occurring subsequently to the reign of Henry III., it is believed to have been dismantled soon after that period, for the purpose of curtailing the power of the barons: there are still some slight vestiges of it in a farm-yard in the vicinity. The town, which occupies a delightful situation on the verge of the county, is of inconsiderable size; the streets are neither paved nor lighted. The market was formerly held on Wednesday, but it has long been disused. There is a small pleasure fair on the 25th of July. Ludgershall is a borough by prescription, and sent representatives to all the parliaments of Edward I., to three of Edward II., and to three of Edward III.; between the 9th of Richard II. and the 9th of Henry V. no return was made, but since the latter period the returns have been regular. The right of election was declared, by a committee of the House of Commons, to be vested in "the freeholders and copyholders of the borough houses, and in leaseholders for any term not under three years;" the number of voters is about seventy, and the bailiff is the returning officer; the bailiff is appointed at the court leet held annually by the steward of the manor on Michaelmas-day, when two constables are also chosen. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £11. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Sir Sandford Graham, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. James, is in the early style of English architecture, and contains some very ancient monuments. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A charity school for educating twenty boys and twenty girls, a certain number of them being also clothed, was founded about three years since, and is supported by the members for the borough. Another school, for ten girls, is supported by subscription. There is a small estate at Longstock, near Stockbridge, producing £20 per annum, which is applied for the relief of the poor during winter, and for occasionally apprenticing poor children; it was bequeathed by an individual commonly called "Beggart Smith," who, when in need, had been relieved by the inhabitants of Ludgershall. A few years since, the great seal of England in the reign of Stephen was found in the vicinity.

LUDGVAN, a parish in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Marazion, containing 1839 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £30. 11. 0½. The Duke of Bolton was patron in 1791. The church is dedicated to St. Paul: in it lie the remains of the learned antiquary, Dr. Borlase, fifty-two years rector of the parish. There are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Amey Hill, in 1745, and Hugh Rogers, in 1763, each left a trifling sum for teaching poor children. The parish lies on the margin of Mount's bay. Across the road leading to Marazion is an earthwork thrown up in the civil war by the parliamentarians, during the siege of St. Michael's Mount.

LUDHAM, a parish in the hundred of HAPPING, county of NORFOLK, 7½ miles (N.) from Acle, containing 780 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Norwich. The church, dedicated to St. Catherine, has a richly-carved font, representing various animals and other figures. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Here was formerly a Grange belonging to the abbey of St. Bene't, the house connected with which, after the reign of Mary, became the residence of the diocesans, who considerably enlarged it. In Bishop Jegon's time, the greater part of the house, with many valuable books, manuscripts, and rolls, relating to the see, was destroyed by an accidental fire, which broke out August 10th, 1611. Bishop Harsnet, who afterwards resided here, built a chapel of brick; and Bishop Redman, in the reign of Elizabeth, obtained grants for a market and a fair, which have long been discontinued.

Seal and Arms.

LUDLOW, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Munslow, county of SALOP, 29 miles (S. by E.) from Shrewsbury, and 142 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 4820 inhabitants. This place, called by the Britons Dinan, or the palace of princes, and by the Saxons Leadlowe and Ludlowe, which last name, with a slight variation, it still retains, appears to have been distinguished for its importance prior to the Norman Conquest, at which time, Robert de Montgomery, kinsman of William the Conqueror, fortified the town with walls, and erected the greater part of its stately castle, which he made his baronial residence till his death, in 1094. On the attainder of his son, Robert de Montgomery, the castle came into the possession of Henry I., who made it a royal residence, and greatly enlarged and embellished it; and having strengthened the fortifications, placed in it a powerful garrison, under the command of Gervase Paganell, who, in the following reign, having embraced the cause of Matilda, held it for a considerable time against the forces of Stephen, by whom it was besieged in person assisted by Henry, son of the king of Scotland, who, being drawn up from his horse by an iron hook, was rescued from incarceration by the courage and address of the English monarch.

From its proximity to Wales, Ludlow was always a station of importance, and a strong garrison was constantly kept up in the castle, for the defence of the frontier from the incursions of the Welch. In the reign of Henry III., an order was issued from the castle for all the lords marchers to repair to this place, attended by their followers, to assist Roger Mortimer, at that time governor, in restraining the hostilities of the Welch; and, in the 47th of the same reign, Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, who had joined the confederated barons, assisted by Llewellyn, Prince of Wales, attacked the castle with their united forces, and having set fire to it, nearly demolished it. In the reign of Edward II., Roger Mortimer, a descendant of the former governor, having joined the discontented barons, was sent prisoner to the Tower of London, from which he contrived to effect his escape, and, in commemoration of his success, erected, in the outer ward of Ludlow castle, a chapel, which he dedicated to St. Peter, and endowed it for a priest to celebrate mass; but being arraigned for high treason in the reign of Edward III., he was publicly executed at Tyburn. In the reign of Henry VI., Richard, Duke of York, who then had possession of the castle, detained John Sutton, Lord Dudley, Reginald, Abbot of Glastonbury, and others, in confinement here; and issued from this place his declaration of allegiance to the king, which he also repeated some years after, on the defeat of Lord Audley, at Blore Heath; but, on his subsequent insurrection and attainder, the king laid siege to the castle, and having taken it, he stripped it of all its ornaments, and the town was plundered of every thing valuable by his soldiers; the Duchess of York, with her two younger sons, was taken prisoner, and confined for some time in one of the outer towers of the castle. After the death of the Duke of York, at the battle of Wakefield, the castle descended to his son Edward, Earl of March, afterwards Edward IV. The young king, Edward V., and his brother, the Duke of York, lived in the castle, under the superintendence and protection of Earl Rivers, till their removal by order of the Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., to the Tower of London, where they were barbarously murdered. Prince Arthur, son of Henry VII., resided here after his nuptials with Catherine of Arragon, in 1501, and kept a splendid court till his decease in the following year. In the reign of Henry VIII., a kind of local government, called the "Council in the Marches of Wales," was established at Ludlow, consisting of a lord president, as many counsellors as the prince chose to appoint, a secretary, an attorney, and four justices of the principality, the lord president residing in the castle. During the parliamentary war, the castle held out for the king, under the command of the Earl of Bridgewater, but finally surrendered to the parliament; frequent skirmishes took place in the town between the contending forces, in one of which Sir Gilbert Gerrard, brother to the Earl of Macclesfield, was killed.

The remains of the castle still exhibit traces of its original grandeur, and, from their elevated situation in the centre of a country abounding with beautiful and picturesque scenery, form an interesting and venerable ruin : they are situated on the summit of an eminence of grey-stone rock, overhanging the river Corve ; the north front consists of massive square towers connected by a lofty embattled wall : the ancient fosse and part of the rock have been formed into walks, and planted, in 1772, with beech, elm, and lime trees, affording an extensive and delightful promenade : on the west is a precipitous ridge of rock parallel with the castle, and richly crowned with wood, intersected by a chasm, through which the river Teme pursues its course ; and on the north and west sides is a deep fosse, cut in the solid rock, over which was a draw-bridge, now replaced by one of stone, of two arches, leading to the principal entrance ; the portal is of modern erection, and neither remarkable for beauty nor for strength. The interior has a strikingly majestic appearance ; on the right hand are the ruins of the extensive barracks which were occupied by the troops of the lords presidents of the marches ; near the gate are the apartments of the warden and other officers, and on the left is the keep, a large square embattled tower of four stages, one hundred and ten feet high, with square turrets at the angles ; the walls of this tower, which is of Norman architecture, are from nine to twelve feet in thickness. Opposite to the entrance gateway are the hall and state apartments, in the early and decorated styles of English architecture, now much dilapidated ; in this hall was performed, by the children of the Earl of Bridgewater and others, the celebrated Masque of Comus, composed by Milton, and founded upon an incident which occurred to the family of that nobleman, soon after his appointment to the presidency. To the left are the ruins of the chapel, of which the nave and the beautiful Norman arch leading to the choir are the principal remains ; within the enclosure are several massive towers, among which are Mortimer's tower, and that in which Butler, after the Restoration, composed several cantos of his Hudibras. Though irregular in their arrangement, and greatly dilapidated, these ruins, from the breadth of their masses, the bold projection of some portions, and the depth of the numerous recesses, possess striking features of solemnity and magnificence, and the luxuriant ivy by which they are partly concealed, adds materially to the picturesque beauty of these remains, which hold a prominent rank among the numerous and interesting monuments of feudal grandeur, for which the district formerly constituting the Marches is distinguished.

The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence near the confluence of the rivers Teme and Corve, by which latter it is bounded on the north-west, and over which a handsome stone bridge of three arches was erected by the corporation, in 1738 ; over the Teme, which, after being joined by the Corve, describes a semicircle on the west and south sides of the town, is an ancient bridge, the entrance to which is under the arched passage of Broadgate, the only one remaining entire of the ancient town gates : of the wall which surrounded the town, begun in the 13th, and completed in the 32nd, of Edward I., part of the foundation only can be traced. From its elevated situation the town has a pleasing and cheerful appearance ; the streets are spacious, and the houses in general handsome and well built : it is paved, and lighted with oil, but arrangements have been made for lighting it with gas, and, from the salubrity of the air, and the beauty and interest of the surrounding country, it is regarded as a desirable place of residence by numerous opulent and highly respectable families. There are a public subscription library, and two circulating libraries : assemblies are held in a suite of rooms in the market-house ; and a small theatre is opened by the Worester company, during the races, which take place annually in July, and are succeeded by a ball and public breakfast, which is held in the inner court of the castle. The principal branch of manufacture is that of gloves, and the chief trade is in malt : there are some corn-mills, a paper-mill, and a small manufactory for woollen cloth, flannel, yarn, and blankets, on the banks of the Teme ; and the river Corve turns a mill for grinding bark used in a tannery, and gives motion also to some machinery for making cordage and sacking. The principal market day is Monday, for grain ; and there are smaller markets for provisions on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday : the market cross is a neat modern building, with a handsome cupola, in which is a bell, formerly belonging to the chapel of St. Leonard. The fairs are the Monday before February 13th, Tuesday before Easter, May 1st, Wednesday in Whitsun-week, August 21st, Sept. 28th, and Dec. 6th : the first and last are large marts for butter and cheese, and all the others are for hops, horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs.

The town appears to have had a charter of incorporation at a very early period, which was confirmed and renewed by Edward IV., from whose reign till that of Charles II. it underwent several modifications ; but in the reign of William and Mary it was, on the petition of the inhabitants, restored to its original form : by this charter the government is vested in a recorder, two bailiffs, two justices, twelve aldermen, and twenty-five common council-men, assisted by a town clerk, coroner, and subordinate officers. The high bailiff is chosen from among the aldermen, and the low bailiff from the common council-men, annually on the 13th of October, and the recorder, who holds his office for life, is appointed by the corporation, with the sanction of his Majesty's approbation : the recorder, the bailiffs, and the two justices, who are invariably the bailiffs for the preceding year, are justices of the peace within the borough and liberties. The freedom of the borough is inherited by all the sons of burgesses, or acquired by marriage with a freeman's daughter ; all persons eligible as burgesses must demand that right by petition to the corporation, according to a form prescribed for that purpose by a by-law made in 1663. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for the borough, for the trial of all offenders, and formerly have passed sentence of death ; but the recorders of late not being barristers, the trial of prisoners for capital offences is removed by Habeas Corpus to the assizes for the county. A court of record is held every Tuesday, under the charter of Edward IV., for the recovery of debts to any amount ; also a court of requests for the recovery of debts under 40s., the jurisdiction of which is confined to the borough. The market-house, which may rather be regarded as the town hall, is a large plain brick building, containing commodious rooms for transacting the public business of the corporation, and for holding subscription assemblies, and the balls given by the bailiffs on their election to office : beneath it is a spacious area for the use of the corn market ; and attached to the buildings are two public reservoirs, into one of which water is raised from the river by machinery, and into the other spring water is conveyed from a place under Whitecliffe coppice, called the Fountain. The guildhall, in which the quarter sessions and other courts are held for the borough, is a neat and commodious edifice of modern erection. The borough gaol was erected by the corporation, in 1764, in lieu of Goalford tower, an ancient prison and gate of the town, which had then become ruinous: it is a commodious edifice, containing four wards for the classification of prisoners, but only one airing-yard. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 12th of Edward IV., since which time it has continued to return two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the corporation and in all the resident common burgesses; and the number of the electors is about seven hundred: the bailiffs are the returning officers. The patronage of the borough is divided between the families of Clive and Charlton, but the interest of the former generally predominates.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £19. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, and formerly collegiate, is a spacious and handsome cruciform structure, in the early and decorated styles of English architecture, with a noble square embattled tower, crowned with pinnacles, rising from the centre to the height of one hundred and thirty feet: the entrance is through a beautiful hexagonal porch, leading into the nave, which is separated from the aisles by a series of six gracefully-pointed arches, resting on slender clustered columns, which support the roof, and lighted by a range of clerestory windows, and a large west window, of which the mullions and tracery have been destroyed by recent repairs; the four piers and arches which support the tower are massive and lofty, but finely proportioned and of great beauty; the choir is spacious, and lighted by five elegant windows on each side, and by a noble east window of large dimensions, in which is painted the legendary history of St. Lawrence: the oak stalls are still remaining, and the roof of richly-carved oak is preserved in the several parts of this sumptuous edifice. In the north transept is St. John's chapel, in which is some ancient stained glass, representing the history of the Apostles, and the legend of the ring presented to Edward the Confessor, as a prognostic of his death, by some pilgrims from Jerusalem. Many external and internal ornaments of this church were destroyed by the parliamentary commissioners during the usurpation of Cromwell. The visitations and ecclesiastical courts are held in it, in May and October, for proving wills and granting letters of administration. Among the monuments are several of great antiquity and interest, and two highly-finished effigies of Judge Bridgeman and his lady. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists.

The free grammar school was founded by Edward VI., who vested in the corporation the estate of the guild or fraternity of Palmers in Ludlow, on condition that they should support this and other charities connected with that guild: the school-house was rebuilt in the fifteenth century, at the expense of the corporation, with convenient dwelling-houses for a first and second master, who are appointed by the corporation, and receive respectively £80 and £60 per annum, having also the privilege of taking boarders: the school is open to all boys of the town without limitation of number, who receive gratuitous instruction in Latin and Greek, and pay a quarterage to the master for writing and arithmetic: there are two exhibitions, of £30 per annum each, to Balliol College, Oxford, for boys of this school, founded, in 1704, by the Rev. Richard Greaves, in the appointment of the Master and Fellows of that college; and four of the poorest children receive an annual benefaction, of £5. 6. 8. each, from a bequest by Dr. Charles Langford, in 1607. A National school was established in 1813, with which a Blue-coat school, previously instituted, has been incorporated: from the funds of the latter, a house has been purchased and fitted up, at an expense of £600, for the instruction of girls; the boys are taught in a room over the market cross: the number of children is two hundred, of whom a few are clothed annually, and on leaving school receive an apprentice fee of £3. Alms-houses adjoining the churchyard were founded, in 1486, by Mr. John Hosyer, who endowed them for thirty-three aged people, to each of whom he assigned a weekly payment of fourpence, now increased to two shillings and sixpence: the present building, containing thirty-three distinct apartments, was erected by the corporation, in 1758, at an expense of £1211. 18. 2½., and is kept in good repair. The almspeople are appointed by the corporation, and receive, in addition to their payments from the endowment, a portion of other funds bequeathed by various benefactors. Four almshouses for aged persons were founded by Mr. Charles Foxe, of Bromfield, which, in 1590, he endowed with houses and rent-charges producing at present about £14 per annum, which is divided in weekly payments among the almspeople, of whom two are chosen from this parish, and two from the parish of Bromfield.

A workhouse and house of correction was endowed, in 1674, by Thomas Lane, of Ludlow, who in early life had been a servant in the family of Sir Job Charlton, with land and tenements producing nearly £100 per annum, for maintaining a master to superintend the employment of the poor, and for the purchase of raw materials for the spinning and knitting of stockings, and for making shoes: it is at present in contemplation to erect a house of correction upon a more extended scale in the gaol yard, at the joint expense of the corporation and the trustees of the charity. A public dispensary, established in 1780, is liberally supported by subscription; and a society for the relief of lying-in women is under the superintendence of twelve ladies. There are also numerous charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. Adjoining the castle is Dinham House, a noble mansion of brick, belonging to the family of Clive, in which Lucien Bonaparte, towards the close of the late war with France, resided while in England. Among the religious establishments which flourished here in ancient times, was the college of St. John the Evangelist, founded in the reign of Edward the Confessor, and given, after the dissolution, by Elizabeth to the corporation for charitable uses, the remains of which are divided into separate tenements, and let on lease as dwelling-houses; and a priory of White friars, founded, about the year 1349, by Sir Lawrence of Ludlow, Knt., of which some vestiges may be traced in the environs without the Corn-gate. There are several mineral springs in the neighbourhood, of which one, called the boiling well, is supposed to be efficacious in disorders of the eyes. At Saltmoor is a saline spring, the water of which contains small portions of carbonate of iron, and sulphate of magnesia, and a considerable portion of muriate of soda: it has been found beneficial in scorbutic diseases, and is much frequented by patients affected with such complaints, for whose accommodation warm and cold baths have been provided. Thomas Johnes, Esq., the translator of the Histories of Froissart, Monstrelet, and other learned works; Richard Payne Knight, Esq., author of an "Analytical Enquiry into the Principles of Taste," "The Progress of Society," and other works; T. A. Knight, Esq., author of various works on Horticulture; and Dr. Badham, the translator of Juvenal, were natives of this town.

LUDNEY, a hamlet in the parish of GRAINTHORPE, Marsh division of the hundred of LOUTHESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (N.E.) from Louth. The population is returned with the parish.

LUDWORTH, a joint township with Chisworth, in the parish of GLOSSOP, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Chapel en le Frith, containing, with Chisworth, 1077 inhabitants.

LUFFENHAM (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, 6 miles (N.E. by E.) from Uppingham, containing 421 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £17. 0. 5., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Emanuel College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. There are day and Sunday schools supported by funds arising from the rent of an estate, called the Town Estate, left by Archdeacon Johnson, formerly rector of the parish.

LUFFENHAM (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.N.E.) from Uppingham, containing 274 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £12. 12. 6., and in the patronage of James Bush, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A day and Sunday school is supported by subscription.

LUFFIELD-ABBEY, an extra-parochial liberty, partly in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, and partly in the hundred of GREENS-NORTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.W.) from Buckingham. The population is returned with Stowe. A Benedictine priory, in honour of the Virgin Mary, was founded here about 1124, by Robert Bossu, Earl of Leicester, which, falling into decay from the inadequacy of its endowment, was suppressed in 1494, and annexed to the collegiate church at Windsor; but in 1500 it was given to the abbot and convent of Westminster by Henry VII., who was then building the chapel still known by his name. In the reign of Edward IV. its possessions were valued at £19. 19. 2. per annum. A farm-house occupies the site of the conventual buildings, of which no traces remain.

LUFFINCOTT, a parish in the hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, county of DEVON, 7 miles (S. by W.) from Holsworthy, containing 90 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of J. Venner and J. Spettigue, Esqrs. The church is dedicated to St. James.

LUFTON, a parish in the hundred of STONE, county of SOMERSET, 3 miles (W.) from Yeovil, containing 21 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £5. 7. $8\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of John Phelips, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

LUGWARDINE, a parish in the hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Hereford, containing 618 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Ballingham, Little Dewchurch, Hentland, Langarrin, and St. Weonard, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £22. 7. 1. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LUKE (ST.), a chapelry in the hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 3 miles (N.N.W.) from Midhurst.

LUKE'S (ST.), a parish in the Finsbury division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, comprising the liberties of the City-road, East Finsbury, West Finsbury, Golden-lane, Old-street, and Whitecross-street, and containing 40,876 inhabitants. The earliest notice of this district occurs in its connexion with the "Eald," or Old street, by which the Saxons designated the Roman military way from the western extremity of the metropolis, without the great fen, which is stated to have given name to Fensbury, now Finsbury, and to Moorfields: this road is said to have extended from London Wall to Hoxton, and to have been continued through the churchyard of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, and through the parish of Bethnal Green, to the Old Ford near Hackney. The southern part of the fen was gradually raised by various deposits, and particularly by many hundred cart-loads of bones removed from the charnel-house of St. Paul's, by order of the Duke of Somerset, when Protector; whence it obtained the name of Bonehill (now Bunhill) Fields: a portion of the site was appropriated by the city as a cemetery during the plague in 1665, and is now a burial-ground. Another portion of the same fields, was formed into a place of exercise for the practice of archery, by the corporation of the City of London, in 1498: it was subsequently let in trust to Sir Paul Pindar, and appropriated in 1641 as a place of exercise for the City train bands, it is now enclosed by buildings, and is the property of the Hon. the Artillery Company, who, during the late war, formed a very efficient regiment, equipped at their own expense: they continue to muster occasionally; and have an armoury, a mess-room, and other apartments, forming a handsome and substantial building, in front of which is a spacious plot of ground for field exercise, from which circumstance it has obtained the name of the "Artillery Ground." In Golden-lane was the original play-house of Al-leyn, founder of Dulwich College, of which the front, bearing the royal arms, is still remaining. This district was anciently part of the parish of Cripplegate, the church of which being found inadequate to the accommodation of the parishioners, a new church, dedicated to St. Luke, was erected in Old-street by the commissioners for building new churches in the reign of Queen Anne, who assigned to it the present district, which, after the completion of the church, was laid out in numerous streets and squares, covered with buildings in every direction, and has become one of the most extensive and populous parishes in the suburbs of the metropolis. Peerless Pool, called by Stowe "Perilous" Pool, and in 1743 converted into one of the largest swimming-baths in the kingdom, surrounded with spacious gardens, and fitted up with every accommodation, is now used for bathing alone; the site of the gardens is occupied by ranges of modern buildings. Bath-street has been erected on the site of the ancient Pesthouse-row, where was one of the lazarettos in the time of the plague. To the west of Bunhill-row was the lord mayor's "Dog house," or kennel for the city hounds, the site of which is occupied by part of Featherstone-street; and at Mount Mill, near the upper end of Goswell-street, now levelled and covered with buildings, was one of the bastions erected by the parliamentarians, in 1643, for the greater security of the metropolis.

The parish is well paved, lighted with gas, and supplied with water by the New River Company. The City of London Gas Company have one of their establishments in Brick-lane, in this parish. Since the formation of the Regent's canal, extensive lime, timber, and coal wharfs have been established on its banks; and within the parish are various cooperages, a brewery, an indigo manufactory, and a rope-walk, all on an extensive scale. The city basin, communicating with the Regent's canal, crosses the city road, and forms a grand dépôt for merchandise forwarded by water to every part of the kingdom; the principal carriers have large wharfs and warehouses on the banks, of which those belonging to Messrs. Pickford and Co. are the most extensive. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's. The church, built in 1732, is a plain substantial edifice of stone, in the Grecian style of architecture, with a lofty steeple in the form of a fluted obelisk, the only steeple of the kind in the metropolis: the interior is neatly arranged, and the galleries are supported by Ionic pillars separating the nave from the aisles. The churchyard is spacious, and behind it is an additional cemetery of considerable extent; in the former are the tombs of the Caslons, eminent type-founders in the parish, and in the latter are numerous gravestones inscribed with crosses. St. John's church, in King's-square, a neat edifice of brick, with a stone portico of the Ionic order, surmounted by a slender spire, was erected, in 1823, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £12,853. 3. 3., and contains one thousand six hundred and eight sittings, of which nine hundred and seventeen are free. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists. Of these, the Tabernacle was erected by the Rev. G. Whitefield, the founder of the Calvinistic Methodists, in which he himself for some time preached. That belonging to the Wesleyan Methodists was the chapel of the Rev. J. Wesley, founder of the sect, who was interred behind it in 1791, and by whom it was built, on the site of the City foundry which was used for casting cannon so late as 1715. In front of the latter is Tindal's, or Bunhill-fields, burial-ground. The dues for interments are received by the corporation of the City of London, who appoint a sexton resident on the spot. The number of persons interred here annually, average from one thousand two hundred to one thousand five hundred, chiefly dissenters: among the numerous distinguished non-conformist divines, may be enumerated Mr. John Bunyan, author of the Pilgrim's Progress, who died in 1688; Dr. Williams, founder of the Dissenters' Library, in Red-cross-street, who died in 1716; Dr. Isaac Watts, the poet, logician, and divine, who died in 1748; the Rev. Dr. Neale, author of the History of the Puritans, who died in 1765; Dr. Lardner, author of the Credibility of the Gospel History, who died in 1768; Dr. Gill, who died in 1771; Dr. Richard Price, an eminent mathematician, author of Reversionary Payments, &c., who died in 1791; the Rev. Theophilus Lindsey, who died in 1808; Dr. A. Rees, editor of the Encyclopædia, who died in 1825; the Rev. John Townsend, founder of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, who died in 1826; and various others, distinguished either by their preaching or their writings. In Milton-street (formerly Grub-street) so called from having been the residence of that eminent poet, is a building named the Pantheon, formerly known as the City chapel, having belonged to a congregation of Independents, but now used as a theatre for dramatic exhibitions of an inferior description, and for occasional lectures. The parochial school for boys was established in 1698, and that for girls in 1761; the school-house in Golden-lane was built in 1780: these schools were erected, and are supported, by subscription, and by a fund of £6,500 three per cent. consols., which has arisen from benefactions and savings. There are in them one hundred boys and one hundred girls, who are completely clothed, and with the former an apprentice fee of £2 is given on their leaving school. John Fuller, in 1723, bequeathed £1600 Bank stock for the instruction and clothing of boys, in consideration of which, twenty boys are admitted into the parochial school. The free school, founded by William Warral in 1689, and formerly in Goat-alley, was, in 1808, removed to Baltic-street, Golden-lane: it has an endowment producing about £300 per annum, which is appropriated to the clothing and instruction of forty boys in reading, writing, and arithmetic: the master, who is appointed by the trustees, has a salary of £80 per annum. The Haberdashers' Company have a house and premises in Bunhill-row, in which a considerable number of boys are instructed on the Lancasterian system: the master resides in the house. A Lancasterian school for boys was established in North-street, City-road, in 1813, and another for girls in 1820: in these schools nearly one thousand children are instructed. The orphan working-school, in the City-road, was instituted in 1760, at Hoxton, by subscription, chiefly among the Protestant dissenters, and removed to this place in 1773, when the trustees erected the present commodious building, upon a site of land containing six acres, which they purchased for that purpose: the funds of the institution, arising from legacies and benefactions, produce a revenue of £718 per annum, which, with the amount of annual subscriptions, is appropriated to the maintenance, clothing, and education, of orphan children, who are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic: the boys are also taught the making of nets and shoes, and the girls, needlework, knitting, and household work, and on leaving the school, are placed out apprentices, or in service: the building, which is substantial, contains every requisite accommodation for the purposes of the institution, and a neat chapel in which divine service is occasionally performed, it being open to the public on Sunday evenings during Summer: there are forty-five boys and forty-six girls in the school, which is adapted to the reception of one hundred.

St. Luke's hospital, for lunatics, was originally built on the north side of Moorfields, as an auxiliary to Bethlehem hospital, and established on a system free from several of the objections to which that institution was then liable. The present spacious and elegant building was erected by subscription, at an expense of £55,000: it is of brick, ornamented with stone, and consists of a centre and two wings, four hundred and ninety-three feet in length, of proportionate depth, and three stories high, exclusively of the basement story, and an attic in the centre and at the extremity of each wing: it contains apartments for the master, matron, and attendants, a spacious committee-room, and galleries in the east and west wings for the reception of three hundred patients of both sexes, who are classed according to the nature and degree of their malady: the average number of patients is one hundred and ten males, and one hundred and fifty-three females, who are treated with humane and skilful attention, and provided with every comfort consistent with their security and the promotion of their cure. Almshouses for eight aged women, who receive each an annual allowance of £16, paid quarterly, and a chaldron of coal, were founded, in 1650, by Mrs Susan Amias, who erected eight distinct dwellings on the north side of Old-street, which, though becoming old, are still in good repair: the income arising from the endowment exceeds £220 per annum. Edward Allen, founder of Dulwich College, erected ten almshouses, in Pesthouse-row, now Bath-street, for five aged men and five aged women of this parish, of whom, as vacancies occurred, one widower and two widows were to be removed to Dulwich; the inmates are, however, solely supported by the income arising from subsequent benefactions, the funds of the college not being legally available in any respect to the maintenance of this charity. Six almshouses were founded in the City-road by the Dyers' Company, in 1776; and six by the Girdlers' Company, which latter were rebuilt in 1741; and there are four almshouses founded by the Ironmongers' Company, in Mitchell-court, Old-street, which were rebuilt in 1811, pursuant to the will of Thomas Lewer, Esq., for four aged men, who receive £10 per annum and a chaldron of coal each. The French hospital in Bath-street, for the maintenance and support of French Protestants, was incorporated in the reign of George I.: it is a substantial building of brick, occupying three sides of a quadrangular area, the centre of which is laid out in gardens: the premises contain apartments for the master; a committee-room; and tenements for the aged of both sexes, who are clothed and supplied with every necessary comfort; a chapel, and a room for the temporary confinement of lunatics: the establishment is under the superintendence of a president and committee, chiefly of the descendants of French families. The city of London lying-in hospital, originally instituted in 1771, in Shaftesbury house, Aldersgate-street, and subsequently removed to its present situation, is a neat building of brick, ornamented with stone, consisting of a centre, surmounted by an open turret and a spire, and two wings, and containing apartments with every accommodation for the patients, in addition to which is a handsome chapel; behind the building are gardens pleasantly laid out: this institution, which is supported by subscription, constitutes also a school of midwifery, to which female pupils only are admitted. There are numerous charitable bequests for distribution among the poor of this extensive and populous parish.

LULLINGSTANE, formerly a parish, but now united to Lullingstone, in the hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT. The living was a discharged vicarage: the church is demolished.

LULLINGSTONE, a parish in the hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, 7 miles (S.E. by E.) from Foot's Cray, containing 41 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Lullingstane, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £7. 16. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir Thomas Dyke, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Botolph, is situated in the park: it is a small but neat edifice, the nave and chancel being separated by a richly-carved screen supporting the rood-loft, which is yet in good preservation, and the windows exhibiting a series of scriptural representations in beautiful stained glass; it also contains several fine monuments. Roman bricks, coins, military weapons, with part of a tessellated pavement, have been ploughed up here.

LULLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Burton upon Trent, containing, with the township of Coton in the Elmes, 586 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £4. 11. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Lullington, written in Domesday-book Lullitune, had a priest, a church, and a mill, at the time of the Norman survey. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

LULLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of FROME county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Frome, containing 224 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant. Richard H. Cox, Esq. was patron in 1807. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has some Norman portions, and some of later style.

LULLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of ALCISTON, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Seaford, containing 39 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 11., endowed with £1400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chichester. The parish is bounded on the west by Cuckmere river.

LULLWORTH (EAST), a parish in the hundred of WINFRITH, Blandford (South) division of the county of DORSET, 6 miles (S. W.) from Wareham, containing 353 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £11. 14. 7., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The King presented by lapse in 1787. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, contains some ancient memorials of the family of Newburgh, descendants of the Earls of Warwick of the Norman line, who, in the reign of Edward I., succeeded the De Lolleworths, possessors of the place from an early period: it afterwards came to the Howards, Earls of Suffolk, one of whom, in 1588, on the site of an ancient castle, laid the foundation of the present noble castle of Lullworth, which was completed in 1641, and then purchased by the family of Weld: it is a massive structure, forming an exact cube of eighty feet, with a circular embattled tower rising sixteen feet above the battlements of the walls, and the east front decorated with the arms of Weld, several fine statues, and two inscriptions commemorating the visits of George III. and his Royal consort in 1789. Near the castle is a circular Roman Catholic chapel, of elegant architecture, erected several years since by Thomas Weld, Esq., and fitted up with much taste and magnificence. This stately edifice was appropriated as the temporary residence of Charles X., his family, and suite, on the expulsion of that monarch from the throne of France, and prior to his seeking an abode in some of the continental states. Dr. Weld, the present proprietor, has been lately raised to the dignity of cardinal in the church of Rome. He liberally received many exiles at the period of the first French revolution, who formed a religious fraternity on his estate here, of the order of La Trappe, which returned to the continent at the general peace. Within the parish are many vestiges of antiquity, principally barrows found to contain human and other skeletons, rude urns, trinkets, &c., supposed to be British, from the coarseness of the urns and the absence of all Roman relics: on one of these, a lofty hill termed Flower's Barrow, is a triple intrenchment, called the British Camp, enclosing an area of about five acres, to which there are two entrances, one on the south-east, the other on the south-west.

LULLWORTH (WEST), a parish in the liberty of BINDON, though locally in the hundred of Winfrith, Blandford (South) division of the county of DORSET, 8 miles (S. W.) from Wareham, containing 365 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Winfred-Newburgh, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol. The chapel is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. Lullworth Cove is a great natural curiosity, into which the sea flows through a wide gap in the cliff, of sufficient depth for vessels of eighty tons' burden. The surrounding rocks, rising to an immense height, are singularly undermined and perforated by the constant lashing of the waves, which keep up a continual and terrific roar. The "Arched Rock," about a mile from the Cove, has an opening of about twenty feet high, through which the sea presents a peculiarly grand appearance. Among these rocks, which seem to exhibit some awful convulsion of nature, the razor-bill and puffin lay their eggs, the collecting of which forms part of the support of the country people, who trust themselves at the end of a rope, at the hazard of instant destruction.

LULSLEY, a chapelry in the parish of SUCKLEY, upper division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, county of WORCESTER, 7½ miles (W. by N.) from Worcester, containing 120 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Giles.

LUMBY, a joint township with Huddleston, in the parish of SHERBURN, upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, 4½ miles (N.) from Ferry-Bridge. The population is returned with Huddleston.

LUMLEY (GREAT), a chapelry in that part of the parish of CHESTER le STREET which is in the northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 5½ miles (N. by E.) from Durham, containing 1240 inhabitants, who are principally employed in the mines, this being the centre of an immense coal district. There are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. An hospital, forming a quadrangle, was founded in 1685, by Sir John Duck, for twelve poor women, with a weekly allowance of one shilling each, to whom a master reads prayers daily. The endowment is about £40 per annum. The remains of the ancient hall have been converted into a granary.

LUMLEY (LITTLE), a township in that part of the parish of CHESTER le STREET which is in the northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Durham, containing 351 inhabitants. On a fine eminence, sloping to the northern bank of the river Wear, stands the stately castle of Lumley, erected in the reign of Edward I., by Robert de Lumley, an ancestor of the Earls of Scarborough: it is built of yellow freestone, in a quadrangular form, having at each corner an octangular machicolated turret: the eastern part only retains its ancient appearance.

LUND, a chapelry in the parish of KIRKHAM, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2½ miles (E. by S.) from Kirkham, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £1200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Kirkham.

LUND, a parish in the Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Beverley, containing 357 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 0½., and endowed with £200 royal bounty. J. Blanchard, sen., Esq. was patron in 1827. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

LUND, a joint township with Cliff, in the parish of HEMINGBROUGH, wapentake of OUZE and DERWENT, East riding of the county of YORK, 3¼ miles (E.) from Selby. The population is returned with Cliff. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Aysgarth.

LUNDY-ISLAND, in the hundred of BRAUNTON, county of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ leagues (N. W. by N.) from Hartland Point, and 4 (N.) from Clovelly. It is situated in the mouth of the Bristol channel, is upwards of three miles in length, and nearly one in breadth, containing about two thousand acres, of which not more than four hundred are in cultivation, and is so defended by lofty and precipitous rocks, as to be inaccessible, except at a small beach on the eastern side, where there is a tolerably good landing-place, secured by the Isle of Rats. The more elevated ground, rising eight hundred feet above the level of the sea, commands extensive prospects of the English and Welch coasts; and at the northern extremity of the island is a high pyramidal rock, called the Constable. Plantations of various trees have been formed here at considerable labour and expense, but the prevalence of strong north-easterly winds has hitherto stunted their growth. A few cattle, goats, and sheep, are fed on the island, but the last have not been known to thrive. Domestic fowls and rabbits are plentiful, though the rats which infest the place destroy great numbers. There are ruins of an ancient chapel, which was dedicated to St. Anne. From the quantities of human bones frequently ploughed up, and some remaining vestiges of ancient cultivation, there are evident proofs of its having been formerly much more populous. It is recorded that one Morisco, having been frustrated in a conspiracy to assassinate Henry III., made this his retreat, became the chief of a band of pirates, and for his crimes was executed here by command of the king: and also that Edward II., at one time during his disturbed reign, proposed retiring hither for safety from his rebellious nobles. Morisco's castle, situated near the south-eastern point, was originally a strong fortification, with considerable outworks: it is encompassed by a moat, but no ordnance are now mounted upon the battery, though a few dismounted guns occupy the ramparts, beneath which is a remarkable cave. In the parliamentary war, Lord Saye and Sele held it for Charles I.; and in the reign of William and Mary, the French seized it by stratagem, and maintained themselves in it a considerable time.

LUNE-DALE, a township in the parish of ROMALD-KIRK, western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 11 miles (N. W. by W.) from Barnard-Castle, containing 265 inhabitants. At Laith, in this township, there is a chapel of ease to the parish church. An annuity of £10 is paid by the trustees of the late Earl of Strathmore to a schoolmaster, for teaching twenty-five children.

LUNT, a township in the parish of SEPHTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Liverpool, containing 75 inhabitants.

LUPPITT, a parish in the hundred of AXMINSTER, county of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Honiton, containing 739 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. John Eyde, Esq. and others were patrons in 1809. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has a stone screen and font in the early English style. Here are remains of the ancient residence of the Mohuns; they were succeeded by the Carews, who added a chapel to the mansion, and endowed it with £3. 6. 8. a year. On the brow of a hill within the parish is an old fortification, called Dumpton Fort.

LUPTON, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-LONSDALE, LONSDALE ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale, containing, with the hamlet of Cowbrow, 221 inhabitants.

LURGASALL, a parish in the hundred of ROTHERBRIDGE, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Petworth, containing 664 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Earl of Egremont.

LUSBY, a parish in the eastern division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Spilsby, containing 126 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 14. R. C. Brackenbury, Esq. was patron in 1780. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LUSTLEIGH, a parish in the hundred of TEINGBRIDGE, county of DEVON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Chudleigh, containing 325 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £16. 7. 6. The Earl of Ilchester and the Hon. P. C. Wyndham were patrons in 1791. In the church are a wooden screen and three stone stalls, with the effigies of a knight and his lady; and the windows exhibit some remains of ancient stained glass. In a lane near the church is "Bishop's Stone," a block of granite, five feet high, the remains of an ancient cross.

LUSTON, a township in the parish of EYE, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Leominster, containing 400 inhabitants. There are some fine hop and fruit plantations within the township.

LUTON, a parish in the hundred of FLITT, county of BEDFORD, comprising the market town of Luton, and the hamlets of East and West Hyde, Leegrave, or Lightgrave, Limbury with Biscott, and Stopsley, and containing 4529 inhabitants, of which number, 2986 are in the town of Luton, 20 miles (S. by E.) from Bedford, and 31 (N. W. by N.) from London. The name of this place is a corruption either of Lea-town, and thus derived from the river Lea, which takes its rise in the neighbourhood; or of Low-town, and is in that case descriptive of the relative position of the town with regard to the gentle eminences by which it is surrounded. At the Conquest, Luton was held in royal demesne; and in 1216 it came into the possession of Baron Fulk de Brent, who built a strong castle here: in the reign of Henry VI., the manor belonged to John, Lord Wenlock, a celebrated partizan in the contests between the houses of York and Lancaster, slain in the battle of Tewkesbury, who had erected a handsome sepulchral chapel on the north side of the church, and commenced building a stately mansion, the portico belonging to which is still standing in the park of Luton Hoo. On the 8th of July, 1828, the town suffered extensive injury from an inundation occasioned by heavy and continued torrents of rain, and so rapid was the increase of the flood that many persons with great difficulty escaped with their lives. The town is situated between two hills, on the river Lea: from the market-house, which stands in the centre, three streets diverge obliquely, which are neither lighted nor paved; the inhabitants are well supplied with water from the river. The manufacture of straw-plat is carried on to a very great extent, and it is said to produce a greater proportion of that article than any other town in the county; the proprietor of one of these establishments has recently obtained a patent for the manufacture of Tuscan grass plat, which is here wrought into hats and bonnets: there are two good malting-houses in the town. The market, which is plentifully supplied with corn and straw-plat, is on Monday: fairs are held April 18th and October 18th, for cattle; and there is a statute fair in September. A court leet is held annually, under the Marquis of Bute, as lord of the manor, at which a high constable and two day constables are appointed.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £35. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, exhibits some fine specimens of the decorated and later styles of English architecture: it has at the west end a handsome embattled tower of flint and freestone in chequers, with an hexagonal turret at each corner, and a doorway, the mouldings of which are peculiarly beautiful: in the interior are vestiges of much earlier date than its general character indicates, especially in the north aisle, which contains a fine pier in the early style of English architecture: the western door is remarkable for some very good panelling, and in the chancel are some stalls in the later style: a few of the windows have remains of stained glass, and in the east window is a representation of St. George and the dragon. There are also some curious monuments, and a monumental chapel; but the chief object of attraction is a baptistry chapel, of decorated character, with pointed arches, terminating in elegant tabernacle-work, and containing a stone font supported on five pillars. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyan Methodists. Sundry benefactions for the instruction of children, amounting annually to the sum of £31. 18. 4., are now applied towards the support of a National school, in which three hundred children are educated; it is further supported by voluntary contributions. In 1736, the sum of £10 per annum was bequeathed by Thomas Long, for apprenticing poor boys. At the principal entrance to the town are twelve almshouses, which were erected in 1808, for the residence of twenty-four poor widows, who receive the weekly sum of four shillings each. In the private chapel at Luton Hoo, the seat of the Marquis of Bute, in this parish, there is very fine carved screen-work, in the later style of English architecture, which originally formed the interior decoration of a chapel erected at Tittenhanger, by Sir Thomas Pope, about the middle of the sixteenth century. The Rev. John Pomfret, author of a poem entitled "The Choice," and other popular pieces, was born here in 1668.

LUTTERWORTH, a market town and parish, in the hundred of GUTHLAXTON, county of LEICESTER, 13 miles (S. by W.) from Leicester, and 89½ (N. W. by N.) from London, on the high road to Lichfield, Chester, and Liverpool, containing 2102 inhabitants. This place was formerly noted for the peculiar vassalage of the tenants of the manor, who were obliged to grind their corn at one particular mill of the lord, and their malt at another, so lately as the year 1758, when they obtained a decision at the Leicester assizes empowering them to erect mills, and to grind where they pleased. The town is situated on the small river Swift, which falls into the Avon. It is regularly built, and consists principally of one main street, from which some minor ones diverge: it is lighted by subscription, and paved by means of the proceeds of an ancient benefaction of land, now producing about £200 per annum, and under the management of two officers, called "Town Masters," who are annually chosen at the manorial court leet. The cotton and tammy manufactures were formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but the latter has been discontinued for many years, and the former declined about the year 1816; the present staple manufacture is coarse worsted hose, and a few ribands are also made. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on the Thursday after February 19th, April 2nd, Holy Thursday, and September 16th, for horses, cattle, and sheep; the last is also for cheese.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £26, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious and handsome structure, with a nave, aisles, and a chancel separated from the nave by a beautiful screen: the tower was originally surmounted by a spire, which fell down about a century ago, when four pinnacles were substituted. This edifice was repaired, beautified, and paved with chequered stone, about the year 1740, and the whole interior renovated, with the exception of the pulpit, which is a fine specimen of the early English style, of an hexagonal shape, composed of thick oak planks, with a seam of carved work in the joints, and possesses great interest, being the same in which the great reformer Wickliffe preached, he having been rector of this parish from 1374 to 1387, when he died, and was interred in the church; but, in the year 1428, his bones were disinterred by a mandate from the Pope, and publicly burnt, and the ashes thrown into the river. His portrait is preserved in the church, as well as the chair in which he died, and the communion cloth used by him, which is of purple velvet trimmed with gold. The Hon. and Rt. Rev. Henry Ryder, Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and formerly rector of this parish, in 1814, appropriated a library for the use of the parishioners, to be deposited in the church, with an allowance to the clerk to keep it in order. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school and almshouse were founded and endowed by means of a bequest of £200 from the Rev. Edward Sherrier: the master receives a salary, and four almsmen 7s. each per week. A charitable benefaction from Robert Boles, for educating and apprenticing six poor boys, amounts to about £57 per annum; and one from Margaret Bent, for educating four boys, to about £14 per annum. Richard Elkington, of Shawell, by will dated May 29th, 1607, devised to the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses of Leicester, as trustees, the sum of £50, to be lent, in sums of £10 each, to five tradesmen of Lutterworth, for the term of one year, at the rate of five per cent., the interest to be divided among certain poor persons; in default of applications, the money was vested in land some years since, which was recently sold, under a decree of the court of Chancery, and produced £1000, that sum being now lent, in sums of £50, for three years, at three per cent. In the reign of John, an hospital for a master and brethren, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was founded and endowed by Roise de Verdon and Nicholas her son: at the dissolution it was valued at £26. 9. 5. per annum. There is a small petrifying spring in the vicinity.

LUTTLEY, a hamlet in that part of the parish of HALES-OWEN which is in the lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W.) from Hales-Owen, containing 185 inhabitants.

LUTTON, or LUDDINGTON, in the WOLD, a parish partly in the hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, county of HUNTINGDON, and partly in the hundred of WILLYBROOK, county of NORTHAMPTON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Oundle, containing 189 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with Washingley, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £21. 11. $5\frac{1}{2}$. Lord Sondes was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LUTTON (EAST and WEST), a township partly in the liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, and partly in the parish of WEAVERTHORPE, wapentake of BUCKROSE, East riding of the county of YORK, 11 miles (E. by S.) from New Malton, containing 311 inhabitants. At West Lutton is a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Weaverthorpe.

LUXBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of CARHAMPTON, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Dunster, containing 387 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Cutcombe, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £200 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Within the parish there are many tumuli, on opening some of which numerous urns, human bones, ashes, &c., have been found.

LUXULION, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Lostwithiel, containing 1276 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. J. C. Rashleigh, Esq. was patron in 1813. The church is dedicated to St. Cyricus and Julieta. A small school is supported by donations averaging about £6 per annum.

LYDBURY (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Bishop's Castle, comprising the townships of Acton, Brockton, Down, Eaton with Choulton, Eyton with Plowden, Lydbury, and Totterton, and containing 892 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Bright Bright, M.A. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. John Shipman, in 1661, bequeathed £200 towards the support of a free school. In Lower Down there are the remains of a strong encampment, the trenches of which are still very perfect. The rivers Onny and Kemp run through the parish. An ancient castle stood here, belonging to the bishops of Hereford, one of whom was presented by the jury, in the reign of Henry III., for suffering the escape of a prisoner thence. Plowden, who was a distinguished lawyer, and author of the Commentaries, resided at Plowden-hall, in this parish.

LYDD, a market town and parish, in the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, though locally in the hundred of Langport, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, 36 miles (S. E.) from Maidstone, and 70 (S. E. by E.) from London, containing 1437 inhabitants. This town is situated at the extremity of the county, near the point of land which forms the bay of Dengeness: the inhabitants are principally employed in fishing. The market is on Thursday; and a fair is held on the last Monday in July. It is a corporation by prescription, being a member of Romney, one of the cinque-ports, and is governed by a bailiff, jurats, and commonalty. The bailiff is coroner, and the jurats are justices of the peace, with exclusive jurisdiction, and have power to hold a general court of session, also a court of record for the recovery of debts to any amount. There is a small common gaol and house of correction. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £55. 12. 1. The church, which is dedicated to All Saints, is a spacious edifice of different dates; the tower is in the later style of English architecture, with crocketed pinnacles: it contains several monuments with brasses. There is a place of worship for Independents. On the point of land called Dengeness, a lighthouse, one hundred and ten feet in height, has been built, in lieu of an ancient one, and partly on the model of the Eddystone lighthouse, under the direction of the late Mr. James Wyatt, architect: this point is defended by a fort, and barracks were erected in the vicinity during the late war with France while under the control of the revolutionary government.

LYDDEN, a parish in the hundred of BEWSBOROUGH, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Dover, containing 149 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 6., endowed with £640 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the early style of English architecture. There are some traces of an ancient monastery in the farm-house called Swenton, in this parish, yet discoverable.

LYDE, a township in the parish of PIPE, hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Hereford. The population is returned with the parish.

LYDEARD (BISHOP'S), a parish in the western division of the hundred of KINGSBURY, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Taunton, containing, with the tythings of Bishop's Lydeard, Coombs-Ash, East Bagborough, East Coomb Hill, Lydeard-Punchardon, and Quantock, 1016 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £20. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Wells. The church is dedicated to St. Mary: in the churchyard there is an elegant cross. An almshouse, which was founded here in the reign of Charles I., by Sir Richard Grobham, is endowed with lands now producing an annual income of £20.

LYDEARD (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish in the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.E.) from Wiveliscombe, containing 618 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £22. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Robert Harvey, Esq.

LYDFORD, a parish in the hundred of LIFTON, county of DEVON, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Tavistock, containing 734 inhabitants. This place was anciently of some consequence, but in 997 it sustained severe injury from the Danes, who, after their destruction of Tavistock abbey, burnt forty of the houses in the town. In the reign of Edward the Confessor it is recorded as a borough, and had eight burgesses within the walls, and forty-one without: at the time of the Conquest, these had increased to one hundred and forty, the town was fortified, and considered of such importance as to be taxed on an equality with London. In 1238, the Forest of Dartmoor, and the castle of Lydford, were granted by the king to Richard, Earl of Cornwall, and the manor now belongs to the duchy. Situated in the centre of a mining district, Lydford was the great mart for tin, then the staple commodity of the county; and there are still extant a few pieces of money coined at the mint here, which is said to have existed in the time of Ethelred II. In the reign of Edward I. it twice sent members to parliament; and, in 1267, a weekly market was granted, also an annual fair for three days. The Stannary courts were held in this town till the close of the last century, and offenders against the Stannary laws were tried and imprisoned in a castle here, the dungeons of which have been considered scarcely less frightful than those of the Spanish inquisition. In 1512, Richard Strode, Esq., one of the members for Plympton, having asserted the injurious effects of the mine streams upon the harbour of Plymouth, was prosecuted by the tanners, and eventually confined for more than three weeks in Lydford castle, heavily ironed, and fed only upon bread and water: it was a common adage, that "Lydford law punished first and tried afterwards." Until the reign of Edward III., a gaol delivery took place here, but only once in ten years. In the latter part of the seventeenth century, the foundations of the town gates, and vestiges of the trenches were visible. The village now consists merely of a few dilapidated cottages. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totnes, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown, in right of the duchy of Cornwall. The church is dedicated to St. Petrock. The scenery which surrounds this village is of the most beautiful description. About a quarter of a mile southward is a small bridge of one arch, near which is a romantic fall of the river Lyd, the water of which may be seen rushing over the rugged bed of a narrow chasm of the depth of eighty feet. In a valley to the south-west is a fine cascade, and another to the east of the village, called Skart's Hole. The only remains of the castle are the shell of the keep, which is fifty feet square, and forty feet in height: it is situated on a mound at the eastern end of an area formerly surrounded by a wall and a ditch; the western side overlooks a narrow dell of considerable depth.

Dartmoor, a dreary but interesting waste, is said to comprise no less than one hundred and thirty thousand acres. According to Polwhele, Dartmoor was once peopled; and there are extant curious accounts of "winged serpents in the low, and wolves in the high, lands;" also "of a set of wild men inhabiting the verge of this great waste," who were remarkable for their swiftness. Near Whistman's wood may be found the roots of very large trees; and in draining the bogs, huge pieces of old timber have been discovered. The wild boar, bear, wolf, and moose deer, are said to have once abounded in this forest, when a peculiar species of hunting dog, called the Slough hound, was employed. On the surface of the moor are numerous clusters of rock, called tors. The granite here found is remarkable for the size of its feld-spar crystals. Among the rocks are observable numerous indications of this having been once the scene of Druidical sacrifices. On Crockern tor, the ancient Stannary court has been held within the memory of man; and till some years back, the president's chair, jurors' seats, and court table, were to be seen excavated in the moor-stone on its summit. Besides the latter, there are numerous other tors, crowning the loftier elevations of the moor: they exhibit immense masses of granite, observable at a great distance, and in many points of view commanding prospects of much variety and beauty. The general surface of this waste is rather undulating than abrupt, and varies in height from four hundred to two thousand one hundred feet above the sea: the mean height has been computed at one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two feet. It is twenty miles long, and, in some parts, eleven miles wide. In its numerous furrows are collected the waters which form the rivers Dart, Teign, Tavy, Taw, Plym, Cad, Erme, Yealm, and forty-eight minor streams. The soil is far better than that of mountainous districts generally. The higher elevations, indeed, are covered with an unproductive black earth, and in some of the lower spots the bogs are numerous; but, in many parts, there is good and sufficient soil for agricultural purposes, requiring only the assistance of manure, which may be now readily obtained by means of the rail-road communicating between Plymouth and the moor. The skirts and other portions of this district appertain to the surrounding manors, the lords of which claim the right of summer pasturage for as many head of cattle as they can maintain on their own estates through the winter: they are called Venville tenants. The duchy, however, is entitled to stock the forest by agistment. Those that pasture their cattle on the moor, not being Venville tenants, pay the lessees from two to three shillings a score for sheep and cattle. Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, about the year 1800, erected a mansion at Tor Royal, in the very heart of the forest, made extensive plantations, and much improved the land in the vicinity. In 1808, at his instigation, a prison was erected, for the reception of the numerous French captives that had hitherto crowded the prison ships at Plymouth. This immense building comprises, besides an hospital and dwellings for the petty officers, five rectangular edifices, each capable of holding nearly one thousand six hundred men. The governor's house adjoins the prison; and at the distance of a quarter of a mile are the barracks for the guards. For the supply of the prison, numerous tradesmen established themselves in the vicinity; a small town, called Prince Town, was soon formed, and a chapel built. At the close of the war, however, this town was deserted, and its present aspect is one of wretchedness. It is still thinly inhabited; but most of the houses are in a state of decay, and many in ruins. The minister of the chapel retains his appointment, and divine service is performed weekly. In 1819, an act of parliament was obtained for making the rail-road before alluded to; and a second and third act have been since granted for the purpose of extending and ramifying the line. From the granite works with which it is connected, great quantities of stone are being constantly forwarded to Plymouth; and the rail-wagons coming from that port are chiefly loaded with lime, manure, and coal. An inland wharf has been constructed near the end of the rail-road, which, if the immediate vicinity were more populous, would be of the greatest convenience. At Two Bridges, to the east of Prince Town, is held an annual cattle fair: it takes place on the first Wednesday after the 16th of August, and is well attended.

LYDFORD (EAST), a parish in the hundred of SOMERTON, though locally in that of Catsash, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Castle-Cary, containing 137 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £7. 9. 7., and in the patronage of Mrs. Rhoda Harbin. The old Roman Fosse-way skirts the western boundary of this parish.

LYDFORD (WEST), a parish in the hundred of CATSASH, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Castle-Cary, containing 437 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of West Lydford at Wells, rated in the king's books at £17. 13. 4. E. F. Colston, Esq. and others were patrons in 1810. Elizabeth Pope, in 1755, bequeathed £100, directing the interest to be applied for teaching six children, and to the poor. The old Roman Fosse-way passes through the parish.

LYDGATE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of ROCHDALE which is in the upper division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Oldham. The population is returned with Saddleworth. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £2000 parliamentary grant. The neighbourhood of Lydgate abounds with establishments connected with the manufacture of cloth, for an account of which see SADDLEWORTH.

LYDHAM, a parish partly in the hundred and county of MONTGOMERY, but chiefly in the hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Bishop's Castle, containing 225 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Rev. Herbert Oakeley. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The river Camlet takes its rise in this parish.

LYDIATE, a chapelry in the parish of HALSALL, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Ormskirk, containing 691 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Roman Catholics. In 1763, Philip Buckley conveyed to trustees a messuage and ground for a school-house: the master teaches four children for £4 per annum, received from Walker's charity. Mr. Gore, in 1825, bequeathed estates worth £90 per annum for the benefit of the poor. Within the chapelry are the ruins of an unfinished abbey.

LYDLINCH, a parish in the hundred of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of the county of DORSET, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Sturminster-Newton, containing 364 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £14. 5. 10. John Fane, Esq., and another were patrons in 1818. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas.

LYE-WASTE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of OLD SWINFORD which is in the lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Stourbridge. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel was erected by the late Thomas Hill, Esq., and is licensed, but not consecrated; it is calculated to contain about two thousand persons: the appointment of the minister belongs to the Hill family. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. The village derives its distinguishing name from having been erected on the waste, and consists of numerous cottages, chiefly inhabited by workmen employed in the iron and coal works, &c., with which the district abounds. Several of the inhabitants are engaged in making nails, this being a species of manufacture which extends through a wide district, including the towns of Stourbridge and Dudley, and their neighbourhoods, which, abounding to a great extent in coal and iron-ore, afford the necessary materials for this branch of business; the nails being afterwards dispersed over all parts of the kingdom.

LYFORD, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WEST HANNEY which is in the hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, 4 miles (N.) from Wantage, containing 133 inhabitants. An almshouse for ten poor aged persons, who are to be elected from Lyford, or one of the Hannings, was founded here in 1603, by Oliver Ashcombe, Esq., formerly chief proprietor of Lyford; eight of the inmates receive an allowance of 4s. each per week, and the other two 3s. 6d. each.

LYME-HANDLEY, a township in the parish of PRESTBURY, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Macclesfield, containing 253 inhabitants. Lyme Hall, the principal seat of the family of Legh, is a quadrangular building of white grit-stone: the more ancient part of it was erected about the end of the reign of Elizabeth; the south and west fronts are of the Ionic order, from a design by Leoni. In the park there are deer, the flesh of which is of a superior flavour and quality, produced, probably, by the peculiar nature of the herbage upon which they feed.

LYME-REGIS, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the liberty of Lothersand Bothenhamp-ton, Bridport division of the county of Dorset, 22 miles (W.) from Dorchester, and 144 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 2269 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the river Lyme, on which it is situated. In 774, Cynewulf, King of the West Saxons, granted by charter "the land of one mansion near the west bank of the river Lim, not far from the place where it falls into the sea, to the abbey of Sherborne, that salt should be there boiled to supply the wants of the church." In Domesday-book Lyme is surveyed in three parcels, one belonging to the Bishop of Salisbury, a second to Glastonbury abbey, and the third to William Belet, one of the king's servants. Edward I. gave to it the privileges of a borough and port, and assigned it as part of the dower of his sister, Margaret, Queen of Scotland. It furnished Edward III. with four ships and sixty-two men for the siege of Calais, but afterwards became so impoverished, that, in Camden's time, it was little better than a fishing-town. In the early part of the last century it was in a flourishing state, and had all the conveniences of a harbour, by means of an artificial breakwater, called the Cobb. During the civil war in the time of Charles I., Lyme was a station of considerable importance to both parties; it was early fortified by the parliament, and, notwithstanding that it sustained a siege by Prince Maurice, always remained in their possession. The first engagement of the English fleet with the Spanish Armada, in 1558, took place off this part of the coast, and, in 1672, another, between the English and Dutch fleets, occurred, when the latter, being beaten, retired to the coast of France. Cosmo de Medici, Duke of Tuscany, on his visit to England, in 1669, landed at Lyme; as did also the Duke of Monmouth, in 1685: he erected his standard and read his declaration in the market-place; but was soon after defeated at Sedgemore, whereupon twelve or thirteen of his adherents, who were condemned at Dorchester, by Judge Jefferies, were executed here.

The town is situated at that extremity of the county which borders on Devonshire, between two rocky hills, and is divided by the river Lyme, which rises about two miles northward. One part of it, occupying a steep declivity, has a very striking appearance, the houses rising above each other in succession; whilst the other, near the sea, is so low as to be subject to repeated inundations from the spring-tides: the shore is bold and rugged; the streets are well paved and lighted, and the houses, many of which are handsome, are built of a kind of stone called blue lias, and covered with slate. Recent improvements induce the expectation that Lyme will become a fashionable bathing-place; the accommodations for visitors are good, and there are handsome assembly, billiard, and card rooms, with a good library: the surrounding scenery is remarkably fine. It formerly carried on a considerable trade with France, Spain, and the West Indies, which has greatly declined: a few vessels are fitted out for the Newfoundland fishery, and there is some trade with the Mediterranean ports. In a return made to the Exchequer in the 31st of Charles II., Lyme is represented to be a member of the port of Poole. The vessels belonging to it are chiefly employed in what is termed "the seeking trade." A packet sails to Guernsey once a fortnight. The harbour, or Cobb, which forms the only safe shelter for vessels between it and the Start point of Portland, is about a quarter of a mile west-south-west from the town, and existed so early as the time of Edward III.: it was originally composed of vast pieces of rock, rudely piled on each other, but is now a work of regular masonry, consisting of two artificial piers, projecting on each side, and enclosing a basin; it is six hundred and eighty feet in length, twelve in breadth at the foundation, and sixteen in height: it was partially rebuilt in 1825, at an expense of £17,337. 0. 9½. Various acts have been passed for its maintenance; by one of Charles II., £100 per annum out of the customs were allowed for its repair, which grant is still in force: two Cobb-wardens are chosen annually by the inhabitants. The number of vessels which entered from foreign parts in 1826, was thirty-four British, and four foreign; and the number of those which cleared outwards, thirty-two British, and four foreign. Sixteen vessels were built and registered here in 1824, six in 1825, and eight in 1826; and in March 1828, there were belonging to the port thirteen vessels of more than one hundred tons' burden, and twenty-six of smaller size. The dues of the harbour belong to the town, and among the privileges attached to it is the exemption of its vessels from the payment of duties in the harbours of Dover, Rye, and Ramsgate. The custom-house, a modern brick building, supported by columns, is northward of the Cobb-gate; beneath it is the market-place. The manufacture of woollen cloth is carried on in the vicinity. The markets are on Tuesday and Friday; and fairs are held on February 13th and October 2nd, for cattle, &c.

Corporate Seal.

Lyme was originally incorporated by Edward I., and its privileges have been confirmed and augmented by succeeding monarchs, particularly by Henry VIII. A court of pie-powder was granted to the mayor and burgesses by Mary, and a new charter by Elizabeth, to which various privileges were added by James I., Charles I., and William III.

The municipal body consists of a mayor and fifteen capital burgesses, assisted by a recorder, town clerk, and other officers: the capital burgesses are chosen from among the freemen. The mayor and two burgesses are justices of the peace, the retiring mayor becoming justice for one year, and the year following he is both justice and coroner. The magistrates for the borough hold a court of session quarterly, in January, April, July, and October, and there is within their jurisdiction a small gaol, but no trials have occurred for several years. They have also power, under the charter of Edward I., to hold a court of hustings weekly; but about forty years have elapsed since the last was held. The royalty of the manor is vested in the corporation, and a manorial court is held twice a year. Lyme has returned members to parliament, with only three intermissions, since the 23rd of Edward I.: the right of election has been much litigated, but in 1785 it was decided, by a select committee of the House of Commons, to be "in the freemen only, as well non-resident as resident;" an indefinite number of freemen is elected, and admitted to the freedom of the borough, by a majority of the corporation; the present number is about fifty: the mayor is the returning officer.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Lyme-Regis and Halstock in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 5. 7½., and alternately in the patronage of the Prebendary and of the lessee tenant. The church, which is dedicated to St. Michael the Archangel, is an ancient structure, with portions in the decorated and later styles, and consisting of a nave, chancel, and two side aisles, both which are embattled on the outside, and at the upper end of each are three or four steps, appearing to have been ascents to an altar; one of these aisles was formerly dedicated to the Virgin Mary. At the entrance to the belfry is a large and lofty stone building, like a porch, over which is a room, used for a school, and bearing date 1720. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. Here are two almshouses, founded in 1548, by John Tudbolt. A convent of Carmelite friars formerly existed here; and in the fourteenth century there was likewise an hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Mary and the Holy Ghost. Some fine specimens of antediluvian remains have been found in the vicinity, and are deposited in the British Museum: they are considered to be the bones of the Ichthyosauri and Plesiosauri. Among the natives of this place was Captain Thomas Coram, to whom the "Foundling Hospital" owes its origin, who was born about 1668, and died in 1751; and Sir George Summers, the celebrated admiral, who discovered the Bermuda Islands.

LYMINGE, a parish in the hundred of LONINGBOROUGH, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, 4½ miles (N.) from Hythe, containing, with the extra-parochial liberty of Lyminge, 718 inhabitants. The living comprises a rectory and vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury; the rectory, a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £21. 10., and the vicarage, with the curacies of Paddlesworth and Stanford, at £10. 18. 9. The Rev. Ralph Price was patron in 1811. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Eadburgh. In 1661, Timothy Bedingfield, devised lands and tenements to trustees for the education and maintenance of poor children belonging to the parishes of Lyminge, Dymchurch, and Smeeth, not receiving parochial relief; also to apprentice, or assist them at the Universities, at the discretion of the trustees: the annual income is £111. 10.: from five to nine children have been annually clothed and educated; one is apprenticed every year, and a fund is reserved for such as may be sent to the University, or otherwise require aid. In 1817, William Kingsford bequeathed two rent-charges of £5 each for instructing children of the parishes of Lyminge and Paddlesworth in reading and the church catechism: the master receives a salary of £10 per annum. The ancient Stanestreet traces the western boundary of this parish.

LYMINGTON, a borough, market town, parochial chapelry, and liberty, in the New Forest (East) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 18 miles (S. W. by S.) from Southampton, and 95 (S. W.) from London, containing 3164 inhabitants. The earliest notice of this place is in Domesday-book, in which it is called Lentune, afterwards Limintun, of which its present name is a variation. The town is situated on the western bank of a creek, or river, which falls into the Solent channel: it consists principally of one spacious street, nearly half a mile in length, and the houses are modern and neatly built: the environs abound with picturesque and romantic scenery. Its excellent accommodations for sea-bathing have rendered it a favourite place of resort for invalids during the summer: there are two bathing establishments; those near the town having fallen into decay, it is contemplated to erect more substantial and commodious rooms in their stead; the others, about half a mile distant, are much frequented. A neat theatre is occupied, every alternate year, by a respectable company of performers, from August to October; and there is a commodious assembly-room at the Angel Inn. In the reign of Henry I. this town first rose into note, having then been made a port, and French wines and other foreign commodities were imported: at that time also it first became celebrated for its salt-works. In the time of Edward III., the petty duties were levied by the inhabitants on certain articles of merchandise brought to this port, but the right to such an impost being questioned by the superior port of Southampton, the case was tried in 1329, and decided against the inhabitants of Lymington, who were subsequently often fined for persisting in their claim. At length, in 1730, having again taken these duties, and being sued by the mayor and corporation of Southampton, the defendants procured the removal of the cause to the county assize court, in which they obtained a verdict in their favour, and since that time the petty customs have been regularly paid here. The commercial advantages of this port were seriously affected, about ninety years ago, by the construction of a dam, or causeway, to the north of the town, the effect of which has been so to contract the channel of the river, and to diminish its depth, by excluding a great body of water, that it is now navigable only for vessels of three hundred tons' burden, instead of five hundred, as formerly: the trade, which is confined to coasting (no foreign vessels being allowed to land their cargoes here), consists principally in the exportation of salt, bricks, timber, and brooms, and its chief imports are coal, corn, and stone: the only duties receivable at the custom-house, which is in Quay-street, are on coal and slate. The manufacture of salt, both common, or bay salt, and medicinal, or Epsom salt, which formerly produced an extensive coasting and foreign trade, has greatly declined, Liverpool and other places having become successful rivals in this branch of business, although the superiority of the Lymington salt is generally acknowledged:

the works are situated along the sea-shore, at a short distance from the town, opposite to Hurst castle. On the quay are a commodious public wharf and store-rooms. Near it is a yard for ship-building, in which several fine yachts and other small vessels have been constructed. During the winter season, from twenty to forty sail of outward-bound vessels are often anchored here at one time, paying a toll proportioned to their tonnage: the harbour at the entrance of the creek is excellent, and affords a favourite and safe shelter for the vessels belonging to the members of the Royal Yacht Club. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the 12th of May and the 2nd of October, for cheese, horses, cattle, &c., each continuing two days. Lymington, which is a borough by prescription, was incorporated by charter of James I.: the municipal body consists of a mayor and an unlimited number of burgesses. The mayor is chosen annually on the Sunday after St. Matthew's day, and sworn into office at the court leet of the lord of the manor, usually held about the end of October, when also the constables, town crier, serjeant at mace, &c., are appointed. Petty sessions for the New Forest (East) division are held by the magistrates for that division, every alternate Saturday. The elective franchise was conferred by Elizabeth, in the 27th year of her reign: the right of election is vested in the corporation, the number of voters being about thirty: the mayor is the returning officer, and the influence of Sir Harry Burrard Neale, Bart., is predominant.

The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Boldre, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, has been built at different periods, being irregularly constructed of brick and stone, with a central tower and spire; the interior is neat, and contains several handsome monuments. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. A grammar school was founded and endowed, in 1668, by George Fulford and others, who devised the sum of £326 for that purpose: in 1688, a school-house was granted by the corporation, which, becoming dilapidated, was taken down in 1782; and ten boys are instructed on this foundation in reading, writing, and arithmetic, in the private residence of the master, who receives about £20 per annum on account of the charity. A bequest of £300 was made, in 1777, by Anne Burrard, to found a school for the education of poor children: ten children of both sexes are instructed, and the interest is equally divided between a master and a mistress. A National school is supported by subscription, for which a school-room is about to be built, on a piece of ground given by Sir H. B. Neale, Bart.; and a school for eighty boys and eighty girls is supported by a private individual. Rear-Admiral Thomas Rogers, who died in 1814, bequeathed £1000, directing the interest to be divided annually between ten poor men and women. There are various charitable institutions for the relief of the sick and indigent. On a promontory on the coast, south of Lymington, is Hurst castle, a fortress erected by Henry VIII., to defend this part of the channel between the main land and the Isle of Wight; it consists of a circular tower strengthened by semicircular bastions. In this castle, Charles I. was confined for several days after his removal from Carisbrooke, in 1648, about one month prior to his decapitation: it is now an important station, occupied by the men employed in the preventive service. Two light-houses and a beacon are supported for the service of vessels navigating the coast.

LYMM, a parish in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Warrington, containing 2090 inhabitants. The living is a rectory in mediety, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester; the mediety of Lymm with Warburton is rated in the king's books at £11. 0. $7\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Rowland Eyles Egerton Warburton, Esq.; the other mediety is rated at £11. 0. 5., and in the patronage of E. Leigh, Esq. The church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is a very ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A free grammar school was endowed, in 1698, by Sir G. Warburton, and W. Domville, Esq., the income of which is about £80 per annum. The Duke of Bridgewater's canal passes through the village.

LYMPNE, a parish partly within the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, but chiefly in the hundred of STREET, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Hythe, containing 467 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 1. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Stephen, stands on the edge of a rock near the village, and is principally in the Norman style of architecture, with a tower rising from the centre: near it is Stutfall castle, now the residence of the Archdeacon, but formerly a strong hold or fort of the Romans; the walls are constructed of brick and flint. The parish takes its name from the ancient river Limene, now the Rother, a branch of which ran below it, and formed the ancient Roman haven called Portus Limanus. The place itself is generally considered to have been the Aimin of Ptolemy. The great military road called Stane-street, still visibly straight for some miles, ran hither from the station Durovernum, or Canterbury. At Shepway Cross, about half a mile from the church, the Leminarcha, or Lord Warden of the cinque-ports, was sworn into office. Near the castle several Roman coins have been found. About 633, Ethelburga, a daughter of Ethelbert, built a nunnery here in honour of the Virgin Mary, which subsequently became an abbey, and continued till 964; but after the Danish invasion, it came into the possession of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Here are a small endowed school, and an almshouse comprising two dwellings. A fair for pedlary and toys is held on July 5th. The Shorncliffe and Rye canal passes through the parish.

LYMPSHAM, a parish in the hundred of BRENT with WRINGTON, county of SOMERSET, 7 miles (W.) from Axbridge, containing 496 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £38. 5. $2\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Rev. J. A. Stephenson. The church, dedicated to St. Christopher, has a very elegant tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LYMPSTON, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of BUDLEIGH, county of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Exmouth, containing 1020 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 13. 4., and in the patronage of T. Porter, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Unitarians. A small sum, the produce of several trifling bequests, is paid to two schoolmistresses for the instruction of children. This parish is situated on the eastern bank of the river Exe.

LYNCOMB, a joint parish with Widcomb, in the hundred of BATH-FORUM, county of SOMERSET, adjacent to the city of Bath, containing 5880 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, annexed to the rectory of St. Peter and St. Paul, Bath, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, and in the patronage of the Corporation of Bath. The parish is separated from the city of Bath by the river Avon, and the Kennet and Avon canal passes through it; the hills in the neighbourhood are very productive of freestone. There is an hospital for idiots, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, with a chapel annexed, which latter has been partly rebuilt by subscription.

LYNDHURST, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of NEW FOREST, New Forest (East) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Southampton, containing 1170 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Minstead, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A school, in which about sixteen children of both sexes are educated, is endowed with £26 per annum, arising from a bequest by William Phillips, Esq., for charitable uses. There is likewise a National school. Prior to the time of Charles II., the jurisdiction of the Chief Justice in Eyre for this forest was exercised here, where the forest courts under the authority of the verderers are still held; some on such days as the presiding judges shall appoint, others annually on September 14th. Attached to the wardenship is a house, called the King's house, now occupied by a subordinate officer. An ancient stirrup, said to have been used by William Rufus, at the time when he was shot by Sir Walter Tyrrel, is preserved here. Courts leet and baron for the hundred of Redbridge and manor of Lyndhurst are held. Sir John Singleton Copley, the present Lord High Chancellor of England, on being elevated to that high office, was created Baron Lyndhurst, by patent dated April 27th, 1827.

LYNDON, a parish in the hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, 5 miles (S. E.) from Oakham, containing 106 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £6. 17. 1., and in the patronage of S. Barker, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. The river Chater bounds this parish on the south.

LYNDON, a quarter in the parish of CHURCH-BICKENHILL, Solihull division of the hundred of HEM-LINGFORD, county of WARWICK. The population is returned with the parish.

LYNEHAM, a chapelry in the parish of SHIPTON under WHICHWOOD, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Burford, containing 260 inhabitants.

LYNESACK, a joint township with Softley, in that part of the parish of AUCKLAND ST. ANDREW which is in the north-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 7 miles (S. by E.) from Wolsingham, containing, with Softley, 732 inhabitants. This township contains some extensive collieries: it is bounded on the south by the river Gaunless, or Wanless, and on the north by the Lin-Burn.

LYNFORD, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSHOE, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Brandon-Ferry, containing 52 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich. The church is in ruins. Two Roman urns were dug up in this parish in 1720, and one in 1735, containing ashes and bones.

LYNG, a parish in the hundred of EYNSFORD, county of NORFOLK, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from East Dereham, containing 581 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Whitwell, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £11. Edward Lombe, Esq. was patron in 1827. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

LYNN (WEST), a parish in the Marshland division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (W.) from Lynn-Regis, containing 367 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. H. H. Townsend, Esq. was patron in 1811. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

LYNN-REGIS, a borough, sea-port, and market town, having exclusive jurisdiction, though locally in the Lynn division of the hundred of Freebridge, county of NORFOLK, 44 miles (W. by N.) from Norwich, and 97 (N. by E.) from London, containing 12,253 inhabitants. This place is by Camden supposed to have been an ancient British town, and to have derived its name from the expanse of water near which it is situated, and of which the British word Llyn was significant; but Spelman is of opinion that the name is of Saxon origin, derived from the word Lean, signifying a tenure in fee, or farm. It was anciently called Len Episcopi, or Bishop's Lynn, from having been under the jurisdiction, both temporal and spiritual, of the Bishops of Norwich, who had a palace where Gaywood hall now stands; but this authority was, in the reign of Henry VIII., surrendered to that monarch, and from that time the town assumed the name of Lenne-Regis, or King's Lynn. In Domesday-book it is called Lun and Lena, and described as the property of Agelmare, Bishop of North Elmham, and Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury. It appears to have been a place of considerable importance, and to have enjoyed valuable privileges, among which were certain customs on the arrival of all merchandise by sea and land, of which the bishops claimed a moiety. Henry I. granted liberty to the prior of Norwich to hold an annual fair on the feast of St. Margaret, with other privileges; and in the reign of Richard I. it was the residence of numerous Jews, who carried on an extensive trade with most parts of Europe. In 1204, during the contest between John and the barons, Lynn continued faithful to the king, who remained there for some time, and on the petition of John Grey, Bishop of Norwich, made the town a free borough; he presented to the inhabitants a silver cup, weighing seventy-three ounces, richly gilt and beautifully enamelled, which is still preserved by the corporation; and he is said to have presented his own sword to be borne before the mayor on public occasions; the sword now used is, however, reported to have been given by Henry VIII., on his assuming the power previously exercised by the bishops. John was frequently here during the war, and from this place he departed just before the disaster which befel him in crossing the Wash, and to which is ascribed the illness that caused his death. Henry VI. also visited the town; and Edward IV., in 1470, retreating before the celebrated Earl of Warwick, came hither, in company with his brother, the Duke of Gloucester. In 1498, Henry VII., with his queen and the Prince of Wales, attended by a numerous retinue, spent some time at the Augustine convent in the town. In the parliamentary war the inhabitants embraced the royal cause, and the town was besieged by the parliamentary forces, under the command of the Earl of Manchester, to whom it surrendered, after a vigorous resistance for three weeks, and was garrisoned with parliamentary troops. Numerous plagues and other diseases have raged here, at different periods, with destructive influence; in 1540, an intermittent fever prevailed to such an extent as to occasion a suspension of the mart for that year. In 1636 and 1665, the market and fairs were discontinued, owing to the plague; at the former period, temporary habitations were erected without the town for persons afflicted with it. In 1741, the spires of the church of St. Margaret and the chapel of St. Nicholas were blown down, and several other buildings greatly injured, by a violent hurricane and storm.

The town is situated on the east bank of the Great Ouse, which is here of considerable breadth, and at a distance of ten miles from the North sea: it extends a mile and a quarter in length, and half a mile in breadth, and is intersected by four rivulets, called fleets, over which are numerous bridges, that have lately been widened, and a new road for carriages constructed over Penfleet bridge. Many improvements have been effected under acts of parliament, obtained in 1803 and 1806, for paving, cleansing, and lighting the town, the approaches to which are commodious and pleasant. It was anciently defended on the east side by a wall, in which were nine bastions, and by a broad and deep fosse, over which were three drawbridges leading to the principal gates: a few fragments of the wall are still remaining, and one of the gates, arched and embattled, at the south entrance; the others have been taken down. On the north side is St. Anne's fort, a platform battery, constructed in 1627, and formerly mounting twelve pieces of heavy ordnance. The town consists of three principal streets, nearly parallel, from which several smaller streets diverge: it is well paved and lighted with gas, but indifferently supplied with water conveyed by pipes from a reservoir at Kettle Mills, in the north-eastern suburb: application is about to be made to parliament for increasing the supply, by the construction of more effectual works. The houses are in general ancient and inconveniently built, though interspersed with several respectable mansions, and in the more modern parts of the town are several ranges of handsome dwellings. The environs are flat, and not very attractive in their scenery; but the public promenades are pleasant: the principal is a mall, three hundred and forty yards in length, and eleven yards wide, constructed and kept in order by the corporation. The theatre, a handsome building, was erected by subscription on shares in 1814, and is well arranged and elegantly fitted up: it is open annually for about six weeks, commencing at the great mart in February. Assemblies are held in a suite of commodious rooms in the townhall, in which also concerts take place occasionally. The subscription library, established in 1797, contains three thousand two hundred volumes, and is supported by about one hundred and sixty members; and the inhabitants, by means of a written order from the mayor, have access to an excellent parochial library in St. Margaret's church, by permission of the corporation. A mechanics' institution was established in 1827, which is under the direction of a president and committee.

In the reign of Edward the Confessor, Lynn was a place of considerable trade, and it had grown into such commercial importance at the beginning of the 13th century, that the revenue paid to the crown was more than two-thirds of that arising from the trade of the port of London. In 1374, the inhabitants furnished nineteen vessels towards a naval armament for the invasion of France; a mint was established here; and there were thirty-one incorporated guilds, or trading companies, some of whom had separate halls. The limits of the port extend in a northerly direction from the promontory on which Hunstanton lighthouse stands, in a supposed right line, north-north-west, to fourteen fathoms of water, and likewise from this line towards the east, until it falls into fourteen fathoms of water, at a point northward from the eastern end of the sand-hills, commonly called Burnham Meales; southerly to a place in the channel of the harbour of Lynn, called White Friars' Fleet, and to Gibbon's point opposite thereto, thence down the river, on the western side, and round the coast of Marshland, to a point called Sutton corner. The harbour is deep, and sufficient to accommodate three hundred sail; but the entrance is somewhat dangerous, from the frequent shifting of the channel, and the numerous sand banks; and the anchorage is rendered difficult from the nature of the soil, and the rapidity of the tide, which rises to the height of twenty feet: to counteract a portion of these disadvantages, a company of pilots has been established, whose office is on St. Anne's fort, commanding a view of the channel. Anciently the course of the Ouse was by Wisbeach: its present direction, according to Dugdale, may be referred to the reign of Henry III.; and it has been ascribed to the decay of the outfall at Wisbeach, and to some great flood which rendered a fresh line necessary. This accession of water into the channel of a small river, which previously flowed past the town, destroyed a considerable part of Old Lynn, and the church at North Lynn is stated to have been completely engulfed. After the sluices at Denver and Salter's Lode had been constructed, for the purpose of draining the fenny tract called Bedford Level, the navigation of the river was much impaired, and the harbour obstructed by the accumulation of silt; to remedy which, the Eau-brink cut was commenced in 1818, and completed in 1820, avoiding a considerable bend in the river; and the old channel of the river is gradually filling with soil, so that in a few years a valuable part of more than seven hundred acres of land will be gained for agricultural purposes; but the accumulation of silt in the harbour still continues, so that vessels which formerly lay immediately along side the quays, cannot now approach within several yards. To remedy this inconvenience, three jetties, composed of timber, have lately been constructed, at stated distances, with a view to divert the stream to the eastern, or harbour, side, but their effect has scarcely been ascertained. Near the north end of this cut, a handsome wooden bridge has been built, over which a new road leads into Marshland; and a bridge over the river Nine, and an embankment at Cross Keys Wash, are now in progress, affording a direct road from Norfolk and Suffolk, through Lynn, into Lincolnshire. The Purfleet and Common Staith quays are the principal places for landing merchandise; on the former, where all wines are landed, the custom-house and exchange stands, occupying the site of the hall of the ancient guild of the Holy Trinity: it is a handsome building of freestone, ornamented with two tiers of pilasters, the lower of the Doric, and the upper of the Ionic order, and surmounted by a small turret; in a niche in the front is a statue of Charles II. In the High-street is the excise office, to which are attached a collector, supervisor, and other officers. This port, from its situation, so near the North sea, and enjoying the advantages of inland communication, carries on an extensive foreign and coasting trade: the principal imports are, wine from Spain and Portugal; timber, deals, hemp, and tallow, from the Baltic; corn from the northern parts of Europe; oil-cake from Holland, and timber from America. The coasting-trade is very considerable, consisting chiefly of imported and agricultural produce, with which it supplies the neighbouring districts; and a fine species of white sand, much used in the manufacture of glass, of which great quantities are sent to Newcastle and Leith; also a considerable number of shrimps, which are found in abundance on the coast, and are sent to London: its intercourse with the interior of the country is greatly facilitated by the river Ouse and its several branches, with which various canals have communication; and not less than one hundred and fifty thousand chaldrons of coal are annually brought into the port. In the year ending January 5th, 1827, sixty British, and one hundred and twenty-seven foreign, ships entered inwards from foreign ports; and twenty-one British, and one hundred and ten foreign, vessels cleared outwards: the annual amount of dues paid at the custom-house is on an average £90,000: the number of vessels belonging to the port, in 1828, was one hundred and twelve, averaging a burden of one hundred and twenty-one tons. Formerly, several ships were annually fitted out for the Greenland whale fishery, but this branch of the business of the port has, of late years, greatly declined. Ship-building has been carried on here from a very early period, but it is not at present of so much note as formerly. There are no particular branches of manufacture deserving notice: the chief are ropes and sail-cloth, the latter on a very confined scale. The market days are Tuesday and Saturday; the former, principally for corn, is held in a spacious paved area of about three acres, surrounded by some well-built houses: it contains a handsome but dilapidated market-cross of freestone, erected in 1710; the lower part of the building is surrounded by a peristyle of sixteen Ionic columns, above which is a walk, defended by iron palisades, and in the centre is an octagonal room, on the exterior sides of which are carved figures facing the cardinal points, the whole being surmounted by a cupola. It is in contemplation to form a new market-place, by pulling down some houses on the western side of the preceding one, and erecting a market-house, to extend towards the common staith, or quay, where the fish-market now is. The market on Saturday, formerly held in the High-street, was removed, in 1782, to an area near St. Margaret's church, where shambles have been built. In 1826, the weekly cattle-market was removed, from its inconvenient site in the environs of the town, to a more central situation; the mayor and burgesses, in consequence of a petition to that effect, granted a piece of land abutting upon one of the streets, to which convenient approaches have been made, so that cattle can reach the market-place without passing through any of the streets. The fairs are, February 14th, which is the grand mart for six days, but generally continued for a fortnight; and October 17th, which is a great cheese fair.

The town, which under the bishops was governed by a provost appointed by them, was first incorporated by John, and has had no less than fifteen royal charters. The parish of All Saints, or South Lynn, was constituted a part of the borough by a license from Henry VIII., in 1546, and confirmed by charter in the 4th of Philip and Mary. By the last charter, granted by Charles II., the government is vested in a mayor, high steward, recorder, twelve aldermen, and eighteen common council-men, assisted by a town clerk, chamberlain, two coroners, and other officers. The mayor is chosen annually on the 29th of August, from among the aldermen, by the common council, and enters upon his office on the 29th of September. All members of the corporation who have passed the chair are justices of the peace for the borough and liberties, exercising exclusive jurisdiction: the freedom of the borough is inherited by the eldest sons of freemen, on the death of their fathers, or acquired by servitude or gift. The corporation hold courts of admiralty, for determining all pleas arising within the limits of the port; quarterly courts of session, for the trial of all offenders, except for high treason; and a court of record, under the charter of Henry VIII., for the recovery of debts to any amount: a court of requests is also held, under an act passed in the 10th of George III., for the recovery of debts under 40s. The mayor, aldermen, magistrates, and clergy, used to hold a meeting for determining all controversies in an amicable manner, called the "Feast of Reconciliation;" but this custom, which originated in 1558, has long since become obsolete. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the freemen generally, the number of whom is about three hundred and thirty: the mayor is the returning officer. The guildhall is an ancient structure of stone and flint, in the later style of English architecture, containing a spacious hall, courts for the sessions, and a suite of assembly-rooms; and is ornamented with portraits of many public characters, among which are those of Sir Robert Walpole, Bart., who represented the borough in seventeen successive parliaments; Sir Thomas White; Sir Benjamin Keene, and others. The prison for the borough is both a common gaol and house of correction, containing separate rooms for debtors, and for male and female felons, but it is not well adapted to the classification of prisoners, having only one airing-yard, for the alternate use of all classes.

King's Lynn comprises the parishes of All Saints, Southgate; St. Edmund, North End; and St. Margaret, all in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich. The living of All Saints' is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £18. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely: the church is an ancient cruciform structure; the tower, which fell down in 1763, and demolished part of the body of the church, has not been rebuilt. The living of St. Edmund's, North End, is a sinecure rectory, rated in the king's books at £13. 1. 8., to which S. Thornton, Esq. and others presented in 1799: the church is supposed to have been anciently swept away by the river. The living of St. Margaret's is a perpetual curacy, with the curacy of St. Nicholas annexed, endowed with £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich: the church is a spacious structure, combining the early, the decorated, and the later styles of English architecture, with two western towers, and an east front of singularly beautiful design, with two octagonal turrets rising from the flanking buttresses; the chancel is in the early English style, with a fine circular east window; the south porch is highly ornamented with canopied niches and shields, and the roof finely groined. The chapel of St. Nicholas is a large structure, combining the decorated with the later style of English architecture: the original roof of beautifully carved oak is carefully preserved, and the interior contains many parts of great beauty. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians, and a Roman Catholic chapel. There is a burial-ground for the Jews, but they have no synagogue. The free grammar school was founded in the reign of Henry VII., by Thomas Thoresby, alderman of Lynn, who endowed it with lands producing about £60 per annum: a spacious school-room, and a dwelling-house for the master, were erected, in 1825, by the corporation, who are trustees under a charter of Edward IV. It has two scholarships at Emanuel College, Cambridge, of £5. 10. each per annum; and one scholarship of £2 per annum at either University; both founded by the corporation, and tenable for seven years; one scholarship of £2, at either of the Universities for seven years, founded by the owner of the estate near Highbridge-Lynn; one scholarship of £3. 8. 6., at Trinity College, Cambridge, for five years, in the gift of the Master and Vice-Master of Trinity, and the Mayor of Lynn; and one scholarship of £6, tenable for four years, in St. John's College, Cambridge, in the gift of the Corporation. Eugene Aram was usher here when he was apprehended, in 1759, on a charge of murder committed fourteen years previously near Knaresborough, in Yorkshire, for which he was tried and executed, having acknowledged the justice of the sentence a short time before it was carried into effect. A school on the Lancasterian plan was established in 1792, which has been enlarged for the instruction of fifty girls; it is supported partly by subscription, and partly by the industry of the girls, who are employed in needle-work. A similar school for boys, established in 1808, is supported entirely by subscription, in which two hundred and thirty boys are instructed. There is a National school for girls.

Gaywood's almshouses occupy the site of the ancient hospital of St. Mary Magdalene, founded in the reign of Stephen, for a master and twelve brethren and sisters; the endowment, lapsing to the crown, was granted by James I. to the mayor and aldermen, in trust for the maintenance of a master and eleven aged and infirm persons. The hospital was burnt down by the parliamentary troops in the reign of Charles I., and rebuilt by the corporation in 1649: it contains a chapel, and apartments for a master, who receives ten shillings per week, and eleven poor women, who have five shillings per week each, the charity being under the management of the two senior aldermen. The Bede house, an establishment of obscure and uncertain foundation, was rebuilt, in 1822, by Mr. Benjamin Smith (who has recently proposed to found a new almshouse, the design having been approved of by the corporation), and is endowed for the maintenance of a reader and eleven aged women, who receive each about six shillings per week. Valenger's hospital, founded in 1605, and rebuilt in 1806, is inhabited by four aged women, each of whom receives four shillings per week. Paradise, or Framingham's hospital, begun in 1676, by Mr. John Heathcote, and completed after his decease by Mr. Henry Framingham, is endowed for the support of a reader, who receives four shillings and ninepence per week, and eleven aged men, who receive each three shillings and sixpence per week. Among the charities held in trust by the corporation is one by Mr. Cook, of London, who bequeathed £5000 three per cents.; the dividends on £2300 to be paid to the inmates of the Bede house, the dividends on £2000 to the inmates of Framingham's hospital, and those on the remaining £700 to the hospitallers of South Lynn. There are various benevolent institutions for the relief of the necessitous, among which are a Ladies' Society for the relief of lying-in women, established in 1791; another for visiting the sick at their own habitations, formed in 1827; the Strangers' Friend Society; a dispensary, established in 1813, and supported by subscription; and a Dorcas Society: there are numerous benefit societies, and various charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. The corporation are in possession of funds for apprenticing children, for loans to young tradesmen, and other benevolent purposes. The workhouse was originally a chapel, dedicated to St. James; having become ruinous, it was rebuilt by the corporation, in 1581, and used for the manufacture of sacking, &c.: this undertaking having failed, it was converted, in 1682, into an hospital or workhouse for fifty decayed old men, women, and poor children. By an act passed in 1701, its management was entrusted to an Incorporated Society, styled the "Guardians of the poor of the borough of King's Lynn in the county of Norfolk, and within the liberties of the said borough:" this act was amended in 1808, adding the churchwardens and overseers to the corporation. It is now confined to the reception of the poor of St. Margaret's parish only: the inhabitants of South Lynn maintain their own poor, and are exempt from this act.

The monastic institutions and ancient hospitals consisted of a priory of Benedictine monks, in Priory-lane; a convent of White friars, in South Lynn; one of Grey friars, in St. James' street; one of Black friars, between Clough-lane and Spinner-lane; one of Augustine friars, in St. Austin's street; a college, near the town hall; St. Mary Magdalene's hospital, the site and endowment of which are appropriated to Gaywood's hospital; also a nunnery, a monastery of friars de Pœnitentiâ Jesu, St. John's hospital, and four lazarett-houses, the sites of which are unknown; besides various chapels, all which were involved in the general dissolution of these establishments. Vestiges of the houses which belonged to the Grey, White, Black, and Austin, friars still remain; that of the first consists of the tower and lantern of their conventual church: it rises from a pointed arch supported by buttresses, to the height of about ninety feet, and within is groined with stone. A spiral staircase leads to the summit, whence a complete view is obtained of the town and its environs. It stands in a small enclosure opposite and belonging to the free grammar school, on the left of the entrance into the town from London. An ancient building, in a state of complete repair, in Queen-street, near the town hall, has been considered that which formerly constituted the college. But the most interesting relic of antiquity is an ancient and curious edifice, at the eastern extremity of the town, denominated the Lady's Chapel, or, the Chapel on the Red Mount. It is of singular construction: within an octagonal wall of red brick, strengthened by buttresses, is a handsome cruciform chapel of very small dimensions, with an elegant stone roof; it formerly contained an image of the Virgin, before which journeying pilgrims, on their way to Walsingham, are supposed to have presented their offerings. The whole has lately undergone a thorough reparation, by means of a subscription. Nicholas of Lynn, a celebrated mathematician, astrologer, and navigator, was born here, and became one of the Grey friars; he also died and was buried here in 1369. William Browne, M.D., afterwards Sir William Browne, resided here; he was President of the Royal College of Physicians, and author of several works, chiefly on medical subjects. The custom of ushering in May-day with the blowing of horns is still observed at this place. At Reffley, about two miles distant, in a sequestered spot, stands an obelisk, from which, by means of an aqueduct, a chalybeate spring issues; near it is an octagonal temple, whither subscribers repair for the benefit of the water. Lynn gives the inferior title of baron to Marquis Townshend.

LYNT, a tything in the parish of COLESHILL, hundred of SHRIVENHAM, county of BERKS, though locally in the hundred of Highworth, Cricklade, and Staple, county of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.E.) from Highworth. The population is returned with the parish.

LYONSHALL, a parish in the hundred of STRET-FORD, county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Kington, containing 896 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £6. 10. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. Here are the remains of a moated castle, which, in the early part of the reign of Henry III., belonged to Sir Stephen de Ebroucis, then lord of the manor and castle, on the site of which a curious antique ring was found. A railway passes through this village, in its course from Brecon, to the lime-kilns in the parish of Old Radnor. A court leet is held here. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Avon.

LYPEAT, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of KILMERSDON, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Frome. The population is returned with the parish.

LYSS-TURNEY, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of ODIHAM, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Petersfield, containing 560 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1700 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Hon. W. T. L. P. Wellesley. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Mary Cole, in 1765, gave a rent-charge of £4, and Dorothea Cole bequeathed another of £3, to be applied for teaching poor children.

LYTCHETT-MATRAVERS, a parish in the hundred of COGDEAN, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Wareham, containing 609 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £13. 3. 4. W. Trenchard, Esq. was patron in 1810. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

LYTCHETT-MINSTER, a chapelry in the parish of STURMINSTER-MARSHALL, hundred of COGDEAN, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Wareham, containing 544 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Sturminster-Marshall, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Sturminster-Marshall. The chapel is demolished. This chapelry is bounded on the south-east by Poole harbour, and on the south by Rock Lee river, which latter is crossed by a bridge, and falls into Lytchett bay. On the south side of the village is a very large tumulus: here was formerly a beacon.

LYTH, a hamlet in the parish of HEVERSHAM, KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Kendal. The population is returned with Crosthwaite.

LYTHAM, a parish in the hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Kirkham, containing 1292 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £800 and a rent-charge of £7 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John Clifton, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. There is a Roman Catholic chapel. A free school was established in 1704, with the produce of various benefactions, which, with others of a later date, yield an income of £104. 18. per annum; the number of scholars varies from seventy to one hundred and twenty. A Sunday school affords instruction to about one hundred children. Lytham is situated on the western coast, on the northern shore of the æstuary of the Ribble, and is much resorted to for sea-bathing. Some improvement has taken place within the last few years, by pulling down an extensive range of old buildings, and, after leaving an opening from the Clifton's Arms hotel to the beach, erecting several new houses, among which is a billiard-room. Part of the beach has also been levelled, and a public walk formed along it, affording a pleasing view of the scenery on the southern side of the æstuary. About a mile eastward is Lytham pool, a large natural basin, where vessels bringing corn, &c., to the port of Preston, discharge their cargoes into smaller craft: at its northern extremity is a graving-dock, for building or repairing vessels. A few of the inhabitants are employed in fishing. Lytham Hall comprises, in its kitchens and out-offices, a portion of the buildings of a Benedictine priory, founded, as a cell to the monastery at Durham, by Richard Fitz-Roger, in the latter part of the reign of Richard I., and dissolved, with the smaller monasteries, by Henry VIII.

LYTHE, or MILLAND, a chapelry in the hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 6 miles (N. W.) from Midhurst.

LYTHE, a parish in the eastern division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Barnby, Borrowby, Ellerby, Hutton-Mulgrave, Lythe, Nickleby, Newton-Mulgrave, and Ugthorpe, and containing 2194 inhabitants, of which number, 1134 are in the township of Lythe, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Whitby. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 12. 6., endowed with £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to St. Oswald, and, although of modern appearance, is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Peter de Mauley obtained a weekly market to be held here, and a fair on the eve of the festival of St. Oswald, in the reign of Henry III., but both have been long disused.

M.

MABE, a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Falmouth, containing 457 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage not in charge, with that of Mylor, in the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Exeter. The church, dedicated to St. Mabe, has a lofty handsome tower crowned with pinnacles. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. An almshouse was erected with the sum of £200, the proceeds of a small legacy left to accumulate for the purpose.

MABLETHORPE (ST. MARY), a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from Alford, containing 200 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with which that of Stane is united, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £17. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$. Col. Waters and others were patrons in 1824.

MABLETHORPE (ST. PETER), a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, containing 35 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united, in 1745, to that of Thedlethorpe St. Helen, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. 2.

MABYN (ST.), a parish in the hundred of TRIGG, county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Wade-bridge, containing 715 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £36, and in the patronage of the Earl of Falmouth. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MACCLESFIELD, a market town and parochial chapelry, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Macclesfield, county palatine of CHESTER, on the road from London to Manchester, 36 miles (E. by N.) from Chester, and 167 (N. W. by N.) from London, containing 17,746 inhabitants. Previously to the Norman Conquest it constituted a portion of the royal demesne of the Earls of Mercia, who held a court here for the ancient hundred of Hamestan; hence, in the record of Domesday, it is represented to have been one of the seats of Earl Edwin. When that survey was made, it was comprised within the earldom of Chester, of which it continued to form part until the abolition of that jurisdiction, when the hundred, manor, and forest of Macclesfield lapsed to the crown. The king is now lord of the hundred; about one-third of which, including the township of Macclesfield, and sixteen other townships, constitutes the manor and forest of Macclesfield. The forest was anciently protected by the same laws, and entitled to the same rights as other royal forests; some of these laws expired with the disafforestation of the tract to which they applied, but a few of the executive offices under them survive, and retain their privileges, although the duties attached to them, from the abolition of the feudal system, are either no longer requisite, or have been superseded by other offices. Of this description, in particular, are the grand serjeancy of the hundred, and the master-ship of the forest, of Macclesfield, which have long been hereditary in the family of Davenport, and are now held by Davies Davenport, of Woodford and Capesthorpe, Esq.; and that of bailiff of the manor and forest, which has long been vested in the noble family of Cholmondeley. There were also eight subordinate hereditary foresters, who held office by grant from the Earls of Chester. When this territory lapsed to the crown, parcels of the forest were granted away at different times, and the whole is now under cultivation; the last portion of the common and waste land having been enclosed under an act obtained in 1796, when an allotment was assigned to the king, as lord of the manor, which, with the mineral contents of the soil, has since been alienated. Prior to this, a swainmote court was held at Macclesfield, and persons found guilty of misdemeanors against the forest laws were committed to the prison within the town, whither also offenders were sent from the court leet for the forest and hundred. For some centuries these courts continued to be held before the Chief Justice of Chester, who presided as Justice in Eyre here, or his deputy, or before special commissioners, the king's steward, or his deputy, or the king's bailiff: in process of time they were constantly held under the presidency of the king's steward, or his deputy, to whose office many of the duties originally discharged by other functionaries have been annexed. This seneschalship, or stewardship, of the hundred and forest was given, in the reign of Edward IV., to Thomas, Lord Stanley, and heirs male; in which noble family, with a short intermission during the time of the Commonwealth, it has since continued, and is now enjoyed by the Earl of Derby.

Seal and Arms.

An ecclesiastical council was held at Macclesfield in 1332, and another in 1362, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Whilst the town continued the residence of the Earls of Chester, it was surrounded by a rampart, or walled fence, which had three principal gates. In 1508, Thomas Savage, a native of the town, who became successively Bishop of London and Archbishop of York, founded a college of Secular priests, of which the chapel, previously communicating with the church of St. Michael, by a door now blocked up, alone remains, and is the sepulchral chapel of the family. The building is an interesting structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a turret of three stages, through the lower of which an elegant arched gateway, highly enriched with shields and other architectural ornaments, leads into the chapel; above the entrance is a beautiful oriel window, the lower part of which is ornamented with the arms of England in the centre, and on one side those of the see of York, and on the other, those of the family of Savage, quartered with the arms of the sees to which the founder had been preferred: in the chapel are many family monuments, and deposited in an urn is the heart of the archbishop, whose body was interred at York. During the great civil war in the 17th century, the town experienced much injury from the parliamentarians, by whom it was besieged and taken; and who retained possession of it, under Sir William Brereton, Commander in Chief of the parliamentary forces for this county, after an obstinate attempt on the part of Sir Thomas Acton to gain it for the king. On a hill to the east of the town are vestiges of an encampment constructed by the parliamentarians, from which, during the siege, the spire of St. Michael's church was battered by the cannon of the besiegers. After the decapitation of Charles I., a council was held here, at which it was resolved to raise four regiments, of seven hundred men each, for the service of Charles II., who was then at the head of an army in Scotland. In 1745, a party of one hundred cavalry took possession of the town for the Pretender, who, on the evening of the same day, arrived with five thousand men and his whole train of artillery; after passing the night here, he held a council of war, and the day following marched towards Derby; but being alarmed at the approach of the forces under the Duke of Cumberland, he fell back upon Macclesfield, to which place he was pursued by the duke, whom the inhabitants received with every demonstration of joy.

The town is pleasantly situated near the southern extremity of the forest; the greater part stands on the declivity of an eminence rising gradually from the western bank of the river Bollin, which flows through the lower part, hence denominated "The Waters:" these parts are connected by two bridges of stone, and one of wood. The rapid increase of population has created a proportionate augmentation of the number of buildings, and an extension of the town in every direction, within a short period. Considerable improvements have been made, under the provisions of an act obtained in 1814, by the introduction of police regulations, widening the streets, and removing unsightly objects: the streets are well paved, and lighted with gas; and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water brought from springs to the east of the town, and conveyed by pipes to their houses. A public subscription library has been established for more than half a century, and contains a valuable collection of works; a public news-room is supported by subscription; and there are a neat theatre, and a handsome suite of assembly-rooms. The races, which formerly took place here, have been discontinued for many years, but it is at present in contemplation to revive them. Macclesfield was formerly noted for the manufacture of twist buttons, which was introduced at a very early period, and for the regulation and promotion of which, several legislative enactments were procured: many of these, with other ware, were carried through the country by itinerant chapmen, of mean principles and reputation, denominated "Flash-men," from residing in and around the hamlet of Flash, just beyond the verge of the county, and within that of Stafford, whose name and occupation still remain, although their number has decreased from the decline of the trade. To this succeeded the manufacture of silk, which is carried on in all its branches to a considerable extent. The first silk-mill in this town was erected by Mr. Roe, in 1756, since which period the trade has rapidly increased, and at present there are not less than seventy mills for throwing silk, which is here manufactured into handkerchiefs and broad silks, the weaving of which, with the manufacture of twist, sewing-silk, and buttons, is now the principal source of trade. In 1823, there were three thousand looms in the town, which number had increased in 1828 to six thousand, but in 1829 there were only four thousand. The cotton manufacture was also introduced about the same time, and the first mill for that purpose was erected in 1758; since that period it has progressively increased, but with less rapidity, and with less fluctuation, than the silk trade: there are several extensive dye-houses and other establishments connected with these branches of manufacture. The copper and brass works, formerly carried on here, have been discontinued. In the neighbourhood are extensive mines of coal, and quarries of slate, and of stone of a superior quality for building, of which great quantities are sent to Stockport, Manchester, and into Staffordshire, and other parts of the country. A canal is at present being constructed, which will pass by the east side of the town, and join the Peak Forest canal at Marple, opening a communication with Manchester, and, by a junction with the Grand Trunk, on the confines of Staffordshire, with the midland and southern counties, and with London. The market, formerly held on Monday, is, by act of parliament obtained in 1814, now held on Tuesday; a market for vegetables is also held on Saturday. The fairs are, May 6th, June 22d, July 11th, October 4th, and November 11th, for cattle, woollen cloth, hardware, and toys. The town, which had been constituted a borough by Ranulph, third Earl of Chester of that name, was first incorporated by Edward, Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, in the 45th of Henry III., who conveyed additional privileges, but imposed the usual obligation of grinding at the king's mill, and baking at his oven: the latter continued in the possession of the crown until 1818, when it was sold; the building exists, but the practice has, though not long since, fallen into disuse. Various other charters have been granted: under that of Charles II., the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, and twenty-four capital burgesses, assisted by a town clerk, coroner, serjeant at mace, and other officers: the mayor, chosen annually from among the capital burgesses, and three of that body annually elected for the purpose, are justices of the peace within the borough. The freedom is inherited by all the sons of a freeman, or acquired by purchase or gift. The corporation hold half-yearly courts of session for the trial of misdemeanants, and the mayor and justices hold daily meetings for the despatch of business connected with the police. A court of record for debts to any amount, arising within the liberty of the hundred, is held twice a year by the Earl of Derby, as hereditary steward. This nobleman appoints a deputy-steward, who must be a barrister; a resident deputy-steward, and a clerk of the courts: the duties of the last are similar to those of a prothonotary. A similar court, called a halmote court, for the manor and forest, is held at the same time and place, and before the same officers; yet each of the separate jurisdictions possesses its own bailiff, who nominates a jury within that peculiar liberty. The manor chiefly comprises the townships of Bollington, Disley, Hurdsfield, Kettleshulme, Pott-Shrigley, Rainow, Sutton, Wincell, and Yeadsley cum Whaley, being of copyhold tenure. These courts are held monthly, or weekly, by adjournment, before the resident deputy-steward, for the convenience of hearing motions in civil causes, and passing surrenders of copyholds. Courts leet for these several jurisdictions are held annually, within a month of Michaelmas, in the same manner, at which constables are appointed for the different townships. The guildhall was taken down in 1826, and handsomely rebuilt in the Grecian style of architecture, at the expense of the corporation: it is a spacious and commodious edifice, containing, in addition to the court-rooms, handsome assembly and concert rooms: attached to it is the town gaol, which was rebuilt at the same time.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £800 private benefaction, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation. The parochial chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, founded by Eleanor, Queen of Edward I., about 1278, and made dependent on the mother church at Prestbury: the tower was formerly surmounted by a spire, which was battered down in the parliamentary war; the north side of the edifice was rebuilt in 1740, and the whole has, in many respects, undergone considerable alteration and repair; there are some sepulchral chapels, of which that of the family of Savage has been previously noticed; the chapel of the Legh family, and other portions of the structure, contain several altar-tombs and monuments of great antiquity. Christchurch, a spacious edifice of brick, with a square tower, was erected in 1775, at the sole expense of Charles Roe, Esq., who endowed it with £100 per annum for the minister; on the south side of the chancel is a handsome marble monument to the memory of the founder, ornamented with devices emblematical of his mechanical genius, and bearing an inscription commemorative of his acquaintance with the mineral strata of the county, of his having discovered the valuable mine in the Isle of Anglesey, and of having established the copper-works in this neighbourhood: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of William Roe, Esq. St. George's church, lately erected as a dissenting place of worship, has been purchased by the corporation for the service of the established church. There is a place of worship for the Society of Friends, three for Independents, one for Primitive Methodists, one for those of the New Connexion, three for Wesleyan Methodists, two for Socinians, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The free grammar school was founded in 1502, by Sir John Percyvale, born near this town, and lord mayor of London, who endowed it with lands at that time worth £10 per annum, which lapsing to the crown, the school was refounded by Edward VI., in 1552, and more amply endowed, under the designation of the "Free Grammar school of King Edward VI." The government was vested in fourteen trustees, inhabitants of Macclesfield and the parish of Prestbury, who appoint the masters. The scholars are gratuitously instructed in the classics, but pay for instruction in the French language, writing, and arithmetic; the income arising from the endowment exceeds £800 per annum, of which sum, £200 per annum is paid to the head master, who has a spacious house rent-free, £150 to the second master, £100 to the writing-master, and £50 to the French master. This school enjoys a high reputation: in the list of masters appear the names of Brownsword, a celebrated grammarian and Latin poet, and Brancker, a philosopher and mathematician; both lie interred within the parochial chapel of St. Michael. A National school is supported by subscription; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church, and the dissenting congregations. An almshouse was founded, in 1703, by Mrs. Stanley, who endowed it with £6 per annum, for three aged widows; it is now under the patronage of the family of Thornycroft. A dispensary was established in 1814, and is liberally supported by subscription. There are various charitable bequests for clothing and apprenticing poor children, and for distribution among the indigent. Near the road to Congleton is a place called the Castle-field, supposed to have been the site of the palace of the Earls of Chester; and there are some slight vestiges of an ancient mansion, said to have been the property and residence of the celebrated Duke of Buckingham. Macclesfield gives the title of earl to the family of Parker.

MACCLESFIELD-FOREST, a chapelry in the parish of PRESTBURY, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Macclesfield, containing 260 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty. The Earl of Derby was patron in 1799.

MACEFEN, a township in the parish of MALPAS, higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, 2 miles (E.) from Malpas, containing 48 inhabitants.

MACHEN, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 5½ miles (W. by N.) from Newport, containing 1032 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £10. 16. 5½., and in the patronage of Sir Charles Morgan, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The rivers Ebba and Rumsey run through the parish, in which are mines of coal, lead, iron, and calamine, also several mineral springs. There are the remains of an old building, called "the Castle," but no record of its history.

MACKWORTH, a parish in the hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, 2¾ miles (W. N. W.) from Derby, containing, with the township of Mark-Eaton, 650 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £9. 3., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Francis Mundy, Esq. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is partly in the decorated style of architecture. Here is remaining the gateway of a castle, anciently the seat of the De Mackworths, and said to have been demolished during the parliamentary war.

MADDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, county of WILTS, 5¾ miles (W. N. W.) from Amesbury, containing 369 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury. J. and J. Matron, Esqrs. were patrons in 1813. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MADEHURST, a parish in the hundred of AVISFORD, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 3¾ miles (N. W. by N.) from Arundel, containing 169 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £6. 8. 10., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chichester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

MADELEY, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 5½ miles (W. by S.) from Newcastle under Line, containing 1166 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £4. 16., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Crewe. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient stone structure. This parish abounds with mines of coal. The village is situated on the borders of Cheshire and Shropshire, and consists chiefly of cottages and farm-houses in the Elizabethan style. Here are two free schools, one for boys, the other for girls, endowed, in 1645, with a rent-charge of £60, by Sir John Offley, who founded in the same year, almshouses for ten poor persons, each of whom receives one shilling and ninepence per week. Samuel Stretch, noted for his penurious habits, bequeathed, in 1804, a great bell, to be tolled every night at eight o'clock, as a guide to passengers, he himself having accidentally fallen into a ditch, which ultimately caused his death. Madeley is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MADELEY-HOLME, a liberty in the parish of CHECKLEY, southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 3½ miles (N. N. W.) from Uttoxeter, containing 479 inhabitants.

MADELEY-MARKET, a market town and parish within the liberties of the borough of WENLOCK, county of SALOP, 4½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Shiftnall, 15 (S. E.) from Shrewsbury, and 148 (N. W.) from London, containing 5379 inhabitants. The name of this town indicates its situation between two rivers, and its adjunct was founded on the grant of a market, in the time of Henry III., to a community of Cluniac monks at Wenlock, to whom Madeley then belonged. After the disastrous battle of Worcester, in 1651, Charles II. obtained a temporary shelter in a house and barn then occupied by Mr. Wolfe, and situated near the church, which are still remaining. Madeley occupies a rising ground, and extends to Colebrookdale, which is environed by lofty hills and hanging woods, and in which are the most extensive iron-works in England, with foundries, furnaces, and all the complicated machinery requisite to so vast an establishment. Across the Severn is a cast-iron bridge of one arch, erected in 1779, the span of which is one hundred feet six inches, and the height from the base line to the centre, forty feet; the total weight of iron being three hundred and seventy-eight tons: all the principal parts were erected in three months, without any accident, or the least obstruction to the navigation of the river: this part of the parish derives its name of Iron-Bridge from this stupendous undertaking. About two miles south-eastward from Madeley, at the junction of the Shropshire canal with the Severn, is Coalport, where coal is landed from the extensive mines and numerous works in the neighbourhood, and conveyed thence to different parts of the counties of Gloucester and Worcester, annually to the average extent of fifty thousand tons; here is likewise a porcelain manufactory, which affords employment to nearly five hundred persons; a manufactory of Wedgwood's ware, a ropeyard, timber-yard, and a mill for extracting linseed oil, which is turned by a wheel two hundred and forty feet in circumference. A neat iron bridge was constructed across the river at this point in 1817, instead of a former one of wood; and not far distant a tunnel, about one mile in length, and partially arched with brick, was begun and intended as a more direct conveyance for coal, but was never completed; from the interstices at the sides, tar flows, and falling on the surface of a small stream, which runs in a narrow channel at the entrance, is there deposited, and at convenient periods is collected, and put into barrels; when the tunnel was first formed, the quantity obtained exceeded one barrel per diem, but now it is not more than twenty barrels per annum. The original market having fallen into disuse, it was revived about 1763, when a new market-house was erected, near the foot of the iron bridge in Colebrookdale, two miles distant from the site of the first structure, and named Madeley-wood market. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held January 26th, May 29th, and October 12th. This place is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests, for the recovery of debts under 40s., which extends over the parishes of Broseley, Benthall, Madeley, Barrow, Linley, Willey, Little Wenlock, and Dawley, and the extra-parochial place called Posnall, held under an act passed in the 22nd of George III.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £4. 17. 10., and in the patronage of — Kynaston, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints; the ancient structure, which exhibited several specimens of early Norman architecture, was pulled down in 1796, when the present edifice was erected. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, also a Roman Catholic chapel. The house of industry was completed in 1797, at an expense of £1086. 14. 7½., on a piece of ground belonging to the poor; of this sum, £806. 13. 6. was raised by subscription, and £235. 15. by the sale, for nine hundred and ninety-nine years, subject to nominal rents, of certain property previously held in trust for the benefit of the poor. In the different strata of coal, iron-ore, and sand-stone, which abound in this neighbourhood, numerous petrifications, with impressions of animal and vegetable substances, of various kinds, have been found. The Rev. John William Fletcher, a native of Switzerland, whose work, entitled "Checks to Antinomianism," is a standard theological work, and whose character is so universally known and so deservedly admired, was appointed to the vicarage of Madeley in 1760, which preferment he held during the remainder of his life, and at his death, in 1785, was interred in the churchyard.

MADINGLEY, a parish in the hundred of NORTH-STOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, 3½ miles (W.N.W.) from Cambridge, containing 231 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £6. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MADLEY, a parish in the hundred of WEBTREE, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Hereford, containing 938 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Tiberton, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £16. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a large and handsome edifice, principally in the decorated style, with an embattled tower at the west end. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The petty sessions for the division are held here on every fourth Monday.

MADRESFIELD, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Upton upon Severn, containing 202 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £3. 13. 11½. Earl Beauchamp was patron in 1793. The church exhibits some portions of ancient architecture. Ann Bull, in 1705, bequeathed £25, for the produce of which six children are taught to read. Madresfield Court, a fine ancient mansion, is the seat of Earl Beauchamp.

MADRON, a parish in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, 2¼ miles (N. W.) from Penzance, containing, exclusively of the market town of Penzance, which is within this parish, 2011 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Morva and Penzance, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £21. 5. 10. Henry Penneck, Esq. was patron in 1812. The church, dedicated to St. Madern, is in the early style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school for instructing the poor children of the parish was founded, about 1704, by Mr. George Daniel, and endowed with lands and premises, now let for about £120 per annum, besides a house and garden for the master. Here is a stone with an ancient British inscription, stating it to be a sepulchral monument to Rialobran, son of Cunoval; also the once celebrated well of St. Madern.

MAER, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, comprising the township of Maer, and the hamlet of Maerway-Lane, and containing 451 inhabitants, of which number, 232 are in the township of Maer, 7 miles (N. N. W.) from Eccleshall. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of J. Wedgwood, Esq. The river Tern has its source in a small lake here, which covers about twenty-two acres.

MAERWAY-LANE, a hamlet in the parish of MAER, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, containing 219 inhabitants.

MAGHULL, a chapelry in the parish of HALSALL, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Ormskirk, containing 720 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Halsall, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £2100 parliamentary grant. William Harpur, by deed in 1815, vested an annuity of £11. 18. 1. in certain trustees, for the education of children.

MAGOR, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Caerleon, containing, with the chapelry of Redwick, 622 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Redwick, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £7. 1. 0½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

MAIDEN-BRADLEY, a parish partly in the hundred of NORTON-FERRIS, county of SOMERSET, but chiefly in that of MERE, county of WILTS, 5¾ miles (N. by W.) from Mere, containing, with the hamlet of Yarnfield, 620 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church, dedicated to All Saints, contains some monuments of the Seymour family, particularly a finely-executed one to Sir Edward Seymour, Bart., of political celebrity in the reigns of Charles II., William and Mary, and Anne. At the north-eastern extremity of the village are the remains, now forming part of a farmhouse, of an hospital, founded by Manasser Bisset, in the reign of Henry II., and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, for poor leprous women, under the care of some Secular brethren; but Herbert, Bishop of Sarum, about 1190, substituted for the latter a prior and canons of the Augustine order, whose revenue, at the dissolution, was estimated at £197. 18. 8.: the situation is very romantic, and there are numerous sites of ponds in the vicinity. There are two singular knolls of chalk, which appear to have been detached by a convulsion of nature from Mere down, distant three quarters of a mile, the intervening soil having no tendency to chalk.

Corporate Seal.

MAIDENHEAD, a market town and chapelry, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Bray and Cookham, county of BERKS, 13 miles (N. E. by E.) from Reading, and 26 (W.) from London; it is partly in the parish of Bray, and partly in that of Cookham, with which parishes the population is returned. The ancient name of this place was South Allington, or Ealington, to distinguish it from a manor called Allington, a mile north of the town. According to Leland, its present appellation was acquired from the great reverence paid here to the head of a British virgin, who was one of the eleven thousand maidens said to have suffered martyrdom with St. Ursula. But in ancient records it is called Mayden-hithe, confirming the more probable opinion, that the name of the place refers to its having been an extensive wharf for timber: a bridge was erected over the Thames previously to the year 1297, which consisted of timber, and a tree was allowed annually out of Windsor Forest for its repair. Being situated on one of the great western roads, it was the seat of much contention during the troubles of the seventeenth century: at the Greyhound Inn in this town, the unfortunate Charles I. had his last interview with his family; and in 1688, the bridge was fortified, and a few Irish soldiers were posted upon it, in order to impede the progress of the Prince of Orange to the metropolis, who, however, deserted their post and cannon in the night, on hearing a Dutch march beat by the townsmen. This structure was succeeded by the present elegant edifice, consisting of seven semicircular arches of stone, with three smaller arches of brick at each end, built by the corporation, from a design and under the direction of Sir Robert Taylor, in 1772, at an expense of about £20,000; the central arch separating the counties of Berks and Buckingham: by an act of parliament passed that year the corporation were authorised to transfer the tolls received from vessels passing under the bridge to the road over it. The town, situated on the road to Bath, consists principally of one street, which extends from the bridge to the bottom of Folley hill, separating the two parishes, the north side being in that of Cookham, and the south in that of Bray: it is lighted and paved, and is now the great thoroughfare from the metropolis to Bath, Bristol, and the West of England. The adjacent country is in a high state of cultivation, and is richly adorned with woodland scenery, interspersed with elegant villas. The trade is principally in malt, corn, meal, and timber, which articles are conveyed by water to London; and the interests of the town are further promoted by the daily passage of not less than sixty-eight coaches, and by its proximity to the Thames, which skirts its eastern extremity. The market, established by letters patent of Henry VI., is on Wednesday: there are three fairs, each of which continue for three days, and commence respectively on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week, for horses, horned cattle, and pigs; September 29th, for horses, cattle, and the hiring of servants; and November 30th, for horses and other cattle. The principal inhabitants of this town, with some of the inmates of the priory of Hurley, were constituted a guild, or fraternity, so early as 1352, by letters patent of Edward III.; their principal object being to keep the bridge in proper repair and uphold the chantries, for which purpose a toll was granted at the bridge, on the river, and on all commodities sold in the market: these privileges were confirmed and extended by Henry VI., suspended at the Reformation, and renewed by Elizabeth, who four years afterwards granted the first charter of incorporation, with the style of warden, bridge-masters, and burgesses; which charter was renewed by James I., and with still farther privileges by Charles II. The charter of the present corporate body, which consists of eleven burgesses, out of whom are chosen annually a mayor and two bridge-masters, with power to appoint a high steward, recorder, town clerk, and other officers, was granted by James II. The mayor, who is both clerk of the market and coroner, the late mayor, the high steward, and the recorder, are justices of the peace, and hold a session quarterly in the town hall, a handsome and commodious structure, under which the market is held. Under the charter of James II. the mayor and corporation have power to hold a court of record on Friday, every three weeks, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £20. Petty sessions for the division are held here by the county magistrates, on the second and fourth Monday, in every month. There is a small gaol for the temporary confinement of criminals.

The chapel, dedicated to St. Andrew and St. Mary Magdalene, is of modern erection, and presents a good specimen of ancient English architecture: it was erected by subscription, aided by a grant of £500 from the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels, on the condition that four hundred of the sittings should be free. The present building was erected nearly on the site of the former chapel, which was taken down in consequence of its being too small for the accommodation of the inhabitants, and forming an obstruction in the public road. The living is a perpetual curacy, within the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, endowed with £490 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and a small annual payment from the Exchequer; it has a commodious residence, built by the corporation for the use of the incumbent. The chapel is furnished with a very excellent organ, the bequest of Lady Ann Pocock, and ornamented with a very fine altar-piece, painted and presented by Isaac Pocock, Esq., of Maidenhead Bridge: the incumbent is styled "the Chaplain of the free chapel of Maidenhead, and is presented by the Corporation." The establishment dates its origin at a very early period: it had originally a chantry, dedicated to St. Andrew, built by Margaret of France, sister of Philip the Fair, and second consort of Edward I. of England, upon a piece of ground granted by that king out of his manors of Bray and Cookham, the letters patent of which grant were confirmed by her grandson, Richard II., and which still exists, under the great seal of that monarch, with the muniments of the corporation: a chantry, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, was annexed, in the reign of Edward III., with a bequest of one hundred marks, to the priory of Hurley, to provide a priest to say mass in the chapel. It is a curious fact that in the protestant reign of Elizabeth, new letters patent were granted by that queen to this religious fraternity, confirming all former privileges, with its ancient Roman Catholic rights, which instrument still exists; but this resuscitation continued only for four years, when the guild was abolished, and a lay corporation substituted. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, those in the late Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, and Independents. An almshouse for eight poor men and their wives was founded, in 1659, by James Smyth, Esq.; the original endowment of £40 per annum was augmented with £8 per annum for fuel, by Mrs. Smyth: the trust of this charity is vested in the Master and Wardens of the Salters' Company. A National school is well supported, partly by contribution, and partly by an endowment of £30 per annum, from an estate given by Abraham Spooore, for educating and apprenticing poor boys, producing about £60 per annum, and a rent-charge of £5 per annum, the bequest of Elizabeth Merry, in 1686, for educating five boys. Sir Isaac and Lady Pocock bequeathed property for supplying poor persons weekly with bread, and one hundred families with bread, meat, and coal, at Christmas; also £50 in small sums to the aged and infirm, at the commencement of every year. A Sunday school was established and endowed by Lady Pocock, for thirty girls; and every two years a bounty of £100, in sums of £10 each, is given to ten female servants of good character, who shall have lived in the same family for a period of seven years: other bounties are derived from the same source by the county and neighbourhood, which do not immediately apply to the town, viz. £30 a year to the parish of Cookham, and £50 per annum to the widows and orphans of poor clergymen of the county of Berks.

MAIDEN-NEWTON, a parish in the hundred of TOLLERFORD, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Dorchester, containing 520 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £30. 5., and in the patronage of Lord Ilchester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient cruciform structure, with a large embattled tower rising from the intersection. Near it is the rectory-house, a spacious antique building, the windows exhibiting the arms of Wadham, Wyndham, &c., in stained glass. The privilege of holding a market was granted in the 5th of Henry III., and subsequently a fair for cattle on November 22d; the former has been long disused. George Browne, in 1774, bequeathed a rent-charge of £21 for teaching ten poor children.

MAIDEN-WELL, a parish in the Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Louth. The population is returned with Farforth. The living is a discharged vicarage with the rectory of Farforth, united in 1753 to the rectory of Ruckland, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln.

MAIDFORD, a parish in the hundred of GREENS-NORTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Towcester, containing 319 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £8. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Rev. Sampson Henry White. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

MAIDSTONE, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Maidstone, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, of which it is the county town, 8 miles (S.) from Rochester, and $34\frac{1}{2}$ (S. E. by E.) from London, containing, according to the last census, 12,508 inhabitants, and now about

Seal and Arms.

14,000. Some writers have supposed this to be the Caer Meguiad, or Megwad, enumerated by Nennius among the principal cities in Britain. Camden considers it to be the Vagniacæ mentioned in the second Itinerary of Antoninus: modern authors, however, are doubtful relative to the accuracy of this latter opinion, on a supposition that that celebrated antiquary had mistaken the Watling-street road for another Roman road passing this town to London, from the Portus Lemanis, which had become the landing-place for the Romans after the Portus Rutupensis and Dubris had fallen into disuse. All, however, allow Maidstone to have been occupied by the Romans, and that it was, at an early period, a place of considerable note. Several Roman coins and urns have been found in the neighbourhood. The Saxons named it Medwegestun, a town on the Medwege, or middle river, now Medway. In Domesday-book it is written Meddestane; and in records of the time of Edward I., Maydenestane, from which the transition to its present appellation is easy. Among the historical events which contribute to distinguish this place, may be mentioned the celebrated meeting held on Penenden heath, about a mile north-eastward from the town, for the purpose of adjusting the differences that had arisen between Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Odo, Earl of Kent, brother of the Conqueror, in consequence of the appropriation by the latter of various lands and privileges previously enjoyed by the primate, and which this assembly decided should be restored. During the reign of Mary, Maidstone was deprived of its charter, in consequence of the firmness the inhabitants evinced in support of the Protestant cause, by opposing the queen's marriage with Philip of Spain: many of them were put to death, and Sir Thomas Wyatt, who had excited them to make a stand in favour of their religious principles, was executed on Hay hill, London, and his estates were confiscated. In 1648, the town was stormed by Fairfax, at the head of ten thousand of the parliamentary forces, and taken, after a most obstinate resistance on the part of the royalists.

The town, which is well paved and lighted, and consists chiefly of four large streets, stands principally on the eastern bank of the river Medway, over which is a bridge of five arches. The inhabitants are plentifully supplied with excellent water, conveyed from a reservoir at Rocky hill, about half a mile from the town, by means of pipes laid across the bed of the Medway. The gas-works were constructed by, and at the expense of, an individual named Gosling, and afterwards sold to a number of the inhabitants, who, by an act of parliament, were constituted The Maidstone Gas-light and Coke Company. Pleasantly situated on the bank of the Medway are the barracks, used as a depôt for the king's regiments of cavalry serving in the East Indies, and at the Cape of Good Hope, and for drilling recruits previously to embarkation: the establishment consists of a commandant, staff-captain, paymaster, surgeon, adjutant, riding-master, and commissioned and non-commissioned officers. The building is principally of wood, painted white, and, amidst the trees that ornament the ground, has a very picturesque appearance. Opposite the barrack, on the other side of the road, are the county ball-rooms, built in 1819. The theatre, a neat small building, is opened every third year, for a limited number of nights. In 1824, a philosophical society was established, which has been dissolved. The river Medway being navigable up to the town for large hoys, Maidstone enjoys all the advantages of a cheap communication by water with the metropolis. A very large quantity of paper, and that of the finest kind, is made here; and many of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of blankets, thread, hop-bagging, ropes, linseed-oil, and oil-cakes; and a considerable trade is carried on in corn, timber, grocery, orchard-fruit, and hops; for the production of which two latter, the soil in the neighbourhood is particularly favourable. Formerly this town was celebrated for a distillery of gin, which partook of the flavour of Holland, and was much in demand, but the establishment has been broken up. The market for corn and hops is held on Thursday, under part of the Mitre Inn; and at the back of these premises, that for provisions, on Thursday and Saturday: the market for cattle is on the second Tuesday in each month; and the fairs are, February 13th, May 12th, June 20th, and October 17th, for cattle and pedlary, and the last for hops: during the fairs, a court of pie-powder is held for their regulation.

This town was incorporated, in 1549, by Edward VI. Several charters were granted to it by succeeding monarchs; and under that of George II., in 1748, by which it is now governed, the civil power is vested in a mayor, recorder, twelve jurats, and forty common council-men, assisted by a town clerk and other officers. The mayor (who must be elected from amongst the jurats), the recorder, and the three senior jurats, are justices of the peace, and the mayor is also coroner and clerk of the market. The corporation hold quarter sessions for the trial of persons charged with offences not capital; also a court of pleas every alternate Tuesday, which takes cognizance of "all and all manner of actions, personal and mixed, and of granting replevins;" the jurisdiction of which includes the parishes of Maidstone, Allington, Barming, Boxley, East Farleigh, Linton, Looze, and Otham, and the hamlets of Mill Hale and New Hythe. A court leet is held annually, at which constables for the town are chosen. The assizes for the county, and the quarter sessions for the western division, are also held here. The shire-hall, near which malefactors are executed, stands on that part of Penenden heath which is in the parish of Boxley: it is a neat edifice of stone, rebuilt in 1830, but not larger, nor more commodious, than the former. Maidstone returns two members to parliament: the right of election is in the freemen not receiving alms; their number, of whom five hundred are resident, is about nine hundred: the mayor is the returning officer. The freedom is obtained by apprenticeship, and is enjoyed by the eldest son of a freeman, by right of primogeniture; and by the younger sons, on paying forty shillings each: strangers are admitted, with the consent of the corporation, on the payment of a fine. The county elections also take place here. The new county gaol, situated at the end of the town, on the road leading to Rochester, and built of rag-stone procured on the spot, was finished in 1818, at an expense of £200,000: it encloses within its walls fourteen acres of ground, and contains thirty-four wards and four hundred and fifty cells for males, and seven wards and eighty-two cells for females, besides a tread-mill, at which eighty persons may work together: the average number of prisoners is three hundred and fifty, and the annual expenditure from £4000 to £5000. New courts, in which the assizes are held, have lately been built in front of the gaol.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, situated at the south-western end of the town, is dedicated to All Saints, and is the largest in the county, but when built is not with certainty known. Archbishop Courtenay obtained leave of Richard II. to convert the parochial church into a collegiate one, for the warden, chaplain, &c., of the college which he had here founded, on which occasion he probably added the chancel. The church had formerly two chantries, one founded in 1366, by Robert Vinter, of the parish of Boxley, and the other about 1405, by Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury; on the dissolution of the college, the church was again used for its original purpose. From the tower formerly rose a spire eighty feet high, covered with lead, which was destroyed by lightning, November 2nd, 1730. The altarpiece, painted by Mr. William Jefferys, a native of this town, justly excites admiration. In the vestry-room is the parochial library, considerably augmented, in 1735, by a collection of books left by Dr. Bray, perpetual curate of St. Botolph's, Aldgate, and the founder of parochial libraries, to any corporate town in the south of England, that should pay £50 to his executors; the inhabitants of Maidstone, having raised a subscription for the purpose, availed themselves of this conditional bequest: amongst other scarce works, the library contains a copy, given by the corporation, of Bishop Walton's Polyglott Bible, published about 1630. A new church, containing one thousand two hundred free seats, and eight hundred others, has been recently built, at an expense of about £13,000. There are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Unitarians.

The free grammar school was founded in the reign of Edward VI., by the corporation, who purchased, for £205. 4s., the house and lands that belonged to the fraternity of Corpus Christi: this sum, which was the proceeds of the sale of jewellery, plate, &c., of the college founded by Archbishop Courtenay, in 1396, was given to the corporation by the commissioners appointed, on the dissolution of this college, to superintend the sale of its effects, for the benefit of the crown, on condition of their founding and endowing a school. The master, who must be a clergyman of the established church, receives from the corporation an annual stipend of £20; he is likewise entitled to the rent of sixteen acres of land in Romney-Marsh, pursuant to the will of Dr. John Davy, proved in 1649; and £6 a year arising from the purchase of the land tax of the living of Hoo, near Rochester, given by Mr. John Rice, in 1805; he has also a house rent-free. The school has two scholarships in University College, Oxford, founded agreeably to the will, dated December 15th, 1618, of the Rev. Robert Gunsley, rector of Tilsey, Surrey, who bequeathed the rectory and parsonage of Flamstead, Herts, to the master and fellows of the above college, for founding four scholarships of £15 per annum each, with chambers; two in favour of this school, and two for that at Rochester; directing, nevertheless, that preference should be given to the founder's kindred, wherever born; and afterwards limiting the benefit of his bequest to natives of the county of Kent. The will further provides, that the master and fellows of this college shall appoint a curate to the church of Flamstead, with a salary of £60 per annum; and that, on a vacancy occurring in the curacy, those who have been appointed to the scholarships shall have the option of refusing it. In 1827 was instituted a subscription academy, of which the following are the prominent particulars: it consists of one hundred shares of £20 each, transferable on certain conditions: shareholders are entitled to nominate a pupil for each share, paying annually ten guineas per share, including books and all expenses: the management is vested in a committee of proprietors, a treasurer, and a secretary: the masters are nominated by the committee, but elected by proprietors at a general meeting; the head master must be a graduate of the University of Oxford or Cambridge, and in orders, and his fixed salary is £225 a year; that of the second master is £195; and that of the third, £60; but when the number of pupils exceeds fifty, an addition of £3, £2, and £1, for each, is made to the salaries of the masters respectively. The education is English, classical, and mathematical: lectures are delivered, monthly at least, by the masters, on literature and the arts and sciences; and public examinations of the pupils take place in the week previous to the vacations at Midsummer and Christmas: the French language, drawing, dancing, music, and other accomplishments are taught, and paid for extra: none are admitted under six years of age; and the masters are allowed to take pupils of the institution as boarders, under certain regulations.

The Blue-coat school, founded in 1711, by the Rev. Dr. Woodward, for clothing and educating fifty-three boys and forty-three girls, has an annual permanent income of £138. 10., under the management of seven trustees, and is further supported by donations and subscriptions. The Green-coat school, for clothing and educating twelve boys and twelve girls is supported by subscription. Sir Charles Booth's school, endowed by him in 1795, with the interest of £2000 (now augmented to more than £3000) is under the direction of trustees, and affords instruction to thirty-five boys and thirty-five girls; and the Brown-coat school, for clothing and educating twenty-four boys and twenty-four girls, and educating, in addition, about two hundred boys and one hundred girls, is supported by contributions among the dissenters. A National and a Lancastrian school are also supported by voluntary contributions. There are several societies for the relief of the indigent; a savings' bank; and ten benefit societies, composed of nearly one thousand six hundred members. The almshouses founded and endowed are, six by Sir John Banks, Bart., a native of this town, and one of its representatives in several parliaments, who, by will in 1697, bequeathed the clear yearly income of £60, for six aged persons of both sexes, with comfortable habitations; six by Edward Hunter, Esq., in 1748, for three poor men, and the same number of women, with £8 per annum to each; four by John Brenchley, Esq., in 1789, for aged men, with £12 per annum to each; and three by Mrs. Duke, for decayed gentlewomen.

Maidstone contains but few objects to gratify the researches of the antiquary. The palace, which was formerly the residence of the archbishops of Canterbury, was commenced, in 1348, by Archbishop Ufford, and finished by Simon Islip; it now forms two dwelling-houses. An hospital for pilgrims, or travellers, was founded in 1244, or, according to some, in 1260, by Boniface of Savoy, Archbishop of Canterbury, and dedicated to St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Thomas the Martyr. Walter Reynolds, a successor of Boniface in that see, appropriated to the hospital the churches of Sutton, Lillington, alias Linton, and East Farleigh: the revenue was afterwards transferred to the college founded by Archbishop Courtenay. There are some doubts as to the exact situation of this hospital, but the best authorities suppose it to have stood in the West Borough; it was called the hospital of the New work of Prestes Helle: its remains are extensive, including a large building, almost perfect, probably the chapel: a dwelling-house erected on part of the site is still known by the name of Newark. The college, which possessed various lands and advowsons, was dissolved, according to one account, about 1538; but the best evidence is in favour of its dissolution about 1546, when an act was passed for the suppression of all colleges, free chapels, and chantries: it is now used as a farm-house, and appears to have been a fine specimen of decorated English architecture. The house of the fraternity of Corpus Christi, now used as the free grammar school, was founded by a few of the inhabitants: the religious of both sexes of this fraternity professed the rules of St. Benedict, and their number was from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and thirty. A small part of St. Faith's church, considered by some parochial, though the best accounts call it a free chapel, is still remaining: it was, at successive periods, used as a place of worship by the Walloons, who settled in this town in the reign of Elizabeth, and by English Presbyterians: in digging the foundation for a soap-manufactory, near to the ground on which it stood, several human skeletons were found.

The Rev. William Newton, some time vicar of Gillingham, in Dorsetshire, who, in 1751, published the History and Antiquities of Maidstone, was born in this town. Also William Woollet, whose talents as an artist obtained for him the honourable appointment of engraver to the king, and to whose memory a monument, finely executed by Banks, was erected in the cloisters of Westminster abbey: the Niobe, from Wilson's celebrated picture; the Death of Wolfe; and the Fishery, are considered the most masterly of his productions: he died in 1785, in his fiftieth year, and was interred in St. Pancras' churchyard, London. James Jefferys, son of the above-mentioned William, who painted the altarpiece in the church, was also born here; he far excelled his father in the art of painting, and his bold outline pen-drawings are considered equal to those of the celebrated Mortimer. In the churchyard of this town are deposited the remains of William Shipley, Esq., who resided here, and was the founder of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. Maidstone gives the title of viscount to the Earl of Winchelsea.

MAIDWELL, a parish in the hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, 10 miles (N.) from Northampton, containing 279 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10. 8. 1½., and in the patronage of Henry Hungerford Holdish Hungerford, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is good lime and building stone in the parish. In a place called the Dales is a petrifying spring, and a chalybeate spring near Scotland wood.

MAINSFORTH, a township in the parish of BISHOP'S MIDDLEHAM, north-eastern division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 8¾ miles (S.E.) from Durham, containing 44 inhabitants. The Little Skerne runs through the township: this rivulet was anciently diverted from its original course to form a deep fosse round a circular fortification, still called the Mainfort, situated on a commanding eminence, and supposed to have been successively occupied by the Romans and the Danes: it comprises an area of about sixteen acres, exclusively of out-works, of which vestiges have frequently been discovered. Some years ago a pair of moose deer horns was found in a cave called the Dane's hole, on the summit of the fort. On an adjoining hill is an old house, called the Swan-house, where certain dues to the convent of Durham, and afterwards to the chapter, were formerly paid. Limestone abounds in the parish.

MAINSTONE, a parish partly in the hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, and partly in the hundred and county of MONTGOMERY, containing 451 inhabitants, 4¾ miles (W. by S.) from Bishop's Castle. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4, and in the patronage of the Earl of Powis. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

MAISEY-HAMPTON, county of GLOUCESTER.—See HAMPTON (MAISEY).

MAISMORE, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DUPSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, 2¾ miles (N.N.W.) from Gloucester, containing 404 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Gloucester. The church, dedicated to St. Giles, is partly Norman, but principally in the decorated and later English styles. A branch of the navigable river Severn is here crossed by a bridge.

MAKER, a parish partly in the southern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, and partly in the hundred of ROBOROUGH, county of DEVON, 2¼ miles (S. by W.) from Devonport, containing, with the town of Milbrook, and the tything of Vaultershome, 3018 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £23. 11. 0½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Macra, is in Devonshire, and, occupying a commanding site on a hill between Mount Edgcumbe and Ramhead, its steeple serves as a land-mark, and in time of war is used as a signal-house. There are some interesting monuments to the Edgcumbe family, whose title of Earl is derived from their noble domain in this parish, which exhibits the grandest and most beautiful scenery, and from which there is an extensive prospect southward, over Cawsand bay and the channel; Eddystone lighthouse, distant twelve miles, being also conspicuous. The commander of the Spanish Armada was so captivated by the appearance of the mansion and grounds of Mount-Edgcumbe from the sea, that he determined on appropriating them to himself, as a reward for the victory which he anticipated. Mount-Edgcumbe house, built in the reign of Mary, was the last garrison but one (Salcombe) which held out for Charles I. The parish is bounded on the south-east by Plymouth sound, for the defence of which there is a formidable battery on the heights above the village of Maker. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. At the populous village of Inceworth, which was formerly a market town, is a fair for cattle on May 1st; and another at Milbrook, also an ancient market town, on September 29th, when courts leet and baron are held for that ancient borough and the manor of Inceworth, at which a portreeve, constables, and other officers, are chosen.

MALBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of STANBOROUGH, county of DEVON, 4 miles (S.W. by S.) from Kingsbridge, containing, with the chapelry of Salcombe, 1552 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of West Allington, in the archdeaconry of Totnes, and diocese of Exeter. The church, which has a spire ninety feet high, stands on a commanding eminence near Bolt-head, on the English channel. Here is an endowed school for eight children. There are slight remains of Ilton castle, erected about 1336; also of another, called Fort Charles, repaired by Charles I., at an expense of £3000; during the civil war, it was captured by the forces of the parliament in 1645. Lord Viscount Courtenay holds a court of Admiralty here for an extensive line of coast. In some parts of the parish lemons, oranges, citrons, and olives, flourish in the open air, having only temporary protection in very severe weather. A plant of the Mediterranean aloe having here attained the height of twenty-seven feet, blossomed before it was quite twenty years old, and then withered away, leaving numerous suckers at its root.

MALDEN, a parish in the second division of the hundred of KINGSTON, county of SURREY, 2½ miles (N. by W.) from Ewell, containing 250 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Chessington, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £8. 5., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Merton College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. John: near it is the site of the original establishment of Merton College, founded in 1264, and removed to Oxford in 1267. A small but rapid stream, called the Hogs-Mill river, rises in this parish, and falls into the Thames at Kingston. In the chapelry of Chessington is a powerful chalybeate spring, termed Jessop's well, once much celebrated, but now almost forsaken. A free school is maintained by the vicar; and a National school, is supported by annual contributions.

MALDON, a borough, port, and market town, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Dengie, county of ESSEX, 10 miles (E.) from Chelmsford, and 38 (E.N.E.) from London, containing 1398 inhabitants. This place is, by Camden, in which opinion he is supported by Horsley, supposed to have been the Camalodunum of the Romans, one of the earliest colonies established by that people in Britain, and which other antiquaries have fixed at Colchester. Its name is said to have been derived from an altar dedicated to Mars, under the name of Camulus, by which also that divinity is designated in some coins, still extant, of Cunobeline, King of the Trinobantes, who, prior to the conquest of the Romans, had his royal residence in the town. During its occupation by the Romans, in the reign of Nero, it was destroyed by an insurrection of the Britons, who defeated, with great slaughter, the ninth Roman Legion, which had been sent to its assistance. From the Roman name Camalodunum, it was called by the Saxons Meal dune, or Male dune, from which its present appellation is evidently derived. During the time of the Saxons, it does not appear to have been distinguished by any events of importance previously to its destruction by the Danes, from which it was restored by Edward the Elder, son of Alfred, who, to guard it against future attacks, fortified it with a castle, of which there are at present no visible remains. The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence, near the confluence of the rivers Blackwater and Chelmer, and consists principally of one spacious street, extending for more than a mile from west to east, intersected by a smaller street; the houses, which were in general ancient, have been much improved in their appearance, and within the last half-century, many ranges of handsome modern houses have been erected: the town is partially paved, and amply supplied with water from several wells lately made. A library was founded by Dr. Thomas Plume, who bequeathed all his books and pictures to this town, with £2 per annum for the purchase of additional volumes, and £40 per annum as a salary to a librarian in holy orders, who should reside in the town; and there are some book societies, which together constitute the chief sources of recreation. The haven, formed by the bay of the Blackwater river, affords safe anchorage to vessels not drawing more than eight feet of water; ships of heavier burden anchor in the offing, and discharge their cargoes by lighters on the quay: the trade of the port is principally in coal, of which, not less than ninety thousand chaldrons are, on the average, imported annually; also in corn, deals, and iron. There is an excellent fishery, extending for more than twenty miles along the coast, and oysters of very superior quality, called the Wall-fleet oysters, are found here in abundance. The custom-house is a neat brick building. A canal from Haybridge to Chelmsford passes within a mile of the town. The market, principally for corn, is on Saturday: the fairs are on May 1st, for horses, cattle, and sheep, and on the 13th and 14th of September.

Admiralty Seal.

The town was made a free borough by William de Mandeville, Earl of Essex, in the reign of Henry III., and exempted from all foreign service, except finding one ship for the use of the king, for forty days: it received its first charter of incorporation from Henry II., and another from Queen Mary, in 1553; which being forfeited in the 4th of George III. the town remained for forty-six years without a charter, till in 1810, when the present charter was granted, by which the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, six aldermen, and eighteen capital burgesses, assisted by a town clerk, chamberlain, water bailiff, and other officers. The mayor is chosen annually by the aldermen and capital burgesses, the aldermen by the mayor and capital burgesses, and the capital burgesses by the mayor and aldermen: the mayor, the recorder, and the two senior aldermen, are justices of the peace within the borough: the freedom is inherited by birth, and obtained by marriage with a freeman's daughter, by servitude, by purchase, or by gift. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session, on the days before those for the county, for offences not capital; and have power to hold a court of record, for the recovery of debts to any amount; but this privilege has not been exercised under the new charter: a court leet, with view of frank-pledge, is also held, at which a headborough and constables are appointed. The borough, besides its jurisdiction on land, extends twenty-five miles to sea, to the eastward of the Knowle sands. The petty sessions for the hundred of Dengie are held here every Saturday. The town hall is an ancient edifice of brick, built in the reign of Henry VI., called D'Arcy's tower; it contains a neat court for the business of the sessions, a council-room for the meetings of the corporation, and a banquet-room. The custom of borough English prevails here. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 2nd of Edward III., since which time it has continued to return two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the freemen not receiving alms, of whom, resident and non-resident, the number is about three thousand five hundred: the mayor is the returning officer.

The borough comprises the parishes of All Saints, St. Peter, and St. Mary; the two former in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, and the last a royal peculiar, in the jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The living of All Saints is a vicarage, with which that of St. Peter is united, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Rev. C. Matthew. The church is an ancient and spacious structure, in the early Norman and early English styles of architecture, with a triangular tower surmounted by an hexagonal spire; in the south aisle are three chapels, or chantries, founded by Robert D'Arcy, in the reign of Henry VI.: there are various ancient monuments, and a tablet of white marble to the memory of John Vernon, a Turkey merchant, who died in 1653, with a Latin inscription attributing to him the discovery, in the ancient city of Smyrna, of some manuscripts and relics which he brought over to his native country. Edward Bright, a shopkeeper in the town, who died in 1750, aged twenty-nine, was with much difficulty interred in this church: he had attained the unusual weight of forty-four stone; the body was drawn to the church in a carriage upon rollers, and lowered into the vault by means of a triangle and pulleys. The living of St. Peter is a vicarage not in charge, united to that of All Saints. The church has been demolished, the tower only remaining, adjoining to which is the library, erected by Dr. Thomas Plume. The living of St. Mary's is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The church, a spacious and very ancient structure, is said to have been founded prior to the Norman Conquest, by Ingelric, a Saxon nobleman; part of the tower and church was rebuilt in the reign of Charles I. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists.

Ralph Breder, in 1608, bequeathed £300 for the endowment of a free grammar school; to which a rent-charge of £3 was added by Mrs. Anastatia Wentworth; and the farm of Iltney, in the parish of Munden, by Dr. Plume, for the clothing and instruction of six boys of either parish. A National school, in which three hundred children are instructed, is supported by subscription. Dr. Plume bequeathed £2000 for charitable uses, and £100 as a marriage portion for five poor maidens of this parish, and five of the parish of Greenwich, in Kent, who had lived for seven years in one service, and were above twenty-four years of age: there are also other charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. Within less than a mile of the town are the remains of the abbey of Beleigh, founded in 1180, by Robert Mantell, for Premonstratensian canons, and dedicated to St. Nicholas, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £196. 6. 5.: the chapel, which is the most perfect portion of the ruins, is a small edifice, chiefly in the early style of English architecture, with later insertions: the roof is groined, and supported on slender-shafted columns, and gracefully-pointed arches: Henry Bourchier, Earl of Essex, and his Countess, were interred in this chapel; and in digging for gravel in the ground adjoining, some leaden coffins and skeletons were discovered. A priory for Carmelite friars was founded here, in 1292, by Richard Gravesend, Bishop of London, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £26. 0. 8.; but there are no vestiges of it at present, except the garden walls. An hospital for lepers was also founded here by one of the English monarchs, prior to the 16th of Edward II., which, by Edward IV., was annexed to the abbey of Beleigh: the remains, now converted into a barn, exhibit in their structure a mixture of stone and of bricks and tiles, which appear to have been of Roman origin. A gold coin of Nero and Agrippina, and a coin of Vespasian, have been found at this place. To the west of the town are the remains of a camp, through which is the road to Chelmsford: it is of quadrilateral form, including twenty-two acres; three sides of the ramparts are visible, and the fourth is occupied by buildings: on the north is a fine spring, called Cromwell's spring. Dr. Thomas Plume, Archdeacon of Rochester, whose public benefactions to this town have been already recorded, and who founded the Plumean Professorship of Astronomy and Experimental Philosophy at Cambridge, was born at Maldon in 1680, and died in 1704. Maldon gives the inferior title of viscount to the Earl of Essex.

MALHAM, a township in that part of the parish of KIRKBY in MALHAM-DALE which is in the western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Settle, containing 262 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Rowland Brayshaw, in 1717, conveyed land, &c., for the support of a free school, the income arising from which is £49 per annum. The river Aire has its source here, in a fine lake stored with trout and perch: the vicinity abounds with scenery of a romantic character. Malham Cove is a remarkable natural amphitheatre of limestone rock, rising to the height of two hundred and eighty-six feet; at its base issues a small subterranean brook, the passage for which, when flooded, not being capacious enough to discharge its swollen stream, the waters rise to the summit of the rock, and tumble down in a fine cataract.

MALHAM-MOOR, a township in that part of the parish of KIRKBY in MALHAM-DALE which is in the western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Settle, containing 88 inhabitants.

MALLERSTANG, a chapelry in the parish of KIRKBY-STEPHEN, East ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Kirkby-Stephen, containing 243 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £600 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Thanet. The chapel, having fallen to ruin, was repaired in 1663, by the celebrated Countess of Pembroke, who endowed it with lands near Sedbergh in Yorkshire, then worth £11 a year, on condition that the curate should teach the children of the dale to read and write, in a room over the west end of the chapel; and in compliance therewith about thirty are instructed. At Castlethwaite are the ruins of a square tower, that formed part of Pendragon castle, built by Uter Pendragon, in the time of Vortigern, the walls of which are twelve feet thick. It was at one period the seat of the Lords de Clifford, and was burned by the Scots about the year 1541, but was completely repaired in 1661, by the Countess of Pembroke, who also built the bridge across the Eden, and erected the stone pillar on the hill called Morrill's Seat. The castle was dismantled by the Earl of Thanet in 1681: near it is an ancient fortification, surrounded by a moat and vallum. At the southern extremity of the chapelry rises the lofty mountain called Wild Boar fell.

MALLING (EAST), a parish in the hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Maidstone, containing 1403 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 8. 4., and in the patronage of Sir J. Twisden, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. James, is a handsome structure, with a square western tower. A fair for pedlary is held on August 6th. James Tomlyn, in 1752, bequeathed a rent-charge of £5, for teaching poor children; and the Rev. Edward Holme, in 1781, erected, and endowed with lands, a school, in which about fifty children are educated.

MALLING (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of RINGMER, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, 1 mile (N.) from Lewes, containing 620 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1700 parliamentary grant. South Malling constitutes the head of a deanery, the whole of which is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is described as collegiate in Domesday-book, and is said to have been founded by Ceadwalla, King of the West Saxons, who died in 688: it is a small neat edifice, rebuilt on the site of the former, and consecrated May 23rd, 1632. The dean and prebendaries, who, in later times, were under the immediate jurisdiction of the Archbishops of Canterbury, had, at the dissolution, a revenue of £45. 12. 5. The present mansion forms part of the ancient buildings of the deanery, but the refectory, used as a barn, was pulled down many years ago. The Archbishops of Canterbury had formerly a palace here; the chapel has been converted into a cottage.

MALLING (WEST), a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Maidstone, and 29 (S.E. by E.) from London, containing 1205 inhabitants. In the year 1090, a Benedictine nunnery was founded here, by Gundulph, Bishop of Rochester, in honour of the Blessed Virgin; about a century afterwards, the town and the nunnery were nearly destroyed by fire, but soon restored; the revenue of the latter, at the dissolution, was estimated at £245. 10. 2½.: the west front of the abbey, which is of Norman architecture, with later insertions, still remains, forming an interesting ruin. Stone coffins have been dug up here, and rings, with other relics of antiquity, have been discovered. The town is neat and clean and the surrounding walks and scenery are pleasing and picturesque. The market, granted, together with the fairs, to the abbess, in the reign of Henry III., was held on Saturday: fairs are held on August 12th and October 2nd for pedlary, and November 17th for cattle. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of — Bates, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient structure, with a fine Norman tower at the west end: the roof having fallen in 1778, through the decay of the main columns, the whole of the nave was rebuilt. In 1693, Francis Tresse bequeathed land on which to build a school-house, and £40 towards its erection; he also gave a small rent-charge for repairs: it is now conducted on Dr. Bell's system.

MALMESBURY, a borough and market town, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Malmesbury, county of WILTS, 42 miles (N.) from Salisbury, and 94 (W.) from London, containing, exclusively of the chapelries of Corstone and Rodborne, and the tythings of Burton-Hill, Cole with West Park, and Milbourn, in that part of the parish of St. Paul which is without the precincts of the borough, 2514 inhabitants. This place is stated by Leland to have been an ancient British town, which he calls Caer Bladon; but its origin may, with more probability, be ascribed to the period of the Saxon Heptarchy. A castle, called Ingelburne, existed here before the middle of the seventh century; and about 642, Maildolph, an Irish monk, founded a hermitage, and being joined by Aldhelm, nephew of Ina, King of Wessex, they, with the assistance of Lutherius, Bishop of Winchester, erected a monastery, from the names of its founders styled Mealdeimesbyrigg, which has been gradually altered to the modern appellation of Malmesbury. The monastery, which was one of the most considerable in Wiltshire, belonged to the Benedictines: it was splendidly endowed by several princes and noblemen: its abbot was made a mitred parliamentary baron by Edward III.; and its revenue, at the dissolution, amounted to £803. 17. 7. A part of the nave only of the conventual church remains, which has been long used as the parish church. Buildings gradually rose round the abbey, and notwithstanding the town suffered from the incursions of the Danes, who burnt it in the reign of Alfred the Great, it became a place of so much importance as to have obtained a charter from Edward the Elder, which was confirmed by his son Athelstan, who renewed it, and was a munificent benefactor both to the town and the monastery. He bestowed an extensive tract of land, called the Common of King's Heath, on the men of Malmesbury, who had assisted him in gaining a victory over the Danes. In the reign of Henry I., or Stephen, a strong castle was built here by Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, who was obliged to surrender it to the king; and on the invasion of England by Prince Henry, afterwards Henry II., he laid siege to this fortress, and took it after an obstinate defence. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., Malmesbury was a royal garrison, and that prince lodged in the town one night, in 1643. Shortly after, the town was captured by Sir William Waller; but it was re-taken by the royalists, who did not long retain possession of it, for the parliament having recovered it, their troops were stationed here till June 1646.

The town, situated on a pleasant and commanding eminence, is nearly surrounded by two streams, which unite at its southern extremity, and form the Lower Avon. The principal street extends southward from the market-place, near which it is crossed by another street, leading to that part of the town called Westport. These streets are paved and lighted, under the authority of an act of parliament obtained in 1798, and the inhabitants are abundantly supplied with water from wells. In the centre of the market-place is a fine octagonal market-cross, built in the reign of Henry VII., and ornamented with flying buttresses, pinnacles, and an octangular central turret. The manufacture of woollen cloth was anciently carried on here very extensively; and, after it had entirely decayed, it was again introduced, in the latter part of the last century, and now constitutes the chief employment of the lower class. Some trade is carried on in tanning and brewing, and bone-lace is made by the women and children. The market, principally for butchers' meat, is on Saturday; and large cattle markets are held on the last Tuesday in every month, except March, April, and May. Fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep, take place March 28th, April 28th, and June 5th.

The first charter of incorporation was granted by Charles I., but the charter now in force was obtained from William III., in 1696, under which the corporation consists of an alderman, deputy alderman, eleven capital burgesses, and twenty-four assistants, with a high steward and deputy steward. The alderman and his deputy are elected annually on Trinity Tuesday, by the capital burgesses, who are thirteen in all, from their own body. Besides these members of the corporation, there are fifty-two landholders, and an indefinite number of commoners, or free burgesses: the assistant burgesses are chosen from the landholders, and the latter from the commoners, who are the sons, or sons-in-law, of commoners. The steward and deputy steward are elected annually by the capital burgesses. The alderman and deputy alderman, and the steward and deputy steward, are justices of the peace; and the alderman is coroner and clerk of the market. The petty sessions for the hundred of Malmesbury are held here once a month; and a court of requests for the hundred is held every nine weeks, for the recovery of debts under 40s. King's Heath, or Malmesbury common, has been enclosed, pursuant to an act of parliament obtained in 1821; when, after assigning fifty acres for defraying the expense of the enclosure, and for providing for an increase in the number of free burgesses, or commoners, it was subdivided into two hundred and eighty allotments, averaging about one acre and a half each, and an allotment assigned to each commoner, to be used only for tillage, or garden ground. To the east of King's Heath are the Acres, so called from their measure, one acre belonging to each of the assistant burgesses and landholders; and near them are other lands, called Burgess Parts, varying in extent from six to fifteen acres, and belonging, one each, to the capital burgesses. The borough has sent members to parliament ever since the reign of Edward I. By an order of the House of Commons, December 13th, 1722, the right of election was determined to be in the alderman and twelve capital burgesses: the alderman is the returning officer, and the patronage of the borough belongs to Joseph Pitt, Esq., M.P., the present high steward.

The borough comprises the parishes of St. Paul, St. Mary Westport, and the Abbey district, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury. The living of St. Paul's is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £8. 2. 1½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dilapidated, but the tower, surmounted by a lofty spire, is still standing, and contains the bells used on public festivals, &c. The nave of the conventual church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, was purchased, at the dissolution of monasteries, by William Stumpe, a clothier of Malmesbury, and presented to the townspeople for a parish church, under the authority of a license from Archbishop Cranmer. This edifice is chiefly in the Norman style, and has a noble south porch, consisting of receding arches, with sculptured mouldings, and other ornaments. The western porch was of a similar character, but a small portion of it only remains. In the interior, at the east end, is a sepulchral chapel, in which is an ancient tomb with a recumbent crowned statue, ascribed to King Athelstan, who was interred near the high altar of this church. About six years since, the whole fabric was substantially repaired and the vaulted roof and other parts of the interior restored: over the altar has been placed a painting of the Resurrection of Lazarus, presented by the Earl of Suffolk. An addition has lately been made of three hundred and forty-one sittings, three hundred of which are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £350 towards defraying the expense. The living of the parish of Westport is a vicarage, with which the perpetual curacy of Charlton is united, rated in the king's books at £16. 17. 8½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. At Brokenborough, in this parish, there is a chapel of ease. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Moravians, and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school, under the patronage of the corporation, is endowed with £10 per annum, arising from lands belonging to the burgesses, and £10 per annum, the benefaction of Michael Weekes, Esq., in 1695. Another school was founded and endowed, in pursuance of a bequest from Mrs. Elizabeth Hodges, in 1725: the master has a salary of £25 per annum. The corporation have the patronage of an almshouse, endowed with £20 per annum; and Robert Jenner, in 1644, founded eight almshouses, with an endowment of £40 per annum, which has not been paid for nearly fifty years past. There was anciently a convent of the Knights Hospitallers, some small portions of the buildings belonging to which are still standing. Among the distinguished persons connected with the monastery were St. Aldhelm, the second abbot, who died Bishop of Sherborne in 709: Ælfric, a learned abbot in the tenth century, who was made Bishop of Crediton; and William of Malmesbury, precentor to the monastery, the celebrated English historian in the reign of Stephen. Thomas Hobbes, author of the "Leviathan," and other philosophical works, was born here in 1588; and Mrs. Mary Chandler, an ingenious poetess, was also a native of this town. Malmesbury confers the titles of earl and baron on the family of Harris.

MALPAS, a parish in the higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, comprising the townships of Agden, Bickerton, Bickley, Bradley, Broxton, Buckley, or Bulkeley, Chidlow, Cholmondeley, Chorlton, Cuddington, Duckington, Edge, Egerton, Hampton, Larkton, Macefen, Malpas, Newton juxta Malpas, Oldcastle, Overton, Stockton, Tushingham with Grindley, Wichalgh, and Wigland, and containing 3917 inhabitants, of which number, 1127 are in the township of Malpas, 15 miles (S. S. E.) from Chester, and 165 (N. W.) from London. The ancient name of this place was Depenbech, and was of similar import with the present appellation, which signifies a bad pass, or road. This barony, prior to the Conquest, formed part of the possession of Earl Edwin, and was subsequently given by the first Norman Earl of Chester to Robert Fitz-Hugh, one of the eight barons of his parliament: it was soon afterwards divided into two unequal parts, and still continues so. The ancient barons exercised capital jurisdiction within the limits of the barony, and in them was vested (but distinct from their rights as barons of Malpas,) the office of serjeant of the peace for the whole palatinate, excepting the hundreds of Macclesfield and Wirrall: the punishment for capital offences, designated in some records as "the custom of Cheshire," was decapitation, and it was usual to present the heads of felons at the castle of Chester. The jurisdictions have undergone considerable alteration, and the remaining portion of the ancient baronial rights has descended with the manor of Malpas. The castle, the head of the ancient barony, was built soon after the Conquest, and stood immediately adjoining the church; but the only vestige of it is a circular mound, on which the keep stood. In the early part of the sixteenth century the inhabitants suffered severely from the plague, particularly about the year 1625. The town is very pleasantly situated on an eminence on the line of road from Shrewsbury to Chester, and commands an extensive prospect over a great part of North Wales, Staffordshire, and the Vale Royal: it consists of four streets, which diverge at right angles from a common centre, and are well paved; the houses are low and irregularly built; the inhabitants are supplied with water from a public well: the walks are pleasing and picturesque, and frequent instances of longevity attest the salubrity of the atmosphere. The chief occupation of the inhabitants is in agriculture: a copper mine has been recently discovered in the township of Bickerton, in this parish, but its extent and quality have not yet been ascertained. The market is on Wednesday. Fairs are held on April 5th, July 26th, and December 8th, for cattle, linen and woollen goods, toys, and pedlary. Courts leet and baron are held annually, at which constables are appointed, and debts under 40s. recoverable.

The living is a rectory, divided from time immemorial into two portions, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester; the first portion is rated in the king's books at £48. 8. 6½, and the second at £44. 19. 2.; the right of presentation to the higher mediety belongs to the Marquis of Cholmondeley, and T. T. Drake, Esq., alternately, and that to the lower to T. T. Drake, Esq., only: an excellent parsonage-house and glebe land are attached to each portion. The church, which is dedicated to St. Oswald, is a spacious and venerable edifice, in the later style of English architecture; the windows are enriched with elegant tracery, and in the chancel are some ancient oak stalls, niches, and monuments: at the end of the north and south aisles are sepulchral chapels belonging to the families of Cholmondeley and Brereton. There are two chapels of ease in the parish, viz., Chad and Whitewell. A domestic chapel, open for the tenants and neighbours, is attached to Cholmondeley castle, about four miles distant. In the town and parish are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The grammar school was founded early in the seventeenth century, by subscription, to which Hugh, first Earl of Cholmondeley, contributed £200, and receiving the entire sum, amounting to £536. 11., charged an estate, called the Old Hall, with the annual payment of £25. He likewise gave a school-room and residence for the master: in 1795, the school premises were rebuilt and enlarged, at the expense of the present master. This institution is free only to the sons of the representatives of the original subscribers; the master, who is at present appointed by the Marquis of Cholmondeley, likewise receives boarders. Richard Alport, in 1709, bequeathed £500 for the support of a school, in which twelve boys and twelve girls were educated and clothed; the funds having considerably increased, a National school has been established, and the former incorporated with it; the number of children receiving instruction being ninety boys and fifty girls. Dr. Townson, archdeacon of Richmond, and rector of Malpas, bequeathed £500 Old South Sea stock, the dividends on which, amounting now to £16. 14. annually, are applied in clothing and educating children. An almshouse for several poor persons was built by Sir Randle Brereton, in the time of Henry VIII., and endowed by Sir Thomas Brereton, in the reign of Charles I., with a rent-charge in Newton: it was rebuilt in 1721, by Hugh, Earl of Cholmondeley, for six poor widows, who are nominated by the present Marquis, and receive a small weekly allowance; a bequest, by Thomas Poyser, Esq., of the interest of £600 makes an addition of £3 per annum to the income of each of the inmates. In 1748, Miss Eliz. Taylor left £500 for the purpose of clothing poor men in the townships of Malpas and Edge, which sum being invested in the purchase of £771 Old South Sea stock, now produces about £27 per annum: there are several minor benefactions for charitable purposes. The late learned and pious Dr. Heber, Bishop of Calcutta, was a native of this town, his father having been rector of the higher mediety. Philip Henry, the non-conformist, resided at the Broad Oak in this parish, where his son, Matthew Henry, the celebrated commentator on the Bible, was born. Malpas confers the title of viscount on the Marquis of Cholmondeley.

MALPAS, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WENTLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Newport, containing 169 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir C. Morgan, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a tower embattled and crowned with pinnacles: it has a lofty ceiling of wood, richly carved; and in the chancel are some ancient oak stalls. A small establishment of Cluniac monks, a cell to the priory of Montacute, in Somersetshire, was founded here about the time of Henry I., the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £15. 6. 8.

MALSWICK, a tything in the parish of NEWENT, hundred of BOTLOE, county of GLOUCESTER, containing 181 inhabitants.

MALTBY, a chapelry in the parish of RAITHBY, Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (S.W. by S.) from Louth. The population is returned with the parish. Ann Bolle, in 1705, bequeathed certain land, directing the income, after deducting 40s. a year for the poor, to be applied in teaching children. Here was formerly a preceptory of the Knights Templars, to which Ranulph, one of the earls of Chester of that name, was the first benefactor: it afterwards belonged to the Hospitallers.

MALTBY, a township in the parish of STAINTON, western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Yarm, containing 168 inhabitants.

MALTBY, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Hooton-Levet and Maltby, and containing 774 inhabitants, of which number, 679 are in the township of Maltby, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Tickhill. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., and endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant. The Earl of Scarborough was patron in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. Lord Viscount Castleton, in 1714, gave certain waste land for the support of a free school; the income arising from it is £15 a year, for which eight children are instructed.

MALTBY le MARSH, a parish in the Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Alford, containing 199 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 17. 8. The Rev. George Allot was patron in 1822. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MALTON (NEW), a borough and market town in the wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, 18 miles (N. E. by N.) from York, and 213 (N. by W.) from London, containing 4005 inhabitants. This town is of great antiquity: the Roman roads that lead to it, the remains of intrenchments yet visible, and the coins and other relics which have been, and are still, occasionally, discovered, denote its former importance as a Roman station, though the name by which it was distinguished is not known. After the Conquest a castle was built here by one of the family of De Vesci, but it was destroyed by Henry II., and on its site a castellated mansion was erected by Ralph, Lord Eure, in the reign of James I.; of this edifice, the lodge and gateway alone remain. The town was wholly burnt, in 1138, by Archbishop Thurston, who besieged it for the purpose of dislodging the Scots, who had seized and garrisoned the castle: it was rebuilt by Eustace Fitz-John, in the reign of Stephen, and the epithet New was then given to it, by way of distinction from Old Malton. The town is agreeably situated on rising ground, northward of the Derwent, which flows through the adjacent vale, and forms the boundary between the East and North ridings; it is about half a mile in length, clean, and well built. A theatre was erected in 1814, and there is a handsome suite of assembly-rooms, to which a subscription library and news-room are attached. The summit of an eminence, called the Brows, at a short distance, affords an agreeable promenade, and commands a fine prospect of the course of the river and the vale, which is terminated by the Wolds. The river is crossed by a handsome stone bridge, which connects this place with Norton. In the first year of the reign of Anne, the Derwent was made navigable from New Malton to the Ouse; thus affording every facility for the conveyance of corn, butter, hams, and other kinds of provision, which are here shipped for Hull, Leeds, Halifax, and other places; from the former, articles of grocery are brought back, and coal, woollen cloth, stuffs, &c., from Leeds. Here are two iron foundries, and some small manufactories for linen, hats, gloves, and pelts; malt also is made to a limited extent. The market is on Tuesday and Saturday, the latter being the principal day, and it is one of the best in the county for all sorts of provisions, horses, black cattle, and tools for husbandry. Fairs are held on the Saturdays before Palm-Sunday and Whit-Sunday, and October 10th and 11th. The market-place is spacious, and is divided into two parts by the town-hall, the shambles, and St. Michael's church.

The chief officer is the lord's bailiff, who is appointed at a court leet, held for the manor. The general quarter sessions for the North riding are held here: during the sitting of the court, on January 12th, 1785, the central beam of the sessions-house gave way, whereby upwards of three hundred persons were precipitated into the area below, in consequence of which several died, others being maimed for life. The borough sent members to parliament in the 23rd and 26th of Edward I., when the privilege ceased for a time, but it was restored in 1640, by an order of the House of Commons, since which period two members have been regularly returned: the right of election is in the householders, in number about five hundred; the bailiff is the returning officer; the influence of Earl Fitzwilliam is predominant. The borough comprises the parishes of St. Leonard and St. Michael, the livings of which are perpetual curacies, with that of Old Malton, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York. The spire of St. Leonard's church, which is in the form of a truncated cone, is said to have been left incomplete by the architect, lest any addition to it might overbalance the whole edifice. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Methodists, and Unitarians. A spacious workhouse has been erected, and is conducted on a systematic and profitable plan; the poor are furnished with tools, and are obliged to work at their respective trades; the manufacture of linen is somewhat extensive in it. At the foot of the Brows is a mineral spring, the water of which possesses similar properties to that obtained from the wells at Scarborough.

MALTON (OLD), a parish in the wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, 1 mile (N. E.) from New Malton, containing 1064 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with those of St. Leonard and St. Michael in New Malton, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Earl Fitzwilliam. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a very ancient structure, adjoining which are the remains of a priory, founded in 1150, by Eustace Fitz-John, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, for Gilbertine canons, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, amounted to £257. 7. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A free grammar school was founded in the 38th of Henry VIII., by the Archbishop of York, for the instruction of youth in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, with an endowment, now amounting to about £100 per annum, for the maintenance of a master and an usher, the former of whom teaches the classics, and the latter English.

MALVERN (GREAT), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 8 miles (W.) from Worcester, containing, with the chapelry of Newland, 1693 inhabitants. This place is romantically situated on the eastern declivity of a range of hills, separating the counties of Worcester and Hereford and extending from north to south for nearly nine miles, the greatest height being one thousand four hundred and forty feet, and varying from one to two miles in breadth from east to west: of these the most prominent are the Worcestershire and Herefordshire beacons, the summits of which command most extensive and interesting views of the surrounding country; comprehending, in the distance, the counties of Monmouth, Radnor, Brecon, Salop, Warwick, and Stafford; and nearer, the counties of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, with their stately cathedrals, together with the fertile and richly-cultivated tract of country watered by the Severn, and finely clothed with wood. Around the base of the Herefordshire beacon is a double intrenchment, from six to twelve feet deep, and in some places more than thirty feet broad, dug by Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, as a boundary between his portion of Malvern Chase and that belonging to the Bishop of Hereford; and in other parts of these mountains are similar works. The more ancient portion of the village is irregularly built, and consists of houses scattered on the declivity of the mountain; but since the celebrity of the springs and the purity of the air have made it a place of fashionable resort, handsome ranges of modern houses have been erected; and, in detached situations and at different degrees of elevation, several beautiful villas have been built as private summer residences. There are a chalybeate and a bituminous spring, the water of which is remarkable for its purity, and for its gently aperient and diuretic properties: the former is in the eastern part of the village, near the church; the latter, called Holywell, is situated two miles to the south of it; and on the eastern ridge of the hill, and at St. Anne's well, on the north side of the Worcestershire beacon, there are some respectable hotels, and every accommodation has been provided for drinking the waters, and for hot and cold bathing: the public library is a neat building of the Doric order; and in every direction there are romantic and agreeable walks.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Edward Foley, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, formerly the church of the Benedictine abbey, was, at the dissolution, purchased by the inhabitants, and made parochial: it is a venerable and elegant cruciform structure, partly rebuilt under the direction of Sir Reginald Bray, in the reign of Henry VII., and combining the Norman and the later English styles of architecture, with a fine square embattled tower rising from the centre; the exterior is in the later English style, and, with the exception of the south side, which, from its having been anciently concealed by the cloisters of the abbey, is of plainer character, exhibits a good specimen of that style, and the north porch is very rich; the interior retains much of the original character; the nave is in the Norman style, with low massive piers and circular arches; the chancel is in the later English style, and is lighted by a fine range of clerestory windows, with rich and elegant tracery; the east window and that in the north transept are particularly beautiful, and several portions of the ancient stained glass, and of the original wood work in the roof, the carved seats, and other evidences of its antiquity, are remaining. A few years since, the church was repaired and beautified at the expense of the neighbouring gentry, to commemorate which a small window was fitted in, having the arms of the various benefactors superbly emblazoned upon it. It has lately received an addition of three hundred and eighty sittings, of which two hundred and eighty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £260 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Methodists. A Sunday school, in which about ninety children are instructed, and a school of industry, are supported by subscription. Here was a hermitage, endowed by Edward the Confessor, which, after the Conquest, was converted into a Benedictine priory: an abbey and conventual buildings having been erected, in 1083, by Aldewine, the hermit, and endowed by Gislebert, abbot of Westminster, with ample possessions, it became, in consequence, subordinate to the abbey of Westminster, and subsisted till the dissolution, when the revenue was estimated at £375. 0. 6.: of this abbey, the parish church, already noticed; the ancient gateway, a beautiful specimen of the later English style; and the abbey barn, a building in the decorated style; are the remains. A celt, of a metal apparently between brass and copper, about five inches long, with a beautiful patina, and a small ring, was found here, at a considerable depth below the surface of the ground, about the middle of the last century.

MALVERN (LITTLE), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, though locally in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Upton upon Severn, containing 67 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Wallman. The church, dedicated to St. Giles, has been long in decay, part of it forming a beautiful and interesting ruin; it belonged to a Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of Worcester, founded in 1171, in a gloomy cavity near the ancient intrenchment termed the Herefordshire Beacon, by two brothers, Joceline and Edred, who were successively priors here: at the dissolution its revenue was valued at £102. 10. 9. Adjoining the church are some remains of the conventual buildings, converted into a dwelling-house, called Malvern Court. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in the parish.

MAMBLE, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, county of WORCESTER, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Bewdley, containing 386 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Bayton, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £9. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. John. There are extensive coal-works within the parish. Sodington, the ancient seat of the Blounts, was destroyed by fire in the great civil war, by some troops of the parliament. What remained of it was taken down in 1807, when several curious Roman relics were discovered beneath the foundations, whence it seems probable that it was anciently the site of a Roman fort.

MAMHEAD, a parish in the hundred of EXMINS-TER, county of DEVON, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Chudleigh, containing 320 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown, by reason of lunacy. A school here is supported by annual donations, amounting to about £8. On Mamhead point is an obelisk of Portland stone, one hundred feet high, erected by Thomas Balle, Esq., of Mamhead House, in whose grounds are some noble specimens of the Quercus Ilex, and other rare exotics introduced by him from the continent.

MAMILAD, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Usk, containing 237 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united, with that of Trevenith, to the vicarage of Llanover, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff.

MAMHOLE, a hamlet in the parish of BEDWELTY, lower division of the hundred of WENTLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, containing 1764 inhabitants, who are principally employed at the extensive coal and iron works in the neighbourhood.

Seal and Arms.

MAN (ISLE OF), an island annexed to the British dominions, in the Irish sea, and nearly at an equal distance from the English and Irish coasts, in latitude between 54° and 55° (N.), and longitude, about 5° (W.), in the centre of the island: the distance from Douglas to Liverpool (N. W. buoy) is 60 miles, and to St. Bees' Light 42; from the Point of Ayre to the Mull of Galloway 21, and to the Copeland islands at the entrance of Belfast Lough 38, and from the Calf of Man to Dublin 60, to Holyhead 45, and to Liverpool (N. W. buoy) 68: the population, according to the census of 1821, amounted to 40,081. This island, called by Ptolemy Monoeda, or the farther Mona (in contradistinction to the Isle of Anglesea, which also was called Mona), by Pliny Monapia, and by Bede Menavia Secunda, to distinguish it from Anglesea, which he terms Menavia Prima, was, from the rocky, or stony, nature of the soil, called Menang and Manen, from the latter of which its present name is derived. The Britons, by whom it was originally inhabited, practised the superstitious rites of their ancestors under the government of the Druids, till they were converted to Christianity by St. Patrick, who, about the year 440, founded here a church and established a see, of which he appointed St. Germanus bishop. Under St. Germanus and his successors the inhabitants continued for many years to maintain undisturbed possession of the island, till, on the irruption of the northern barbarians, it fell under the dominion of the Scots, and was subsequently annexed to that kingdom by Aydan, who sent his three grandsons hither to be educated by Conan, at that time bishop. In 610, it was wrested from the Scots by Edwin, King of Northumberland, who annexed it to his own dominions; and from this period, for nearly three hundred years, the British historians are silent with respect to any circumstances connected with its history. The Manks' traditions, however, record, during this interval, a succession of twelve petty kings, called Orries, of whom the first was son of the King of Denmark and Norway, an enterprising prince, who, having subdued the Orcades and the Hebrides, took possession of this island also, where he fixed his residence, and enjoyed for many years a reign of uninterrupted tranquillity. Guttred, his son and successor, built the castle of Rushen, in repairing which, in 1815, a beam was discovered by the workmen, inscribed with the date 947. Nothing further is recorded of his reign than that he was interred in the castle which he had built, and was succeeded by his son Reginald, on whose assassination, his younger brother Olave assumed the government; but not having obtained a ratification of his title from the King of Norway, to whom the island was tributary, he was invited to that kingdom, and on his arrival was arraigned and put to death. Olain, his brother, next took possession of this and some other islands, and, after a reign of twenty-three years, died in Ireland, and was succeeded by Allen, who, being poisoned by his governor, made room for Macon, but he refusing to do homage for his crown to Edgar, King of England, was deprived of it, but was soon afterwards restored, and made admiral of the great fleet raised by that monarch to protect the English coasts from the repeated assaults of the northern pirates: Macon was one of the eight tributary kings whom Edgar, in token of their vassalage, compelled to row his barge on the river Dee.

Godred Crowan, son of Harold Halfager, King of Norway, who accompanied his father in his invasion of England on the death of Edward the Confessor, was, after the defeat of his countrymen, hospitably entertained in this island, in which he had taken refuge. Returning the following year with a numerous army, after being twice repulsed by the inhabitants, he succeeded in taking possession of it after a sanguinary contest, and established himself in that part of the isle which lies to the south of the mountainous ridge by which it is divided, granting the remainder to the inhabitants, on the absolute condition of their holding it under him, as lord of the whole: from this time the island became vested in the kings, or lords, of the isles, and continued to be held of them till the commencement of the last century. Godred, who also held the sovereignty of the Hebrides, or Western islands of Scotland, maintained a navy of sufficient force to enable him to keep possession of his conquests, and turned his arms against Ireland, at that time divided into petty principalities, and reduced Dublin and a considerable part of the province of Leinster. He left three sons, Lagman, Harold, and Olave: Lagman, who succeeded to the government, being jealous of his brother Harold, whom he suspected of exciting insubordination among his soldiers, put him to death; but repenting, he resigned the crown to his youngest brother Olave, and died on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Olave being then a minor, and residing in the court of Henry I., where he received his education, the island, from its unsettled state, was exposed to the attacks of the neighbouring powers, and the principal inhabitants applied to the King of Ireland to appoint some person of royal descent, who might act as regent during the minority of that prince. The king appointed Donald Tade, but his haughtiness and tyranny disgusting the inhabitants, they expelled him from the island, and entrusted the regency to one Mac Marus, a person of great prudence, moderation, and justice, who, in 1098, laid the foundation of the abbey of Rushen, and continued for a time to preserve the peace, and promote the prosperity of the island; but a conspiracy being formed against him, internal dissensions were created, and the island became an easy prey to Magnus, King of Norway, who, having conquered the Orkneys and the Hebrides, landed in the parish of St. Patrick, and possessed himself, almost without resistance, of the Isle of Man, over which he reigned more than six years; but having gone with sixteen ships to reconnoitre the Irish coast, in 1102, and incautiously landing, with a party of his followers, he was taken by surprise, and slain.

Olave, who had been an exile for sixteen years, was now invited to the government, which he enjoyed in undisturbed tranquillity for many years: he went over to Norway, to get his title acknowledged, and was honourably received and crowned king. Leaving his son Godred to be educated at the Norwegian court, he returned to his dominions, which he found distracted by the pretensions of the three sons of his brother Harold, who, having been educated in Ireland, raised considerable forces in that country, and landing in the Isle of Man, demanded one moiety of the isles to be surrendered to them; and while attending a meeting at Ramsey, which had been appointed by the king, for taking their demand into consideration, both parties being drawn up in lines opposite to each other, Reginald, one of the brothers, feigning to address the king, by whom he had been called, raised his battle-axe, and at one blow struck off his head. This, which was a preconcerted signal for a general attack, was followed by a sanguinary conflict, in which many fell on both sides. But such insidious treachery did not long remain unpunished: on the return of Prince Godred from Norway, the whole island submitted to his authority, and the three sons of Harold were delivered up to condign punishment, Reginald having been executed, and his two brothers deprived of their eyes. In 1158, Summerled, Thane of Argyle, and brother-in-law to Godred, attempted to usurp the government; but the fleets of Godred and the usurper meeting, a desperate battle ensued, and after an obstinate and sanguinary conflict, without the victory inclining to either side, a truce was agreed upon, and afterwards a treaty, by which the kingdom of the isles was divided between them. Another attempt was made to deprive Godred of his throne by his bastard brother, Reginald, but without success; and that prince, having reigned for some years in peace, died in 1187. Godred left three sons, Reginald, Olave, and Ivar, of whom he appointed Olave his successor, because born in wedlock. Olave, being at that time a minor, the people made Reginald king, but afterwards, on his attaining maturer age, raised Olave to the throne. Reginald, in order to recover his lost dignity, did homage to John, King of England, for his crown, and made submission to the pope; and having obtained assistance from Allen, Lord of Galloway, and Thomas, Earl of Athol, landed on the island, while Olave, with his chief officers and soldiers, was in the Western isles, massacred the unprotected inhabitants, plundered their houses of every thing valuable, burnt the churches, and laid waste the southern parts of the island; and, even after the return of Olave, succeeded in setting fire to the shipping, then at anchor under Peel castle. An intestine warfare raged for some time with great fury, and Reginald was ultimately killed in a battle fought at Tynwald Mount. From minutes of council it appears, that Olave received from Henry III. an annual payment in silver coin and wine, for defending this part of the coast; from which it may be inferred that the island possessed a naval force at that time by no means inconsiderable. Olave died in 1237, and was succeeded by his son Harold, who having gone over to Norway, was, with his wife, drowned on his return; and his brother Reginald, who assumed the government in 1249, was slain, with all his party, in an insurrection headed by a knight named Ivar. On the death of Reginald, who left only an infant daughter, his brother Magnus was chosen king, and, according to the usual custom, went over to Normandy, where, after two years' attendance, he was declared King of the Isles, and had his title confirmed to him and his successors. Notwithstanding this, Mary, the daughter of Reginald, set up a claim for the kingdom, and did homage for it to Edw. I., which circumstance was, four hundred years afterwards, adduced as a plea on which judgment was obtained in favour of the heirs general of Ferdinand, Earl of Derby, against their uncle, Earl William; but it was afterwards settled by parliament in favour of a male succession.

From this time the power of the Norwegian kings began to decline, and that of the Scottish kings, from whom these islands had been wrested, recovered strength. Deprived of that support which the inhabitants had received from Norway, and threatened by the Scots, who were preparing to regain possession of the islands by force, which the death of the Scottish monarch alone suspended, Magnus, in 1256, visited England, in order to secure the protection and assistance of Henry III., by whom he was hospitably entertained, and from whom he received the honour of knighthood. In 1263, Aquinus, King of Norway, made an attempt to revenge the affront offered to his authority, by the recent attempt of the Scots upon this island, and made a descent upon that kingdom; but he was so powerfully resisted by Alexander, who had succeeded to the throne, that he was forced to take shelter in the Orcades, where he died at Kirkwall. Magnus dying without issue, in 1265, was buried in the abbey church in Rushen; and the King of Scotland having subdued the Orkneys and the Hebrides, attacked the Isle of Man, now unprotected, and, after many battles fought with varied success, at length achieved the conquest of it with a powerful army under the command of Alexander of Paisley and John Comyn, in 1270, when, after a decisive battle at Ronaldsway, in which five hundred of the Manks, with their leader, were slain, the kingdom was entirely subjugated, and annexed to the dominions of Alexander, who, in token of his conquest, substituted for the ancient armorial ensign of the isle, which was a ship in full sail, the device of the three legs, which it still retains. The tyrannical oppression of the lieutenants (by whom it was governed) under the Scottish kings inspired the inhabitants with the resolution of throwing off the Scottish yoke, or of perishing in the attempt; but the bishop, informed of their determination, interfered to prevent the effusion of blood, and obtained their mutual consent to decide the contest by thirty champions selected from each party, and a place was accordingly chosen for the combat. The Manks' champions were all killed in the contest, and twenty-five of the Scottish warriors shared the same fate; this victory confirmed the conquest of the Scots, and the Manks, finding no resource, submitted to their fate: the ancient regal government was abolished, and a military despotism established in its place. In 1289, the island was surrendered by the Scottish commissioners to Edward I., who restored it the following year to John Balliol; and, on the death of Edward, in 1307, his successor, Edward II., seized it, and, in the course of one year, bestowed it successively upon his favourites, Piers de Gavestone, Gilbert de Mac Gascall, and Henricus de Bello Monte. In the reign of Edward III., a female descendant of Mary, daughter of Reginald, revived the claims of her family to the sovereignty of the island, and solicited the protection of that monarch, who, having ascertained the validity of her title, gave her in marriage to Sir William de Montacute, and granted them such succours in ships and men, that Sir William expelled the Scots, and, to the great joy of the natives, restored the ancient government in the right line. In the prosecution of his lady's claim, Sir William had contracted so large a debt, that he was compelled to mortgage the island for seven years, to Anthony Bec, Bishop of Durham, who, in 1377, obtained from Richard II. a grant of it for life; but at his decease it reverted to the natural heir, William de Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, who sold it, in 1395, to Sir William Scroop, afterwards Earl of Wiltshire, who was beheaded at the commencement of the war between the houses of York and Lancaster.

In the reign of Henry IV. it was in the possession of Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland, upon whose rebellion against that monarch it was seized for the king's use by Sir William and Sir John Stanley, to the latter of whom it was granted, in 1406, for one year only. This grant was revoked, and a new patent passed the great seal, in 1407, bestowing the island, castle, peel, and lordship of Man, and the isles appertaining thereto, with all the royalties, regalities, and franchises, with the patronage of the see, on him and his heirs, in as full and ample a manner as had been granted to any former lord, or king, to be held of the crown of Great Britain, by liege homage, paying to the king a cast of falcons at his coronation. In this family its royalties and revenues descended regularly to William Stanley, sixth Earl of Derby, who obtained from James I. a new grant of the isle, which was confirmed by act of parliament. The title of "King of Man" was first exchanged for that of "Lord of Man" by Thomas, second Earl of Derby. During the parliamentary war, the island remained steadily attached to the interests of the king, and was among the last places that yielded to the usurped authority of Cromwell. General Ireton, on the part of the parliament, offered to James, Earl of Derby, the repossession of all his estates in England, upon condition of his surrendering the Isle of Man; but the earl, in a most spirited and memorable reply, rejected the offer with the greatest indignation, and declared his determination to hang any future messenger that should be sent with similar proposals. On the execution of the earl at Bolton le Moors, in 1651, its defence was undertaken by his lady, who determined to hold Castle Rushen, to which she had retired, to the last extremity; but Receiver-General William Christian, who had the command of the garrison, deeming her cause hopeless, surrendered the castle to Colonels Birch and Duckenfield, who, with ten armed vessels, had invaded the island, which was subsequently granted by the parliament to Lord Fairfax. Charles II. restored the island to the son of Earl James, and Christian, being tried by the Manks' authorities, and found guilty of treason, was shot, in January 1662; but the sentence was afterwards reversed, and the family restored to their estates, by an order from the king.

One of the most important occurrences in the civil history of the island was the granting, in 1703, by James, the tenth Earl of Derby, and Lord of Man, of the Act of Settlement, by which the lessees of estates were finally established in possession of them, and their descent assigned in perpetuity, on the payment of certain fines, rents, and duties to the lord. James dying without issue, in 1735, the lordship of Man descended to James Murray, second Duke of Athol; and, in order to put an end to the contraband trade of the island, which, in the beginning of the last century, had become so excessive, as materially to affect the revenue of the country, an act of parliament was passed, in 1726, authorising the earl to sell the royalty and revenue of the island: but though many overtures were made for the purchase of them by government, no treaty was concluded till after the death of the duke, whose only daughter Charlotte, Baroness Strange, being married to her cousin James, heir to the dukedom of Athol, conveyed to him the lordship of Man. Proposals for the purchase were renewed to this nobleman, in 1765, and measures having been at the same time introduced into the house of parliament for more effectually preventing the illicit trade of the island, the duke and duchess agreed to alienate the sovereignty of it for £70,000, which sum was accordingly paid; they reserved only the manorial rights, the patronage of the see, and some emoluments and perquisites, respecting which a misunderstanding arose, in consequence of the British government claiming more than the duke and duchess intended by the treaty to relinquish, and a further sum of £2000 per annum was granted to them, upon their lives, and the sovereignty of the island was thus transferred to the crown. Soon after this an act of parliament was passed, which effectually checked the contraband trade. On the ground of inadequate compensation, their son John presented petitions to parliament, but unsuccessfully, until the year 1805, when an act was passed, assigning to him and his heirs one-fourth of the gross revenue of the island. In 1825, an act passed both houses of parliament, authorising the Lords of the Treasury to treat with the duke for the purchase of his remaining interest in the royalty and revenues of the island, the patronage of the see, the manorial rights, and other profits and emoluments. The duke agreed to sell, and the valuation was left to arbitrators appointed on both sides, who awarded the sum of £416,000, as an indemnity, and the Isle of Man, with all its privileges and immunities, was entirely ceded to the British government.

It is about thirty miles in length, extending in a direction from north-north-east to south-south-west, varying from eight to twelve miles in breadth, and about eighty miles in circumference. It is divided into two unequal parts by a mountainous ridge reaching from North Barrule at the northern, to South Barrule at the southern, extremity of the island, and comprehending in the chain Snawfel, Mount Greeba, Pen-y-Pot, and several others. Of these the most considerable for their elevation and extent are, Snawfel, and the North and South Barrules, which are nearly of an equal height; Snawfel, the highest of them, being five hundred and eighty yards above the level of the sea. The sides, as is the case in most of the other mountains, are covered to the height of several yards from the base with turbary, or turf, and with various kinds of moss, heath, and rushes, to the summit. North Barrule is a rock of clay-slate, which is also the prevailing formation in South Barrule, the latter differing chiefly by its being varied, on the north side, with large masses of granite, containing silvery mica, red and white felspar, and grey quartz. Mount Greeba is of very rugged and precipitous ascent, especially in that part near the road leading from Douglas to Peel: the stratum near the surface is a glossy clay, intersected by many large veins of quartz, alternating in some parts with layers of mica slate. Pen-y-Pot, consisting chiefly of clay-slate from the base to the summit, is extremely marshy, and in dry weather, and even in summer, the ascent is difficult and tedious. From Ramsey to Derby haven, and round the south and western shores of the island, the land terminates in cliffs, consisting of clay-slate, and varying in elevation from one hundred to more than two hundred and fifty feet; at the southern extremity is the promontory of Spanish head, consisting of bold precipices, rising perpendicularly from the level of the beach to the height of more than three hundred feet, and divided by extensive chasms into pyramidal and conical masses, which overhang the shore. In one of these recesses, which penetrate many yards into the solid rock, is a circle of erect stones, appearing to have been a Druidical temple, for which, from the solitude and sublimity of the situation, no place could be more appropriate. Detached from this extremity of the island, by a rocky channel, several hundred yards in breadth, in the middle of which is an island, called Kitterland, whereon sheep are fed in the summer, is the Calf of Man, the largest of numerous rocky islets surrounding the coast: it is nearly five miles in circumference, and comprises an area of more than six hundred acres; on the western side, the cliffs rise in perpendicular masses, to the height of four hundred feet, and its summit, which commands an extensive view of the Welch, Scotch, and Irish mountains, is five hundred feet above the level of the sea. On the south side of the Calf of Man is a very large mass of rock, called the Burrow, or Barrow, in its form resembling a lofty tower, and separated from the other masses by an opening of romantic appearance: near it is another, called the Eye, perforated by a natural arch, resembling the eye of a needle, from which circumstance it has its name. Two handsome lighthouses have been erected here, for the protection of vessels navigating the Irish sea; they are distant from each other one hundred and eighty-seven yards, bearing north half east, and south-west half west. The lower is three hundred and five feet, and the upper three hundred and ninety-six feet, above the level of the sea; they are furnished with double revolving lights, which make their revolution in two minutes, and at their greatest splendour may be seen at the distance of seven leagues: the bearing of the upper light is north-east half east from the dangerous sunken rocks, called the Chickens, from which it is nearly one mile and a half distant.

The harbours are, Douglas, Ramsey, Peel, Port le Mary, and Castletown. The natural harbours are, Derby haven, Laxey, and Port-Erin. Douglas, Ramsey, Derby haven, and Laxey, are on the eastern coast, Castletown and Port le Mary on the southern coast, and Peel and Port-Erin on the western coast. Douglas harbour, which is dry at low water, being considered the best dry harbour in the Irish sea, admits vessels of considerable burden to approach the quay at high water, the depth being then from fifteen to twenty feet. The pier, constructed by government, at an expense of £22,000, is five hundred and twenty feet in length, and forty feet broad for an extent of four hundred and fifty feet from its commencement, when it expands to a breadth of ninety feet, terminating in a circular area of greater elevation than the narrower part, and having in the centre a handsome lighthouse: the whole is built of yellow stone brought from Runcorn in Cheshire, and affords great security to the harbour. The quay is spacious, and well adapted to the loading and unloading of vessels, of which all having goods or merchandise for bonding are, by act of parliament, compelled to deliver their cargoes exclusively at this port. The whole bay is two miles across, and has good anchorage, except on the north side, being sheltered from all winds except the east and south-east: both its points are rocky, precipitous, and dangerous, and in the centre is a large bed of rocks, called St. Mary's rock, or the Connister, which are just covered at high water, being extremely dangerous to mariners. In tempestuous weather the harbour itself affords but insecure shelter to vessels, being exposed to a heavy swell; and those in the bay, at such times, are subject to many accidents, numerous shipwrecks happening on this part of the coast. To remedy these inconveniences, Sir William Hillary, Bart., in 1826, submitted a plan to the consideration of government, for forming a spacious central harbour, which, by the construction of a breakwater from Douglas Head, and a pier from St. Mary's rock, might be accessible at all times to the largest vessels navigating the Irish sea, and within which a squadron of the largest ships of the line, and a numerous fleet of merchantmen, might ride in safety. Ramsey harbour, accessible to vessels of one hundred tons' burden, has been greatly improved by the construction of an additional pier in 1830, the depth of water being thereby increased more than three feet. The quay, on which a lighthouse has been built, is very commodious. This is the principal port from which wheat is exported. The bay is spacious, and the anchorage good; and a considerable number of the herring boats are laid up here during the winter. Peel harbour, affording shelter to vessels of small burden, is formed by a pier four hundred yards long, and varying from seven to ten yards in breadth, at the extremity of which is a harbour-light. A jetty, forty yards in length, was erected in 1830, at an expense of £550: the depth of water at ordinary spring tides is about fifteen feet, and at neap tides eleven feet. There are seventy herring boats, from sixteen to thirty tons' burden each, belonging to this harbour. Derby haven, the principal resort of the herring boats during the latter part of the fishing season, is about a mile and a half from Castletown, on the further side of the isthmus which joins the peninsula of Langness to the main land. At its southern extremity is the small island of St. Michael, connected with the main land by a stone wall, about one hundred yards in length, and twelve feet thick: on this small isle a circular fort was erected by the Earl of Derby, in the early part of the seventeenth century: the walls, on which is placed a harbour-light, are eight feet in thickness, and eighteen in height; they are still entire, and enclose an area eighteen yards in diameter, in which are the ruins of two houses, and near them the remains of a church, now used as a place of interment for Roman Catholics, and for persons who may be shipwrecked on that part of the coast: the haven, which is a mile and a half from the direct course, is, from its greater security, generally selected as a place of landing by passengers to Castletown from Ireland. Port le Mary has a good harbour, protected by a pier of considerable extent, erected a few years since, at the extremity of which is a harbour-light. Port-Erin has an excellent bay, affording protection from all winds except the west, and much frequented by the fishing fleet at the commencement of the season. Laxey bay affords convenient anchorage, and partial shelter from the winds.

In the high lands between North Barrule and Mount Greeba rise several streams, which run into the sea at Douglas, Ramsey, Peel, Laxey, and Castletown, and bear the same names as those places. Of these the Ramsey river is the largest: it rises in the mountainous group around Snawfel, and from the flat tract of land through which it passes, within two miles of the sea, its shallow channel is frequently diverted by the sea, at spring tides. The Douglas river is formed of two branches, of which the southern rises in the west side of Mount Garraghan, and the northern in the group of which Mount Pen-y-Pot is the centre. The river Peel rises in the northern side of South Barrule, and receives also another branch issuing from the western side of the mountains of St. German and St. Michael. The Laxey river descends from the eastern declivity of Snawfel, and pursues a westerly course to Laxey bay; and the Castletown river has two branches, the principal of which rises in the south side of South Barrule, uniting a little below Athol bridge. Besides these rivers, which are shallow and inconsiderable, there are numerous streams in various parts of the island, but few of them are of sufficient force to turn a mill. This island, like those of the Hebrides, is destitute of wood, and almost of all trees not artificially planted; a little brushwood and furze is found on the uncultivated hills and low lands, but seldom on the mountains. In various parts, plantations and shrubberies are brought into a luxuriant state; but there is neither park nor forest scenery in the island. The climate is rather milder in winter than that of the neighbouring coasts: the frosts, which rarely commence before Christmas, are but of short duration, and generally so slight as very little to impede vegetation, and the snow seldom remains on the ground for any length of time: gales of wind and rains are frequent and of long duration in the spring, rendering the seed-time unfavourable, and being greatly prejudicial to the tender shoots of corn: the heat in summer is also more moderate, the harvests being consequently later; in general, the grain does not attain its full size, and the straw is less valuable for fodder. The soil of the northern portion of the island is a light sand, resting on a bed of common clay, and in some places of clay-marl; but the greatest part consists of a soil resting on grey wacké, and on clay-slate, in general thin and unproductive without good management. A small portion of the land around Castletown is composed of transition limestone, of a blueish grey colour, containing veins of calcareous spar, with impressions of shells and other marine exuviae, the strata of which are generally from one to four feet in thickness, having a dip to the south and south-west of from five to ten degrees, and frequently alternating with the grey wacké slate, on which it lies. The boundaries of this limestone district extend along the coast, from the first creek northward from Derby haven to the most western point of Port le Mary, and from the same creek over land to Ballasalla, and thence across the Castletown river again to Port le Mary. The clay, and the grey wacké slate, the latter of which increases in proportion to the distance from the higher mountains, occupy the southern and central portions of the island. The soil of the valley, from St. John's to Peel, is alluvial, and abounds with marine exuviae; in some parts it consists of loose sand, with a substratum of grey wacké slate, extending northward to Kirk-Michael, and forming a narrow slip of land, one hundred and fifty feet above the level of the sea, bounded on one side by the sea-shore, and on the other by mountainous elevations, consisting chiefly of grey wacké slate, in some parts covered with a bed of common clay. The sandy soil along the sea-shore to the north expands over the whole of that part of the island which is separated from the south side, by a line extending from Ramsey to Kirk-Michael, in a direction from east to west. Underneath the sand is a bed of very pure common clay, at the depth of from one to three feet below the surface, called by the inhabitants marl, of which they make an advantageous use in giving consistency to the light sandy surface; and near Ramsey is a bed of real clay marl, containing a considerable portion of lime, and dug midway between high and low water marks: there are several pits of shell marl in the vicinity of Ballaugh, and in many parts of this flat northern district peat is found in considerable quantities, usually in layers from six to eight feet in thickness, forming an extensive turbary in the centre of the flat, which has been partly drained, and contains great quantities of diluvial timber, among which are trunks of the pine and the oak. Much of the land has been greatly improved by draining, and in the northern part of the island a considerable tract has, by that means, been converted from a marsh into good arable and pasture land, the soil of which is peat moss and clay.

The prevailing mode of agriculture comprises a succession of crops in the following order. First, potatoes or turnips; second, barley; third, clover; fourth, oats, or, if good land, wheat; and fifth, peas, or oats if wheat has preceded. After two or three rotations, a poor soil is generally laid down to grass, and is afterwards brought again into tillage. Wheat is not generally sown except on the best cultivated farms, and in the best districts; the produce is commonly from twenty-four to thirty-six bushels per acre, the bushel weighing sixty-four pounds. About one-half of the arable land is appropriated to the growth of barley, of which two kinds are sown; one having two rows of grain in the ear, and the other four; the latter is used only for malt, and the former is made into bread for the islanders: the seed time for this grain is from the middle of April to the middle of May; the four-rowed ear requires to be sown earlier, and in general ripens a fortnight sooner, than the other; the average produce of each sort is thirty-six bushels per acre. The other half of the arable land is appropriated to the culture of oats, of which also there are two kinds, the white and the Poland; the former is generally preferred: the time for sowing is from the beginning of March to the middle of April; the average produce of both is thirty bushels per acre: a very little rye is also grown. Potatoes are in general a very favourite crop, and there are many sorts, requiring different modes of cultivation: the time of planting is generally from the end of March to the middle of May; the produce is from one hundred and sixty to two hundred bushels per acre. Turnips, for which the climate and the soil appear to be extremely favourable, are produced in great quantities, and flax is grown in most parts of the island, but not sufficient for the supply of the manufacturers; the time for sowing it is April. Most of the artificial grasses thrive well; the white and red clover, ray-grass, and the common grasses, are generally good crops, and great quantities of hay are stacked in most of the agricultural districts. The light ploughs are generally preferred, many being procured from England and Scotland. In addition to the general manures, sea-weed is extensively used, and with success, by farmers near the coast.

The commons, or uncultivated lands, are estimated to form one-third of the island, including the whole of the mountainous chain nearly to the base. Into these pastures horses, cattle, and sheep, are turned to graze, particularly by the upland farmers, who take pride in their mountain breed of sheep. Their principal food during the winter season is the evergreen furze, of which the sheep eat only the younger sprouts; the horses eat the larger sprays, first clearing them of the prickles by pawing them with their feet. The native breed of horses is of a small kind, but hardy and useful, and patient of labour, being somewhat similar to those of North Wales. The horned cattle are numerous, but the native breed having been much neglected, have degenerated; the cows are in general good milchers, but are rather more adapted for fattening than for the dairy: the farmers have lately been very attentive to the improvement of the breed, by the introduction of the Dunlop and short-horned cattle; but in general they rely more for keeping up their live stock upon importation, than upon rearing. The native breed of sheep is very small and hardy, much resembling the South Down breed of England:

their wool is not very long, nor of the finest staple, but the flesh is excellent, and when fat they weigh from five to eight pounds per quarter. In the low lands a larger breed has been introduced, besides which is another, called Laughton, having wool of a light brown colour, highly esteemed in the manufacture of cloth, which is much preferred to that made of other wool: for this purpose the breed is solely preserved; they are much less hardy in their nature, and more difficult to fatten, than any of the other kinds. The sheep are subject to a peculiar and fatal distemper, called by the natives Onw, supposed to arise from their eating a certain plant that grows in the pastures. Pigs are bred in great numbers; every cottager generally keeping one or two, which, when ten or twelve months old, weigh usually about fifty pounds per quarter. The herring fishery, employing so many persons during the summer and autumn, is injurious to the agriculture of the island, and interferes greatly with the proper securing of the crops: within the last twenty years the Isle of Man was included in the districts occupying the attention of the Cumberland Agricultural Society. The land is chiefly divided into farms containing from fifty to two hundred acres, and that in the immediate neighbourhood of the towns is cultivated by the inhabitants, who, after retaining a sufficient portion of the produce for the supply of their own families, send the remainder to market. The enclosures are generally from four to ten acres, fenced with sods of earth raised to the height of four or five feet, and planted on the top with furze; uncemented stone fences are also common, and the gate-posts are invariably of stone, and extremely massive. The farm-houses are roofed with slate, and the cottages with thatch; many of the meaner sort are constructed of sods of earth raised up, and thatched, without eaves, consisting only of two rooms on the ground-floor, with an aperture in the roof to let out the smoke, and frequently without a single window. Every inhabitant has the right of quarrying stone for his own use, and also, on the annual payment of one halfpenny to the lord, a sum not now demanded, of digging peat upon the mountains. The birds that frequent the coasts are the white and grey larus fuscus, gulls, gannets, cormorants, shags, herons, and Royston crows: there are not less than eight different species of birds of passage that spend the breeding season in the Calf of Man, among which are the puffin and the razor-bill; the curlew also frequents the Calf, Langness, and other parts of the island. Among those which are accounted game are partridges, woodcocks, snipes, landrails, plovers, teal, widgeons, and wild ducks and geese: hares would be very plentiful if not destroyed by snares, the furze and brushwood affording them excellent shelter. The streams abound with trout and salmon, generally small; some beautiful species of the molussa, the actinea rufa of Linnæus, are found adhering to the rocks, where pools are formed: there are no noxious reptiles in the island.

The principal minerals are lead and copper ore, of which veins are found in several of the mountains; the chief mines are at Laxey, Foxdale, and Brada-head, near Port Erin. The mines at Laxey are situated near the banks of the Laxey river, and about a mile above the village; they are worked in two levels driven from the steep banks of the river: in the higher level, which was opened towards the close of the last century, and extends to the depth of one hundred yards, lead and copper ore are found together, with much blende, some zinc, and a kind of mineral earth, called black jack, which generally sells for thirty-six shillings per ton, and of which a great quantity is sent to Bristol, where, after being ground and prepared, it is manufactured into black paint; the lead-ore contains a large quantity of silver, in some instances in the proportion of two hundred ounces, and generally in that of from sixty to eighty ounces to the ton. The new level is situated about a quarter of a mile further down the river, and is twenty-eight yards below the level of the former mine: its chief use is to drain off the water from the upper mine: the only metallic substances it had produced in 1808 were carbonate of copper and blende; at that period it had been extended two hundred yards in depth, but the produce was not sufficient to pay the expense of working it. The Foxdale mines, between Castletown and St. John's, of which the chief produce is lead, with a small portion of copper, after having been for some time relinquished, were resumed, and, in 1830, a new vein of lead-ore was discovered within a few feet from the surface, which promises an abundant supply, with little labour and expense: these mines are now being worked with great benefit to the proprietors, to whom they are likely to prove an ample source of wealth: sulphuret of copper is also found in those of Brada head, which are worked only at intervals, and between Port-Erin and Kirk-Arbory are shafts of lead mines now deserted. The mines belong, by prerogative, to the lord proprietor of the soil, who lets them to companies, consisting generally of nine or ten persons, including the lord, who claims, as lessor, one-eighth part of the produce. Limestone is found in various parts of the island; that which is quarried on the coast, to the south of Pool-vash bay, becomes highly indurated, and is of a fine grain and black colour; it is susceptible of a high polish, and is much used for tombstones: the steps at the entrances of St. Paul's cathedral, in London, are from these quarries, and were presented by Bishop Wilson. Below high water mark, at Spanish head, there is a quarry of very tough clay-slate, which is raised in blocks ten or twelve feet long, from eight to twelve inches in breadth, and from four to eight inches in thickness; these blocks are substituted for timber, and used for gate-posts, small bridges across streams, and for other purposes. The slate generally is easily split into thin laminæ, well adapted for the roofs of houses, and into thicker slabs, used for walls. The public roads, which, till within the last half-century, were dangerous for horsemen in winter, and for carriages even in the summer, have been greatly improved since the passing of an act of parliament, in 1776, by which they were ordered to be eight yards in width, with a ditch on each side, and to be well gravelled on the surface; they are now little inferior to those of England, and are kept in repair by a fund arising from a tax upon retailers of ale and spirituous liquors, on lands, houses, dogs, and by some fines.

The chief source of employment is agriculture: during the intervals of the seasons great numbers are engaged in the herring fishery, for which the season commences about July, and continues till the end of October: there are not less than from two to three hundred boats employed in the trade, which is a source of considerable profit to the fishermen, and furnishes a large supply of food for the inhabitants. The immense shoal of herrings that makes its appearance on the British coast, generally in June, is divided in its progress southward into two parts, by the Shetland isles; the western branch passes the Hebrides, and is subdivided, by the northern parts of Ireland, into two parts, of which one disappears in the Atlantic Ocean, and the other passes into the Irish sea. The boats employed in the fishery are generally of from fifteen to thirty tons' burden, and mostly without decks: this little fleet leaves the harbour in the evening, and returns with its cargoes on the following morning. It is a prevailing and long-established custom for the fishermen to offer up public prayer before leaving the harbour, and on no account to go out on the Saturday or Sunday evenings. The nets, for the throwing of which certain regulations are in force, are buoyed up with bags of dog-skin inflated with air: the produce of each boat is divided into eleven shares and a half, of which two and a half are assigned to the owner of the boat, and one to each fisherman, and a net. The nets are always cast after sunset, and taken up before sunrise; and on the return of the fleet to the harbour, great numbers of women and children are employed in carrying the fish to the several receiving houses, which are extensive buildings, generally ninety feet long, sixty feet wide, and thirty feet high, where they are immediately salted; those that are to be preserved white are regularly packed in barrels, with a layer of salt between each row; such as are intended for red herrings are first "royled," or rubbed with salt, in which they remain for two or three days, and are then washed and hung up on rods suspended from the ceiling, within eight feet of the floor, on which fires of wood are kept burning till the fish are sufficiently dried and smoked, when they are packed in barrels for exportation. The number of herrings generally cured, though subject to great fluctuation, may be averaged at from eight to ten millions. A flight of gulls generally hovers over a shoal of herrings, serving as an index to the fishermen, for which reason the shooting of one of these birds during the fishing season subjects the offender to a penalty of £3.

The commerce of the island, previously to the act of revestment in 1765, and the subsequent regulations, consisted principally in the importing and exporting of contraband goods, the average returns of which exceeded £350,000, and by some are stated to have amounted to half a million sterling, per annum: during that period the Isle of Man was the grand shelter and storehouse for smugglers, who, as occasion offered, shipped their goods hence to England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the great detriment of the British revenue. On the act of revestment, the customs of the ports became vested in the British crown, and were placed under the control of a receiver-general, and subsequently, after various modifications, by an act passed in the 50th of George III., the regulation and management were transferred to the board in England, and have since remained under the superintendence of English commissioners. In the interpretation of British acts of parliament, it was formerly contended that they did not extend to the Isle of Man, unless specifically mentioned; and it was questioned whether the word "dominions" comprised this island, but the subject has been decided in the affirmative. By an act passed in the 6th of George IV., a new code of revenue laws was framed, the principal feature of which is the system of licensing the importation of certain goods charged with high duties; thus confining it to an extent proportionate to the consumption of the inhabitants, and preventing the island from becoming a depôt for smugglers. With very trifling exceptions, the exportation is confined to goods that are the produce or manufacture of the island, on which no export duty is paid. Among the imports are corn, meal, flax, seeds, linen yarn, wood-ashes, and flesh of all kinds, which may be imported from any place duty free; agricultural implements, black cattle, horses, sheep, boards, bricks, cordage, and twine for nets, pack-thread, hemp, tackle for the fisheries, hoops, linen, utensils for cloth manufacturers, salt, soap-lees, leather, tiles, trees, and timber, which may be imported duty free from all parts of the United Kingdom; balks, barrels, staves, headings for pipes, ebony, hoops, rod and bar iron, oak planks, oars, spars, pipe-clay, and naval stores, from the colonies of Great Britain. The revenue, in 1829, was £21,143. 8. 7½.; and in the same year, ending the 5th of January, 1830, eight vessels were built, of the aggregate burden of five hundred and forty tons. The number of ships belonging to the island, in 1829, was two hundred and seventeen, of the aggregate burden of five thousand seven hundred and fourteen tons; and four hundred and fourteen vessels entered inwards, and one hundred and fifty-four cleared outwards. The manufacture of sheeting, linen, towelling, sail-cloth, and sack-cloth, was introduced about the beginning of the present century, when flax-mills were erected: about the same period the woollen manufacture was established: there are also extensive breweries, paper-mills, tanneries (chiefly for the Manks' hides and skins), candle and soap manufactories, and various others, which the freedom from the excise duties tends greatly to encourage: the quantity of leather being insufficient for the supply of the inhabitants, much is imported from England, which is of a very superior quality. Distilleries of all kinds are prohibited by the British government, under a penalty of £200, with forfeiture of all implements employed in the process. Brandy, rum, geneva, wine, tea, coffee, chocolate, tobacco, wrought and raw silk, glass, and salt, are among the articles imported by license, the exportation of them being absolutely prohibited. The collector is obliged to give one month's notice of the expiration of licenses, and to receive within fourteen days, all petitions for their renewal; the petitions for imports from England are transmitted to the commissioners at London, and from Scotland to those at Edinburgh. On granting the licenses, the parties are bound, under a penalty not exceeding twice the amount of the duties, to import the goods therein mentioned, and if the quantity limited by act of parliament be found insufficient for the consumption of the inhabitants, it may be increased by the Lords of the Treasury.

The native inhabitants are naturally of an indolent, credulous, and frequently of a superstitious, character; they are strongly attached to their native vales and mountains, and to their ancient laws and customs. Previously to the act of revestment, they considered themselves independent of every other nation, and they were deeply affected by the sale of the island to the British government, which they imagined would blend the countries, and tend to obliterate their original distinction. The higher and the middle ranks associating freely with the English residents, retain few traits of their original character, and many of them are highly accomplished and well informed; those of the lower rank are civil, of an hospitable character, and of a charitable disposition. Their language is the Erse, a dialect of the Celtic, many of the country people being unable to understand a word of the English language.

The government was originally exercised by a council of elders, called, from a Celtic term of that import, Taxi, or, according to the opinion of a very learned and reverend native of the island, derived from Taxi, a corruption of Taisgi, a guardian, and Acci, hereditary property. The first institution of this assembly is attributed to the Danish prince Orry, who having added the Hebrides and the Orcades to his conquest of this island, directed the inhabitants to choose sixteen representatives, and those of the out-isles eight, to assist him in the government. This assembly, the representatives of the people from time immemorial, consisted of the principal landowners; what powers they exercised, or for what time the institution continued, cannot be distinctly ascertained. In the Chronicon Manniæ, which is continued from the year 1066 to the year 1270, no allusion is made to it, nor is there any record of the people's having had any participation in the government of the island. During the time that it was under the Norwegian and Scottish dominion, the ancient form of government appears to have been laid aside, and after the grant of it to the Stanleys, that family retained the feudal government, and, as feudatory princes, lords proprietors of the soil, exercised sovereign authority, dependent only on the British crown. Since the act of revestment, the functions of the several officers of administration have been more explicitly defined; but the internal policy, laws, and ancient usages remain unchanged, and it preserves its freedom from the imposition of taxes. Lord Chief Justice Coke observes, that although the island is no parcel of the realm of England, yet it forms part of the dominions of the king, and therefore an acknowledgment of allegiance is preserved in all the public oaths.

The civil government is vested in a governor, lieutenant-governor, a council of ten principal officers, and the House of Keys, consisting of twenty-four constitutional representatives of the people; these estates together constituting a court of Tynwald, by which all public laws are enacted and promulgated. The Governor, who, with all the civil and military officers, is appointed by the crown, is chancellor ex-officio, and he, or his deputy, used formerly to hear and determine all appeals from the inferior courts, on matters not relating to landed property; which appellate jurisdiction was transferred to him in 1777, but in 1793 was restored to the House of Keys: his consent, or, in his absence, that of his lieutenant, is necessary to the passing of a law. The Lieutenant-Governor performs all the functions of the governor in his absence, and, during his presence, such only as he may choose to entrust to him. The Council consists of the lord bishop of the diocese, the attorney-general, the receiver-general, the two deemsters, the clerk of the rolls, the water-bailiff, or admiralty judge, the archdeacon, and the two vicars-general, who are ex-officio members of that body. The duty of the council is to advise the governor, and to assist him in the administration of justice in his several courts; and when not acting in a judicial, or legislative capacity, to act for the public good in a summary way, in cases of emergency, such as laying an embargo on vessels, prohibiting the exportation of grain, or other provisions, in times of scarcity, and similar acts requiring promptitude; a majority of the council is necessary to give validity to their measures. The House of Keys, consisting of twenty-four of the principal landed proprietors, appears to be only a continuation of the ancient assembly called Taxiari: they are supposed to have obtained the name Keys from their being, in all cases, the interpreters of the common law, to whom lies an appeal from the inferior law courts, and in all cases of disputed titles to landed property; and from their decision an appeal lies only to the king in council. To constitute a meeting of the House of Keys, when acting as a separate body, thirteen members must be present: they fill up vacancies in their own body by a majority of votes, nominating two persons, who must be possessed of landed property, and above the age of twenty-one, of whom the governor returns one, who takes his seat for life: they elect a speaker, who must be approved by the governor, and holds his office for life, but without any emolument. The House may be assembled at the pleasure of the governor, who may either accept, or refuse, a tender of resignation from any of the members; if any member, however, accept an office entitling him to become a member of the council, he vacates his seat. The three estates may enact, abolish, or revive all insular laws, but before they can be put in force, they must be confirmed by the king, and proclaimed in the Manks' and English languages, before the people assembled at the Tynwald Hill, and signed by the governor, or his lieutenant, and such members of the council, and of the House of Keys, as are present at the proclamation. The two Deemsters are officers of very extensive jurisdiction and of high authority: they are chief justices of the island; one, presiding over the northern part, keeps his court at Ramsey, and the other, over the southern division, holds his court at Douglas: they have cognizance of all causes exceeding the sum of 40s., not being actions in which damages are to be assessed, or such as properly belong to the court of Chancery. A High Bailiff is appointed for each of the four towns, by commission from the governor, and holds his office during the governor's pleasure: he is conservator of the peace, and superintendent of police, having jurisdiction in all matters of debt under the amount of 40s.; he is also empowered to take the acknowledgment of parties, or the testimony of witnesses, for the probate of all deeds, or instruments, brought before him. A Coroner, with powers analogous in many respects to those of English sheriffs, is appointed by the governor to each of the six sheadings, or great divisions of the island; he is both a ministerial officer and a conservator of the peace, and, according to an ancient statute, holds his office only for one year: in addition to the holding of inquests in case of sudden, or violent death, he is bound to summon juries, to execute processes issued by the governor and by the judges of the courts of justice, and to carry into effect the sentence of the court: in criminal matters, and in breaches of the peace, he can arrest without a warrant, and, after the legal forms have been observed, can sell any property he may have previously distrained: it is his duty also to assist in the salvage and sale of wrecks, and he has a deputy in each of the parishes within his sheading, who is called a Lockman. In each parish there is also an ancient officer, called a Moar, whose duty it is to collect the rents, fines, escheats, deodands, waifs, and estrays due to the lord, and to execute the orders of the court baron.

The laws of the Isle of Man still retain much of their ancient peculiarity of character, though modified by occasional acts of Tynwald, and in some respects rendered more in unison with those of England. The common law was hitherto administered by the deemsters and keys, who, under the lord proprietor, governed the island by a jus non scriptum, committed to their loyalty and fidelity, as a sacred trust, and by them orally communicated to posterity. This custom appears to have been derived from the Druids, who, as is observed by Cæsar, were deeply versed in the laws, which they would by no means publish for the information of the vulgar. Hence the Manks, from the remotest period of antiquity, designated their common law by the name of Breast laws, being deposited in the breasts of the deemsters and keys, and only on important occasions divulged to the people. By an act of Tynwald, in 1777, and subsequently, in the 57th of George III., the code now in general use was revised, the institution of the grand jury differing from that of England only in the additional benefit of receiving evidence on the part of the accused, which enables them with more certainty to decide upon the finding of a bill.

The principal courts are the court of Chancery, the court of Exchequer, the court of Common Law, the court of General Gaol Delivery, the court of Admiralty, the courts of the Deemsters, the courts of the High Bailiffs, and the Ecclesiastical courts. The court of Chancery, in matters of civil property, has the most extensive jurisdiction of all the courts in the island, and is both a court of law and of equity. The governor, or, in his absence, the lieutenant-governor, who is the representative of the king, presides in this court, and is assisted by the deemsters, the attorney-general, the clerk of the rolls, and the water-bailiff, or admiralty judge who, since the act of revestment, are all appointed by the king, and hold their places during his royal pleasure. Like the English court of Chancery, the proceedings are conducted without the intervention of a jury, and, with the exception only of power to imprison for contempt, this court has equal authority: the proceedings in equity differ from those at common law more in practice than in principle. In order to prosecute a suit on the law side of the court, a common action is entered at the Rolls' office, and process granted thereon by the governor; three days previously to the meeting of the court, which is generally on the first Thursday in every month, at Castletown, the defendant must be summoned by the coroner, or his deputy, to appear at the next court day, when the action is called in rotation by the coroner. Should he neglect to appear, an attachment against him may be sued for, and renewed at the second, third, and fourth meetings of the court, at the last of which, if it be a matter of debt, and not defended, it may either be heard and determined on the plaintiff's own oath, or it may be, at his option, deferred to the next court. Should the cause of action be disputed, or denied, by the defendant, the court may transfer it for trial in the deemster's court by a jury at common law, or to any other court, ecclesiastical or civil, as the nature of the case may require. When a common action for debt is taken out, either against a native about to leave the island, or against a stranger, the defendant may not only be arrested and imprisoned, but his effects may be taken possession of by the constable, till he give security for his personal appearance; and after the decree has been issued, the effects must be sold by auction, or so much as will satisfy the creditor, after paying one year's rent, if due, and such servants' wages as may be due by the defendant at the time. On the equity side of the court, the proceedings are carried on by bill and answer, as in the English court. The Manks' law compels a native debtor to give up all his present and future effects to his creditors, but exempts him from imprisonment: a native cannot be arrested, or held to bail, for debt, unless he is about to leave the island, and has obtained the governor's pass for that purpose. The laws relating to bankruptcy, as practised in England, are wholly unknown in the Manks' jurisprudence: if an insolvent shall have faithfully accounted for, and delivered up, his property on oath for the satisfaction of his creditors, the governor may order him an allowance of sixpence per day for his subsistence, and in default of payment weekly, liberate the prisoner. In respect of arbitrations, no proceedings are cognizable without a rule of court entered into by consent of the parties. No person paying a lord's rent of an ancient quarterland, or £3 of yearly intack, which is regarded as equivalent, is liable to arrest for debt.

The court of Exchequer takes cognizance of all matters connected with the revenue: proceedings are here carried on for the recovery of penalties and forfeitures due to the crown, incurred by frauds upon the customs: the governor, or lieutenant-governor, presides in this court, which is generally held immediately after the court of Chancery, and has power to make, from time to time, such orders and rules for regulating its proceedings as may be found necessary: this court also imposes fines, and determines the right of tithes, which, previously to the act of Tynwald, in 1777, had been cognizable only in the ecclesiastical courts. The court of Common Law is held at Castle Rushen, or at such other place as the governor shall appoint, in Hilary term, on the Tuesday next after the first Thursday in February; in Easter term, on the Tuesday next after the first Thursday in May; in Trinity term, on the Tuesday next after the last Thursday in June; and in Michaelmas term, on the Tuesday next after the 5th of October. This court, in which the governor, or lieutenant-governor presides, assisted by the deemster, takes cognizance of all actions real, personal, and mixed, and of all suits at common law that require to be determined by a jury; which practice of trial by jury appears to have obtained in all places wherein the feudal system was adopted, and in this island has continued from time immemorial. The juries consist of six men, summoned by the coroner, from whose verdict an appeal lies to the House of Keys, who may proceed in the matter according to their judgment; the appellant must, within twenty-one days after the recording of the verdict, give a bond of £3 that he will prosecute the appeal. In cases of trespass, a jury of four men, who are a jury of enquiry, are summoned by one of the deemsters from the parish in which the trespass was committed, or any loss sustained; whose province it is to view and estimate the injury, and to endeavour to discover by whom it was committed. The court is opened by the coroner of Glanfaba, with an address in the Manks' language. The court of General Gaol Delivery is held at Rushen Castle twice in the year, or at such times as the governor, or, in his absence, the lieutenant-governor, may direct: in this court the governor, or lieutenant-governor, presides, assisted by the bishop of the diocese, the arch-deacon, the two vicars-general, the deemsters, the attorney-general, the clerk of the rolls, the water-bailiff, or admiralty judge, and other officers, for determining upon all offences which by the laws of the island are deemed capital. The proceedings, by statute of 1777 and an act of Tynwald in the 57th of George III., require the bill of indictment to be previously found by the grand jury, who not only hear the evidence in behalf of the prosecution, but also receive depositions on the part of the prisoner; by these means they are enabled to decide with greater certainty on the necessity of putting the prisoner on his trial, for which purpose four men are summoned from each of the seventeen parishes in the island, and when a jury of twelve men is empanelled, they are sworn and charged by the deemster: the prosecution is conducted by the attorney-general, and counsel is allowed to the prisoner. When the pleadings are concluded, and the jury have agreed on their verdict, if it be a capital offence, the deemster demands of the foreman, in the Manks' language, "Vod fir charree soie?" in English, "May he that ministers at the altar continue to sit?" if the foreman answers that he may, a verdict of not guilty is returned, and the prisoner is instantly discharged; but should he answer that he may not, it is understood to be the precursor of a verdict of guilty, and the bishop and his clergy immediately retire; the verdict is returned, and the senior deemster then pronounces sentence of death, but the execution is delayed till his Majesty's pleasure shall be known.

The court of Admiralty, in which the water-bailiff presides as sole judge, is held every Saturday, and takes cognizance of all pleas respecting maritime affairs, and of all offences committed on the seas, within the distance of three leagues from the shores of the island; and, according to ancient statutes, has the superintendence of all concerns relating to the herring fishery. Suitors in this court must apply verbally, or by petition, stating the cause of complaint: a summons is then granted to compel the defendant to appear at the next court, when the witnesses on both sides are examined, and the cause is heard and determined, either with or without the assistance of a jury, at the discretion of the judge. Should he deem the cause of sufficient importance to require the attendance of a jury, the judge issues his warrant to the coroner, requiring him to summon four persons out of his sheading, who must give a unanimous verdict, whereupon the judge pronounces his decree, from which in all civil cases an appeal lies to the governor. The Deemsters' courts, which are of great antiquity, are held weekly in the north and south districts into which the island is divided; the former at Ramsey, and the latter at Douglas: they take cognizance of slanders, assaults, batteries, debts, contracts, and all causes not involving the inheritance of land; the process is conducted without the intervention of a jury, and is attended with many advantages independently of their celerity and cheapness. The deemster, in particular cases, will elicit a discovery of facts in the absence of more direct evidence; will order the production of deeds and papers not before the court, but essential to a right judgment of the case, which frequently precludes the necessity of a bill in equity; and in all disputes between landlord and tenant, with respect to the possession of lands and tenements, the cause is heard in a summary way, and in the latter instance the deemster by his judgment orders immediate possession to be given. In all the courts of the island the parties are at liberty to plead their own cause in person, which is generally practised, and till lately there existed very few attorneys, or, as they are here called, advocates: but in matters of great importance the pleadings are usually conducted by an advocate, who, by the statute of 1777, must be commissioned by the governor, and take the requisite oaths. By the same statute, should any advocate become bail in an action, or carry on a suit by champarty, that is, by making any contract either before or during the pleadings, to have part of the lands or profits that may form the object of the suit, he is liable to be fined, or imprisoned, at the discretion of the court, and be rendered incapable of practising in future. The High Bailiffs' courts are held at Castletown, Douglas, Peel, and Ramsey, for the recovery of debts under 40s.; the proceedings are similar to those of courts of requests in England. The court for insolvent debtors, which is held quarterly at Castletown, is similar to the English court. The Ecclesiastical courts are, the consistorial court, the court of the vicars-general, and the chapter, or circuit court. The consistorial court, in which the bishop, or his vicars-general, and registrar preside, takes cognizance of all matters relating to the probates of wills, granting letters of administration, alimony, church assessments, the guardianship of property belonging to minors, and cases of defamation. The court of the vicars-general has cognizance generally of all offences against religion and the interests of the church, and in all cases not cognizable by the common law courts. The chapter, or circuit, court takes cognizance of all matters connected with the see, and the general affairs of the diocese. The proceedings in all these courts, when not otherwise provided for by local enactments, are regulated conformably to the practice of similar courts in England.

Since the grant of the island, by Henry IV., to Sir John Stanley, it has been governed by its own peculiar laws. Its most ancient records are the laws and ordinances enacted by the court of Tynwald, in 1417, the first of which was an act passed by commissioners appointed by the lord of the island and the House of Keys, to prevent abuses of the places of sanctuary, at that time appointed for criminals by some of the ecclesiastics of the island. The Manks' statute book commences in 1422, and contains a collection of statutes, ordinances, and customs, "presented, reputed, and used for the laws of the island." The laws enacted in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries have but little weight as precedents; a more regular system of legislation subsisted in 1764, subsequently to which period very few alterations have been made. The feudal tenure, by which the tenants held their lands in villinage, at the absolute will of the King of Man, or lord proprietor of the soil, in process of time gave way to a more liberal tenure, called holding by the straw, similar to the ancient tenure of the verge in England. At length the tenants became not only ascriptitious to the soil, but acquired permanent estates in land descendible from ancestor to heir, in the nature of free soccage; but there are no statutes declaratory of the settled mode of descent, or of the alienation of lands, prior to the act of Tynwald passed by James, Earl of Derby, his council, deemsters, and keys, in 1645. It is supposed that, prior to the passing of that act, the lord's officers had prevailed upon many proprietors of lands to surrender their estates, which descended to the eldest son, and, in default of male issue, to the eldest daughter, and to accept from the lord leases for lives in lieu of them; but the House of Keys interfering, obtained from the earl not only the passing of that act, but ultimately the celebrated act of settlement, which is emphatically designated the Manks' Magna Charta, in the year 1704. By this act, the purchaser of a farm, quarterland, or other real property, may alienate, or devise his estate, which, if not disposed of, remains as assets, in default of personal property, for the payment of all debts, whether of specialty or of simple contract, without any preference. By the Manks' common law, such property, after one descent from the purchaser, becomes an absolute estate of inheritance, descending to the eldest son, or, in default of male issue, to the eldest daughter, and, in default of issue, to the next of kin, but subject always to any gift, grant, sale, mortgage, lease, or assignment, executed by deed of the owner, to the payment of arrears of the lord's rent, in default of personal property, and to forfeiture for felony or treason. Though lands may be alienated by deed, they cannot by will, except by the first purchaser; neither, after one descent from the purchaser, are they subject to any other than mortgage debts, except property consisting of mills, cottages, or intacks. The term of a Manks' purchase cannot be construed in the larger and more extended sense of Lyttleton's Perquisitio, which includes every kind of title, except only that of hereditary transmission; for, in this island, it is considered only as a purchase for a valuable consideration. The quarterlands, which are analogous to the hides in England, usually comprising about one hundred acres, have, from time immemorial, been considered as property of the highest order in the island; and, though absolute estates of inheritance, are subject by the act of settlement to the payment of a rent to the lord, and a certain fine upon descent or alienation. The tenants' names are, by the act, to be entered in the office rolls, to the intent that, in the event of the conveyance being destroyed, the title may not be impugned, and the estates are thus absolutely and irrevocably confirmed. An estate on which is an unredeemed mortgage of five years' standing passes to the mortgagee, who then becomes the lord's tenant, and pays a certain fine, as in cases of alienation; but the mortgagers have the power of redemption within twenty-one years from the date of the mortgage. All mortgages are null and void if not recorded within six months from the time of their being executed: the most expeditious and easy mode of recovering either the interest or principal due on a mortgage is by application to the court of the deemster, who, after summoning the parties, and hearing the case, will, if the property consist of quarterlands of inheritance, either order the interest to be levied on the personal effects of the mortgager, or give possession of the premises to the mortgagee, who may hold them till payment of the principal, interest, costs, and all other charges be made, according to the conditions of the mortgage deed. In this case he must let the premises by public auction to the highest bidder, and apply the rents to the reduction and discharge of the mortgage. If the premises be purchased lands, cottages, mills, or intacks, the deemster will, if the mortgage deed be in the usual form of bond and security, order payment to be made out of them. Estates consisting of cottages, mills, and intacks, are subject to the payment of debts of the owner, and may be alienated by gift, grant, demise, will, or assignment, but, by the statute of 1777, cannot be deemed personal effects, or chattels, nor made assets in the hands of executors, or be claimed by right of consanguinity, in exclusion of the heir at law. No entail on hereditaments within the island can be created beyond the life of the grantor, or the heirs of persons in esse. The common conveyance of a Manks' freehold is a deed signed by the parties in the presence of two witnesses, not indented, and without seal or stamp, neither of which is necessary for the validity of any deed, except instruments of a public nature, and letters of attorney to be used out of the island, in which cases the government seal is requisite. It is usual and adviseable for the parties to any deed to acknowledge it before a magistrate, who verifies it under his own hand to be their act, and it then becomes admissible as evidence in any court of justice within the island, without the necessity of producing witnesses to prove its execution. There is no statutable form prescribed for the execution of written wills, except that, in cases of land, it is requisite to have two witnesses; but by the statute of 1777, no nuncupative will is valid unless proved by the oaths of two witnesses, and the words, or the substance of them, committed to writing within ten days after the uttering or publishing thereof. If a man marries an heiress and survives her, he shall be entitled to one moiety of her estate, so long as he remains a widower, and also to a moiety of her purchased lands, and during coverture he is solely entitled to the rents and profits; and an heiress after marriage has no power to sell, or lease, her estate, without being joined in a deed to that effect by her husband; neither can the husband sell, or make a lease, of his own estate, without the consent of his wife, so as to prejudice her right in case of survivorship. If a man marry a second wife, having issue by the first, the second can claim after his decease only one-fourth part of his estate of inheritance, during her widowhood; but if there be no issue by the first wife, she can claim a moiety. If a woman be married to a man who is seized of an absolute freehold of inheritance, and survives him, she is entitled to one moiety of his estate, and also to a moiety of his purchased lands, and even in the lifetime of her husband may dispose of them by will to such of her children as she shall think proper, or to her husband, but to no other person; but this right of dower may be barred by settlement before marriage.

The military establishment of the island consists generally of a company or two of regular troops detached from regiments in England, stationed at Castletown, for manning the garrisons, and for the defence of the coast, under the command of the governor: each of the parishes furnishes four men on horseback, armed with a sabre and a pike, under a captain appointed by the governor, and in each there is also an officer appointed by the governor, called the captain of the parish, with powers similar to those of the high bailiffs of the four towns, for the preservation of the peace.

The four towns are, Castletown, Douglas, Peel, and Ramsey. CASTLETOWN, in the parish of Kirk-Malen; anciently called Rushen, being the seat of government, is considered the capital: it is situated at the southern extremity of the island, and on the western shore of Castletown bay, opposite the promontory of Langness point, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W.) from Douglas, the principal port, and contains 2036 inhabitants. This, which is the most ancient of the towns, is supposed to have been coeval with the erection of the castle of Rushen, from which it had its name, and which was founded by Guttred, the second Danish sovereign in succession from Orry: the present buildings, however, appear to have been mostly erected during the last century; the houses are in general neatly built; the streets are regular and well paved, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. Near the castle wall is a spacious area, forming the market-place; and a convenient market-house, with an assembly-room over it, was built in 1830. There is a subscription reading-room well supported. In the town and vicinity are breweries, corn-mills, and a tannery. The town is intersected by a small river, over which are a drawbridge, opposite to the castle, for foot passengers, and higher up a bridge of stone for carriages. The castle, which is of great strength, and was originally the principal fortress in the island, is situated on the west side of the river, which is nearly dry at low water; and is considered to bear a striking resemblance to the castle of Elsinore in Denmark: it is surrounded by a lofty embattled wall and fosse, and defended by a glacis of stone, said to have been added by Cardinal Wolsey, when he was guardian to Edward, Earl of Derby. The building is quadrangular, with square towers on the sides, the largest more than eighty feet high: within the area are some commodious and recently modernised apartments, appropriated as the residence of the lieutenant-governor, and a spacious room in which the several courts of law are held; and on the walls are three buildings of small dimensions, where the records are kept, and the business of the Rolls' office is transacted. The keep, which is built of hard limestone resembling that found in the neighbourhood, is still entire, forming the only prison in the island: it was formerly a very dreary dungeon, in which prisoners were crowded together in dark and damp chambers; but, in 1815, the interior of the castle underwent considerable alterations, and the keep was converted into a prison, divided into three classes, for debtors, and for male and female criminals. In addition to the general law courts, the Tynwald court; the deemsters' summary courts, assembled when they think proper; the water-bailiff's court, every Saturday; the court of the high bailiff of the town, the jurisdiction of which extends over the parishes of Kirk-Arbory, Kirk-Malew, Kirk-Christ-Rushen, and Kirk-St. Anne, for the recovery of debts under 40s., every Saturday; the court for insolvent debtors, quarterly; and the chapter and circuit courts of the vicars-general, in spring and autumn; are held within the castle walls. From the summit of the tower, now appropriated to the execution of criminals, there is an extensive view of the surrounding country, and of Castletown and Pool-vash bays. Near the castle is a neat building for the meeting of the House of Keys. In the vicinity many handsome edifices have been erected within these few years: in levelling the ground for the erection of Lorn House, and the formation of the pleasure grounds, some stone coffins and bones were found. At the distance of a few hundred yards from the town, on the road to Derby haven, was formerly the place of execution, called Hango Hill, where Receiver-General William Christian was shot, in 1662, for surrendering the island to the parliamentarians. The numerous rocks in the bay render access to the town by sea so difficult, that most of the supplies for the consumption of the inhabitants are landed at Douglas bay, or Derby haven, from which latter place a great quantity of corn is exported. The parochial church, Kirk-Malew, is one mile and a half from the town: the old chapel, erected in 1698 by Bishop Wilson, was taken down in 1826, and the present edifice, handsomely built of limestone cemented, with an octagonal tower, has been erected, at an expense of £1600: the interior is well arranged, and contains one thousand one hundred sittings, of which three hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels having granted £300 towards defraying the expense. There are places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics. King William's College was founded, in 1830, by the Hon. Cornelius Smelt, lieutenant-governor; Dr. Ward, bishop of the diocese, and the other trustees of property granted by Bishop Barrow, in 1668, for the promotion of sound learning, and for the education and support of two young men, to supply the Manks' churches, and other charitable and pious uses. The course of studies embraces religious instruction suited to the age of the pupils, the classics, mathematics, oriental literature, the modern languages, navigation, and other sciences, forming a complete and general system of education. The principal, and the other masters, with the exception only of the professors of the oriental and modern languages, must be members of the church of England, and graduates of one of the Universities: the masters, under certain regulations, are allowed to receive pupils of the college, as boarders; the pupils pay a small sum per quarter towards the funds of the college, and a small admission fee towards the establishment of a library. Provision is made, by Bishop Barrow's gift, for the further education at either of the Universities of young men intended for the church; and when the funds of the college will allow it, professors of divinity, law, physic, and surgery, will be added for the benefit of such pupils as, having passed through the ordinary courses of study in the college, may be unable to complete their professional education elsewhere. The buildings, partly in the early English, and partly in the Elizabethan, style of architecture, form a spacious cruciform structure, two hundred and ten feet in length from east to west, and one hundred and thirty-five feet from north to south: from the intersection rises an embattled tower, one hundred and fifteen feet high, strengthened with buttresses, surmounted by an octagonal lantern turret, intended for an observatory, having in each of its faces an elegant lofty window, and crowned with a parapet and handsome pinnacles, carried up from angular buttresses: they include a handsome church, in the early English style, and were erected partly with the money saved out of the academic fund, and partly by the liberal subscriptions of the inhabitants, the expense of building the church having been defrayed from funds collected in England by Bishop Ward, for the erection of new churches in the island: there are also a public lecture-room, a large hall for a library, four large classrooms, and houses for the masters, containing numerous apartments for the accommodation of pupils, and every requisite arrangement for the purposes of the institution: this extensive and handsome pile of building was erected under the superintendence, and after a design, of Messrs. Hansom and Welch, of Liverpool, who are also the architects of the several churches now in progress of erection in the island. A National school, in which two hundred and twenty children are instructed, is supported by subscription; and a parochial charity school for twenty boys is supported by the improper funds of the island. Mrs. Catherine Halsalls, in 1758, bequeathed £8 per annum to a mistress, to teach poor girls to read, sew, knit, and spin, and £2 per annum for repairing the school-house; and Mr. and Mrs. Taubman, in 1799, bequeathed £25 per annum for the support of a free school for twenty-five boys, of which sum, £20 is appropriated as a salary to the master, and £5 to the purchase of books. At Derby haven, which has been previously noticed as a place of landing for persons visiting Castletown, is a small village, chiefly consisting of cottages and some large herring warehouses, and in the neighbourhood of the town are several lime-kilns.

DOUGLAS, the largest, most populous, and greatest commercial town in the island, containing 6054 inhabitants, is situated near the centre of the eastern coast, and on the south of the large semicircular bay of the same name, in the parish of Kirk-Braddan. The town derives its name from the rivers Dhoo and Glass uniting their streams a little above it, and falling into the harbour: it is of a triangular form, the longest side extending from the bridge at the upper end of the harbour, in a north-easterly direction, towards the coast, and the shortest from the same point in a direction towards the pier. The streets are in many parts inconvenient and narrow, and the houses without order or uniformity of appearance; but, from the relative importance of its commerce, and the advantages of its port, it has undergone considerable improvements, and in the suburbs are several new streets regularly formed, and many houses of handsome appearance. The town is partially paved, and lighted during the winter, and the inhabitants are supplied with water brought from a declivity behind the town in casks, and carried about for sale: the pier forms an agreeable promenade, and is much frequented. To the south is a range of hills, called the How of Douglas; and on the north-east are seen the cliff of Clay Head, and the mountains of Snawfel and Pen-y-Pot, with the spacious intervening bay, to the right of which is a long extent of the Cumberland coast, crowned with distant mountains; and from the summit of Douglas head, still more to the right, the high lands of Wales are plainly discernible. The bay, with the town and country above it, rising from its shores in the form of an amphitheatre, forms a beautiful object as approached from the sea, and to the north of the town are extensive and firm sands, much frequented by company in carriages, on horseback, and on foot. About half a mile beyond the town is Mona castle, the magnificent mansion erected by the late Duke of Athol, of a fine white sand-stone, brought from the Isle of Arran, at an expense of £40,000: this castle, and about one hundred acres of land surrounding it, are the only property now belonging to that family. Near it is the elegant marine villa of Col. Stewart, pleasantly situated in the centre of grounds tastefully laid out; and adjoining the lodge is the Marine Terrace, a handsome range of houses recently erected. At the entrance of the bay, on the south shore, is a battery of two guns; and on the banks of the river, to the west of the town, are several handsome seats; among which is the Nunnery, a building in the early style of English architecture, so called from the contiguous ruins of an ancient religious establishment, founded, according to Manks' tradition, in the sixth century, by St. Bridget, of which the prioress was anciently a baroness of the island. The salubrity of the air, and the fineness of the beach, have rendered Douglas a place of general resort for sea-bathing, and suitable residences and lodging-houses have been erected at the northern extremity of the bay, and in the town, for the accommodation of the numerous visitors who frequent it during the summer season: a large hotel, with bathing machines and every requisite accommodation, has been established on the coast of the bay, and in the town are several hotels and boarding-houses. A commodious establishment of hot and cold sea-water baths was erected in 1816. A neat theatre is opened during the season, and assemblies are held in an elegant suite of rooms at the British Hotel: there are several libraries, news-rooms, and billiard tables, in various parts of the town, and a United Service club was established in 1829. Considerable trade is carried on at this port with the neighbouring coasts, and ship-building, both for home and for foreign use, consisting chiefly of small vessels and fishing-boats, is greatly encouraged, the shipwrights being much esteemed for their skill in the construction of those vessels: there are also several extensive soap-manufactories, tan-yards, breweries, and corn-mills in the town and neighbourhood. The custom-house, a commodious building, formerly the residence of the Duke of Athol, is situated on the quay. The intercourse with the neighbouring kingdoms has been greatly facilitated by means of steam-packets: the post-office for the whole island is established in this town, to which letters are brought by the steam-packets from Liverpool, three times in the week during the summer, and once during the winter. There are two steam-packets from Douglas to Liverpool direct, every other day, and during the summer the voyage, seventy-two miles long, is performed in eight hours. Scotch steam-vessels running between Liverpool and Glasgow call here daily, and one from Whitehaven to Dublin calls every Saturday, on her way thither, and every Monday on her return, during the summer: there are also several traders from this port to Liverpool, Whitehaven, and to the Scotch and Irish ports. The Isle of Man district association of the Royal National Institution, for the preservation of life from shipwreck, which institution originated in this island, under the auspices of Sir William Hillary, Bart., is held in this town. It was founded in 1824, under the immediate patronage of the king, the princes of the blood royal, and many of the leading men in the state; and, since its establishment, has paid premiums and bestowed honorary medals for the recovery of one thousand four hundred and forty-six lives: it provides with food, clothing, medical assistance, and the means of restoring to their homes, the destitute sufferers of all nations, and has life-boats and a complete set of Captain Manby's apparatus in constant readiness at all the principal ports. This district association is under the immediate superintendence of the lieutenant-governor, as patron; Sir William Hillary, Bart., president; the Bishop and the Speaker of the House of Keys, vice-presidents; and a general committee of members of the legislature and of the principal inhabitants. The market is on Saturday, and is well supplied with provisions of all kinds brought from different parts of the island: the town is amply supplied with fresh fish throughout the year, and with a little salmon during the summer months; the fair is on November 12th, for cattle. The deemster for the southern division holds his court here as often as may be necessary, and the high bailiff every Saturday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.; the jurisdiction of the latter extends over the parishes of Kirk-Braddan, Kirk-Onchan, Kirk-Lonan, and Kirk-Marown: the vicars-general hold an ecclesiastical court every alternate Friday, and a chapter, or circuit court, in spring and autumn. The court-house, a plain building, is situated near the pier, and has a small lock-up house for the confinement of offenders previously to their being sent to Castletown for trial. The parochial church, called Kirk-Braddan, is two miles distant, on the road to Peel. On one side of the market-place is a small chapel, dedicated to St. Matthew, containing about three hundred sittings, to which is attached a library established by Bishop Wilson, and augmented by Bishop Hyldersley with a bequest of two hundred volumes; and on an eminence to the west of the town is a neat chapel, dedicated to St. George, containing one thousand sittings. A new chapel, which will accommodate one thousand five hundred persons, is now being erected in Fort-street, to be dedicated to St. Barnabas: it is a neat building in the early style of English architecture, with turrets crowned with pinnacles at the angles of the nave; the interior is lighted by a long range of fifteen clerestory windows on each side; at the west end is a handsome tower, surmounted by a spire, a hundred and forty feet high. The livings are perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the Bishop. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics. A National school, established in 1810, for which commodious school-rooms have been erected in Athol-street, at an expense of £1120, is supported by subscription, for the instruction of one hundred and twenty boys, and one hundred and twenty girls; an infant school, in which are one hundred children, has been recently established. The establishment of a public kitchen, under the superintendence of the high bailiff, to which each inhabitant contributes what he may think proper, has afforded material relief from the importunate visits of the poor, to which other parishes are exposed: those poor persons who, from infirmity or illness, cannot attend the public table, are provided with food at their own houses. A medical dispensary has been instituted within the last few years, and is well supported; and there are various benefit and friendly societies in the town.

PEEL, anciently called Holme town, in the parish of Kirk-German, is situated on the western coast, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Douglas, and 12 from Castletown, and contains 1909 inhabitants. It is chiefly remarkable for the remains of its ancient castle and cathedral church, to which it was indebted for its early importance: it was a place of considerable commerce prior to the suppression of the contraband trade, and was the grand resort of smugglers; but since that period the inhabitants have been principally employed in agriculture and in the fisheries, herrings on this part of the coast being taken in the greatest abundance, and not less than seventy boats belong to the harbour. The remains of the castle are situated on a small rocky island, about one hundred yards west of the town, being separated from it by Peel river, which is scarcely a foot deep at low water, and joined to the main land by a stone wall shelving towards the summit, built many years since to defend the harbour: the entrance was formerly by a flight of steps on the eastern side, now almost worn away by time: the walls, which are from three to four feet thick, and flanked with towers, are built of clay-slate, and are in many places quoined and faced with red sand-stone; they enclose a polygonal area of about five acres, which is almost filled with the ruins of walls, buildings, and dwelling-houses; and in the centre is a pyramidal mound of earth, about seventeen yards at the base, surrounded by a ditch five feet and a half broad, supposed to have been either a tumulus raised over the ashes of some illustrious chief, or from the summit of which harangues were made to the populace: the time of the erection of the castle is not known, but it is by some supposed to have been prior to the foundation of Castle Rushen. Till the act of revestment, this fortress, as well as Rushen castle, was garrisoned by native troops, in the pay of the lord of the isles; but since the island became vested in the British crown, the armoury has been removed, the garrison reduced, and the building suffered to decay: within the walls is a two-gun battery. Eleanor, wife of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, in the reign of Henry VI., and the Earl of Warwick, who for a time was banished to this island, and placed under the custody of the garrison, were at different times confined in this castle. Within the area are the ruins of the ancient church of St. German, erected about the year 1245, as the cathedral church, which has not been used, except as a burying-place, for many years: beneath the eastern part of it is the ancient ecclesiastical prison, a vault eighteen feet deep, of which the groined roof is supported on low dwarf pillars, and in one corner is a well. Some of the arches in the transept are remaining, but the building is unroofed and hastening to decay. Bishop Wilson was the last prelate who was enthroned in this church. The ruins of St. Patrick's church are a little to the westward of it: this is supposed to have been the first Christian church in the island, and, though roofless and in a greatly dilapidated state, it retains some characteristics of the Norman style of architecture. In the rocks along the neighbouring coast are many curious caverns: agates and cornelians are found on the sands. The town is paved, and supplied with water from wells. The market is on Friday, chiefly for provisions, with which it is well supplied; and there are fairs on March 28th and July 24th, for horses and cattle. The deemsters hold their courts here occasionally, and the high bailiff every Saturday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.; the jurisdiction of the latter extends over the parishes of Kirk-Ballaugh, Kirk-St. German, Kirk-Michael, and Kirk-Patrick: the vicars-general hold a chapter, or circuit court, in spring and autumn: a new court-house is at present being erected. The parochial church, dedicated to St. Peter, is not distinguished for its architecture; it will accommodate five hundred persons. The free grammar school was founded, in 1746, by Philip Moore, Esq., who endowed it with £500, directing the interest to be paid to a master qualified to teach "the Latin language, and such other learning as may prepare youth for the service of their country in church and state;" the bishop and the twenty-four keys are trustees. A mathematical school was founded, in 1763, by the Rev. James Moore, of Dublin, who bequeathed the ground-rent of three houses in that city, producing then £20 Irish per annum: he also ordered his books to be sold, or exchanged, for mathematical books and instruments for its use. John Stevenson, Esq., of Ashley Park, in the county of Surrey, bequeathed £100 for the instruction of two additional boys; and Caesar Corris, Esq., in 1826, gave also £100 for the instruction of two boys of his own kindred; or, in default of such, for any other boys of the town: the school premises, which were left by Sir George Moore, are in a dilapidated state, no funds having been appropriated for keeping them in repair. Philip Christian, Esq., in 1652, left two houses in Lovel's Inn, Paternoster Row, London, to the Master and Wardens of the Clothworkers' Company, in trust for the yearly payment of £20 to two poor boys, natives of the Isle of Man, as apprentice-fees of £10 each, with an order that, if there should not be a free school in the town of Peel, the money should be paid towards the establishment and maintenance of such a school; £18 per annum of which sum to be paid to the master, and £2 per annum to be appropriated to the purchase of books. Bishop Wilson bequeathed £50 for the instruction of poor girls, and Mr. William Cain left a small piece of land for teaching children. About three miles from the town is the Tynwald Mount, where all new laws, according to ancient usage, must be promulgated to the people: the ascent to its summit, which is about eighteen feet high, is by a flight of steps cut in the turf on the western side; around it are several terraces diminishing in breadth from the base. When the legislative assembly is collected, a chair under a canopy is placed on the summit for the governor, or his deputy, below whom, on the terraces, the deemsters, the council, and the keys, take their places, according to their respective orders, the surrounding area being occupied by the people. The Tynwald court is held annually on the 5th of July, when different officers are chosen for the year. The legislative assembly meet at St. John's chapel, from which, after divine service has been performed, they move in procession to the mount.

RAMSEY is situated on the north-eastern coast, in the parish of Kirk-Maughold, $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Douglas, and 25 (N.E.) from Castletown, near the mouth of the river Sulby, the largest in the island, over which is a stone bridge of three arches, one hundred and fifty feet in length, and twelve in width: it contains 1523 inhabitants. The town is irregularly built, but the streets are wide, clean, and well paved, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. The surrounding country is remarkably picturesque, and in a high state of cultivation. Several handsome seats and pleasing villas, inhabited chiefly by native families of respectability, have been erected. There are many flourishing apple orchards, and the stone fences on most of the estates have given place to quickset hedges. The neighbourhood is remarkable as the scene of the numerous battles fought between the Danes and the Scots, when the latter had possession of the island. The trade is principally in exporting Manks' produce, especially wheat: the amount of exports is about £40,000 per annum: there are no imports, except coal, lime, and such commodities, all colonial and foreign produce being, by act of parliament, landed exclusively at Douglas: the custom-house and the revenue establishment here are under the control of the receiver-general at that port. Seven steam-packets between Liverpool and Glasgow call at this port twice in the week. The market, on Saturday, is abundantly supplied with provisions, which are lower in price than at any other town in the island. The common law courts are held here quarterly, at which a deemster presides, and the deemster for the northern division of the island holds his court occasionally, and the high bailiff every Saturday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.; the jurisdiction of the latter extends over the parishes of Kirk-Andreas, Kirk-Bride, Kirk-Jurby, Kirk-Christ-Lezayre, and Kirk-Maughold. An ecclesiastical court, in which either the bishop or his vicar-general presides, is held every alternate week, and a chapter, or circuit court, in spring and autumn. The court-house, which is the largest in the island, is a neat building ornamented over the entrances with the arms of England and those of the island sculptured in stone. The parish church, dedicated to St. Bridget, is nearly three miles distant from the town, near Maughold head. A chapel, dedicated to St. Paul, is situated in the market-place, and was erected in 1819, by subscription, and a grant of £300 from the Incorporated Society for promoting the enlargement of churches and chapels, in consideration of providing free seats for the poor: it is a neat edifice, with a tower, and contains sittings for five hundred persons: the old chapel, just without the town, is now used only as a burying-place for strangers. There are places of worship for Independents, and Primitive, and Wesleyan Methodists. The grammar school was founded, about the year 1760, by Mr. Charles Cowell, who gave a piece of land, on which to erect a school-room, which was built by subscription; the master, who is minister of the chapel, receives a small quarterage from the bishop's registrar; and formerly an annual sum of £10, called Salt money, was paid by Lord Cholmeley, which, though it has been discontinued for many years, is not lost, as, in 1828, an agent from Chester called on the high bailiff, and offered to pay the money, on receiving a proper discharge; but the bishop not being at that time in the island, the money was not paid. Captain John Kilpatrick left £200 to the poor, and £100 to the parochial school; and Mr. Edward Christian left the moiety of an estate, producing nearly £7 per annum, for the same purpose. There are two National schools, one for boys, and the other for girls, both supported by subscription.

Arms of the Bishoprick.

The ecclesiastical government is vested in a bishop: the see, according to Camden, was first established, in the ninth century, by Pope Gregory IV., in the small village of Sodor, in Iona, or St. Columb's isle, corruptly called Icolmkill, a small island of the Hebrides. In 1098, Magnus, King of Norway, having by conquest obtained possession of those islands and the Isle of Man, united them under one bishop, under whose jurisdiction they continued till the year 1333, when the English possessed themselves of the Isle of Man, and since that period, though the bishop has maintained no claim to the see of Sodor, he has retained the ancient title, being still styled Bishop of Sodor and Man. He enjoys all the dignities and spiritual rights of other bishops, with the exception of having a vote in the house of peers, in which, by courtesy only, he has a seat, the see not being a barony. The see of Man was annexed to the province of York by Henry VIII., in the 33rd year of his reign. Under the bishop, it is governed by an archdeacon, two vicars-general, an episcopal registrar, an official, and other officers.

The island is divided into six sheadings, each of them containing three parishes, with the exception of the sheading of Garff, which contains only two: there are no church-rates or poor-rates, the churches being usually built and repaired by subscription, and the wants of the poor relieved by collections at the doors of the churches, distributed among them by the church, or chapel, wardens. Ayre sheading comprises the parishes of Kirk-Andreas, Kirk-Bride, and Kirk-Christ-Lezayre; Garff sheading, the parishes of Kirk-Lonan and Kirk-Maughold; and Michael sheading, the parishes of Kirk-Ballaugh, Kirk-Jurby, and Kirk-Michael: these sheadings are included within the northern division of the island. In the southern division are Glanfaba sheading, comprising the parishes of Kirk-German, Kirk-Marown, and Kirk-Patrick; Middle sheading, the parishes of Kirk-St. Anne, Kirk-Braddan, and Kirk-Onchan; and Rushen sheading, the parishes of Kirk-Arbory, Kirk-Christ Rushen, and Kirk-Malew. Kirk-Andreas contains 2229 inhabitants: the living is a rectory, in the gift of the Crown: the church, which was one of the oldest in the island, was rebuilt in 1802, and contains six hundred and fifty sittings: in the interior is a handsome marble font, which formerly belonged to Philip I. of France, and being confiscated at the time of the Revolution, was presented to this parish by Mr. Corlett; near the entrance gate is an ancient cross with Runic inscriptions. There is a parochial school, and at Kerro Garrvoo a school for girls, of which the mistress receives thirty shillings per annum, bequeathed by Mr. John Tear. Annual fairs are held in the village, on St. Andrew's and St. John's days, for cattle. Near a seat called Ballacurry is a quadrangular encampment, defended by a bastion at each angle, and surrounded by a wide fosse, in good preservation, supposed to have been constructed by the troops of Cromwell during the parliamentary war; the interior of the area is sufficiently sunk to defend the troops from the fire of an enemy. Some fine barrows have been opened in this parish, and found to contain urns and other relics of antiquity. Kirk-St. Anne, or Santan, contains 800 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church is situated on the old road from Douglas to Castletown. There is a parochial school, to which Mr. William Leece, in 1805, bequeathed £100, and, in the village, a small school of industry for girls. A fair is held on the 31st of May, for cattle. About a mile to the east of the church is an irregular circle of stones, probably Druidical remains; and on the coast, to the left of Greenock creek, is an oblong tumulus, called Cronk na Myrrhon, or the hill of the dead. Kirk-Abury contains 1455 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church, which contains three hundred sittings, has no architectural features. The village of Colby is in this parish. There is a parochial school; and fairs are held June 22nd, October 28th, and December 6th. Near Balladoole is a brackish spring, probably issuing from a salt rock. On the high grounds between Balladoole house and the sea is Kiel-Vaal, or Kirk-Michael; and behind Colby house is Kiel-Pharrick, or Kirk-Patrick, both good specimens of the ancient Kiels, or Kirks, so common in the island. These Kiels consist of a small enclosed area occupied with graves, in the centre of which are the ruins of the ancient church, generally of a quadrangular form, and of diminutive proportions. In the vicinity of the latter are five lofty stones of uncommon dimensions, and some other Druidical remains, and in several parts of the parish barrows are seen. Kirk-Ballaugh contains 1467 inhabitants: the living is a rectory, in the gift of the Crown: the old church, dedicated to St. Mary, and containing three hundred and fifty sittings, is about a mile from the village, near which a new church is now being erected, to contain seven hundred sittings: it will be a neat edifice in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty embattled tower of three stages, strengthened with buttresses and crowned with pinnacles. There is a parochial school in the village, which is well attended. A public brewery has been established, and fairs take place on May 15th and August 26th. In this parish are several rabbit-warrens; and near the village are pits of shell-marl, in which heads, horns, and skeletons of gigantic antediluvian elks have been found, of which a complete skeleton, of the largest dimensions, is deposited in the museum of the University of Edinburgh. Mr. Burman, of Douglas, has in his possession a head, with the horns extending seven feet from tip to tip. Beds of common marl, of great extent and depth, are found in the country towards Kirk-Jurby, and in the adjoining parish of Kirk-Andreas: the road from Ramsey to Kirk-Michael runs through the village. Kirk-Braddan contains 1754 inhabitants, exclusively of those in the town of Douglas: the living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, which is pleasantly situated in a picturesque spot, about two miles from Douglas, on the road to Peel, contains four hundred sittings, but claims no architectural notice, though beautifully situated: in the churchyard are a Runic pillar, with an inscription, and several ancient crosses. There is a parochial school; and in the parish are paper and corn mills, and a linen manufactory, employing about four hundred persons, to which are attached a flax-mill and spacious bleaching grounds; in this factory the whole process is conducted, from the preparation of the raw material to its being spun into yarn, and woven into cloth; the old system of bleaching is adopted, which, being free from any chemical process, has no injurious effect upon the cloth, to which circumstance may be attributed the superior durability of the Manks' linen, of which considerable quantities are exported to the neighbouring ports of the United Kingdom. Near the bleaching green, on that branch of the Douglas river called the Glass, is a fortified hill, named Castle Ward; and in the vicinity are various ruins of Kiels, or Kirks, which are preserved with scrupulous veneration. Kirk-Bride contains 1001 inhabitants: the living is a rectory, in the gift of the Crown: the church, containing two hundred and fifty sittings, is dedicated to St. Bridget: over the chancel door is a stone, about a foot square, on which are rudely carved figures representing Adam and Eve plucking the forbidden fruit. There is a parochial school; and fairs are held on April 12th and May 6th, for cattle. In this parish is the point of Ayre, the northern extremity of the island: the land is very low, and the shoals that extend to a considerable distance from the shore have occasioned many shipwrecks. A few years since, a lighthouse near the point was erected, to the height of one hundred and six feet above the level of the sea: it is furnished with a revolving light, shewing alternately a red and white colour, which attain their greatest brilliancy every two minutes: the white light may be seen at the distance of four or five leagues, but the red light is not visible at so great a distance. Maughold head intercepts the view of a navigator to the south, and Rice point to the west, of Ayre point: there are several tumuli in the parish. Kirk-Christ Lezayre contains 2209 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and containing two hundred and fifty sittings, is about two miles from Ramsey, and a little way out of the road to Kirk-Michael. A new church is now being erected, in the early style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire, which will contain eight hundred and fifty sittings. The parish, which comprises the village of Sulby, is very extensive, and may be considered as the garden of the Isle of Man, abounding with picturesque views, and diversified with beautiful scenery. In addition to the parochial school are the Sulby school, founded by Mrs. Christian, who endowed it with property producing £11 per annum; and Mountain school, founded in 1764, by Mr. John Kelly, of Coo-il-Isischael, who bequeathed £71 for that purpose, and to the support of which Mr. Philip Quayle gave his quarterland of Ischeag, and Mr. William Kelly a portion of Intack in Kirk-Ballaugh, called Lhiargey-we-howne, producing about £5 per annum. Fairs for cattle are held at Sulby on the 8th and 24th of June. Turf and bog timber are found in great abundance in this parish. Kirk-Christ Rushen contains 2568 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, contains four hundred sittings. Mrs. Clague left £3 per annum out of an estate called the Grampiones, and the Rev. John Clague bequeathed £2. 11. 5. to the parochial school, and Miss Qualtrough left £100 for founding a school. In this parish are the small villages of Port-Erin and Port-le-Mary. Between these villages are the Giants' quoiting stones, two huge masses of unhewn clay-slate, about ten feet high, three feet wide, and two feet thick. Within a mile of these is Fairy Hill, a barrow, situated in a low morass, from which two defiles lead to Port-Erin bay, and the creek of Fleswick: the hill is a truncated cone forty feet high, and one hundred and fifty yards in circumference, completely surrounded by a deep and wide ditch; on the summit is a circular excavation, ten yards in diameter, with a regular parapet; the sides of the hill facing the defiles are almost perpendicular, and on the north-east side a pathway to the summit is discernible. According to the ancient modes of warfare, it must have been an almost impregnable fortress, all access to which might have been prevented by inundating the morass. In this parish are Spanish Head, previously noticed, and the Calf of Man, of which a small portion is converted into arable land, but the greater part consists of sheep-walks: it is leased to a farmer, who has erected a house in the centre, and whose family and servants, together with those who have the care of the lighthouses, are the only inhabitants. The Calf of Man is tithe free, having neither church nor minister; and, except in the garden of the farmer, there is neither tree nor shrub in it. Rabbits are found in abundance, nearly two thousand being killed annually, and the islet is a great place of resort for sea-fowl and aquatic birds of every description; the copper mines of Brada are also in this parish. Kirk-German contains 1849 inhabitants, exclusively of those in the town of Peel: the living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Bishop: the church, dedicated to St. Peter, which is situated in the town of Peel, contains sittings for five hundred persons. There is a parochial school. Fairs are held at St. John's on May 1st and 18th, July 5th, and November 1st and 18th. There are several ancient kiels in the parish. Kirk-Jurby contains 1108 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Bishop: the church, dedicated to St. Patrick, and containing two hundred and eighty sittings, is about half a mile to the north-east of Point Jurby, occupying an elevated situation, from which the high lands of England, Scotland, and Ireland, may be plainly discerned. In the churchyard is a barrow, and in the parish are various others, besides several watch and ward hills. There is a parochial school; and fairs are held on April 5th, for hiring female servants, and on November 20th for cattle.

Turf and bog-timber are found in this parish in great abundance. Kirk-Lonan contains 1846 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church, dedicated to St. Lomanus, contains three hundred sittings, and is not distinguished by any architectural features. A new church, in the early style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire, and containing five hundred sittings, is now being erected in the parish. There is a parochial school; and an annual fair is held at Laxey, on the 5th of August, for cattle. About a mile from the church, on the sea-shore, is the small village of Laxey, pleasantly situated at the mouth of a stream of that name, which abounds with trout. Upon the banks of the river, a little higher up the village, are a flax-mill and a paper-mill, in the latter of which a considerable quantity of paper is manufactured for home consumption and for exportation; and about a mile further up the glen are the lead and copper mines. The glen presents a fine landscape, having Snawfel and other mountains in the back ground: the greater part of Snawfel is in this parish, and the summit, from its central situation, commands a more complete view of the surface of the island than can be obtained from any other eminence. On the north side of Laxey hill is an imperfect Druidical circle of small diameter; and a little lower down is a terrace three yards wide, leading to a cairn of considerable magnitude, composed of loose stones thrown together without order, and having, at the extremity of the base, a lofty stone pillar; the summit is nearly level. About two miles on the road to Douglas are the Cloven stones, a Druidical tomb, or altar, so called from two lofty stones more conspicuous than the rest, which appear to have been riven asunder. Tradition records these stones to have been the grave of a Welch prince, who, having landed at Laxey, on his invasion of the island, was slain by the natives, and buried on the spot where he fell. A little further up the river there is a fine specimen of an ancient fortified hill; and in various parts of the parish are several barrows and cairns, of which considerable numbers are found in many parts of the island. Kirk-Malew contains 2649 inhabitants, exclusively of those in Castletown: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church, containing five hundred and thirty sittings, is situated about a mile and a half from Castletown, on the road to Peel. About three miles to the north-east of it is St. Mark's chapel, erected in 1772, under the auspices of Bishop Hyldersley, who purchased the glebe for it: it was repaired, in 1830, at the expense of the Bishop of the diocese. Besides Castletown, this parish includes the village of Ballasalla, Derby haven, and Langness point. Independently of the schools in that town, there are parochial schools at Ballasalla and at St. Mark's. Fairs are held, January 5th and May 12th, at St. Mark's; and April 25th, August 12th, and September 29th, at Ballasalla, for cattle. Ballasalla is the most extensive and populous village in the island: the scenery in its vicinity is richly diversified and picturesque; the venerable remains of Rushen abbey are seen on the banks of the river, and form an interesting feature in the view; the mountain of South Barrule is chiefly in this parish, and on its northern declivities are extensive slate quarries. About two miles from St. Mark's chapel are the Foxdale lead mines, which are now being worked with great benefit to the proprietors; there are also in the parish several flax and corn mills, and some extensive breweries. In various parts of the coast are barrows and several ancient fortifications, among which are the remains of a circular encampment, surrounded with a fosse, and defended by a parapet with gates: adjoining the fosse are some large blocks of granite, one of which is called the Stone of Goddard Crovan; and the fortification, most probably of Danish origin, is, by Sir Walter Scott, in his Peveril of the Peak, noticed under the appellation of the Black Fort. Kirk-Marown contains 1201 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church, which is situated in the western part of the parish, five miles from Douglas, and six from Peel, contains only two hundred and fifty sittings. The parochial school is well attended; and there are fairs on February 2nd and May 20th, for cattle. A woollen manufacture, the only one in the island, was established in this parish in 1803, and after having been accidentally burnt down, was rebuilt on a more extensive scale in 1828: about one hundred persons are employed in the manufacture of cloth, which is not inferior in quality to the cloth made in England, though it is full twenty per cent less in price; it is not allowed to be exported, and, with a view to encourage this branch of manufacture, a considerable tax is imposed not only upon all cloths, but even upon all clothes made up, which are imported from any other country. This is the most inland parish in the island, and is chiefly remarkable for some relics of antiquity, among which are the remains of the ancient chapel of St. Trinian, and, on the northern acclivity of Mount Murray, the most perfect remains of a Druidical temple to be found in the island: it is formed of stones of moderate size, placed erect and at regular distances, enclosing a circle fourteen yards in diameter; on each side is a stream of water, issuing from fountains about fifty yards higher up the mountain, which by the Druids were held sacred: to the east of the enclosure are two walls, or mounds, constructed of stones and earth, bending round the temple, in a semicircular direction, and about five yards distant from each other: the spot of ground on which these remains are situated is barren, bleak, and uncultivated; but from the name "Glen Darrah," which in the Manks' language signifies the vale of oaks, it would appear that it was originally planted with those trees, which the Druids held in great veneration: there are numerous ancient kiels in the parish. Kirk-Maughold contains 1514 inhabitants, exclusively of those in the town of Ramsey, from which the village of Maughold is three miles distant: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church, dedicated to St. Maughold, and containing two hundred and sixty sittings, is situated in the centre of a spacious area, comprising, at least, three acres of consecrated ground, which was formerly a sanctuary for criminals; the ancient font, which is very large, has been removed from the interior of the church, and placed on one side of the entrance. In the churchyard are numerous monuments, among which is a very handsome one to the memory of Captain Hugh Crowe, a native, and commander of several merchant-vessels: opposite to the church gate is a Danish cross, and near it a column, consisting of a circular shaft, about five feet high, surmounted by a cubic block of stone, on one side of which is sculptured a representation of our Saviour on the Cross, with the arms of the Isle of Man beneath; on the opposite side, the Virgin and Child; on the third side, a figure in the attitude of supplication, supposed to represent St. Bridget; and on the fourth side is supposed to have been a representation of St. Maughold, now totally defaced. The Society of Friends have a burial-ground in this parish, and formerly a distinct portion of the churchyard was appropriated exclusively to their use. The parochial school has received several small bequests, in addition to its original funds. A fair is held on the 11th of August, for cattle. About half-way between the village and the town of Ramsey is a stone cross, of great antiquity, six feet high, three feet wide, and five inches thick, having on its summit five raised balls, similar to which are some stones in the churchyard, supposed to be of Danish origin. Maughold Head is a bold promontory, terminating in a precipitous and lofty cliff, and forming the most easterly point of the island. On its summit are tiers of moss-clad rocks, and on one of the acclivities is a spring, called St. Maughold's well, which was formerly, and is still, much resorted to for its supposed medicinal virtues. At Ballaglass is a waterfall, surrounded with woodland scenery, forming the highest and the most picturesque cascade in the island: it arises from the obstruction of the course of the rivulet Dhoones, on the coast between the boundaries of Maughold and Lonan. The mountain of North Barrule, one of the most lofty and remarkable elevations, adds greatly to the grandeur of the varied and romantic scenery for which this parish is distinguished. Kirk-Michael contains 1427 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church is in the centre of the village, about a quarter of a mile from the sea, and contains sittings for three hundred persons; the chancel was built by Dr. Wilson, after the death of his father: the churchyard contains many monuments with Runic inscriptions, and the tombs of the venerable Bishop Wilson, who died in the ninety-third year of his age, and the fifty-eighth of his prelacy; and his successor, Bishop Hyldersley; in addition to whom, Dr. John Philips, Dr. George Mason, and Dr. C. Crigan, also bishops of this see, were buried here. Near the church gate is a lofty square Runic pillar of blue stone, curiously sculptured, from the base to the summit, with devices singularly involved with each other, and bearing an inscription representing it to have been erected in honour of Thurulf, a Norwegian chief: there are numerous barrows in the neighbourhood. Near the village a neat court-house has been erected within the last few years, in which the consistory court is held, on the last Thursday in every month, except September and December, and at which the bishop presides, either in person or by his vicars-general and registrar: the vicars-general hold their chapter, or circuit courts, in spring and autumn. Bishop's Court, the episcopal palace, is situated about a mile to the west of the village: it is a very ancient structure, and is mentioned in history so early as the thirteenth century: the original building was a massive tower, surrounded at some distance by a deep fosse; but various additions have been subsequently made. Dr. George Murray, the present Bishop of Rochester, when presiding over this diocese, erected the present elegant chapel, added several rooms, and also improved and embellished the demesne, which comprises from three to four hundred acres. Bishop Hyldersley, in 1764, purchased a plot of ground, on which he built a school-house with dwellings for the master and the mistress, and gave £30, the interest to be appropriated to keeping them in repair. There are fairs on the 10th and 29th of October, for cattle. The high road from Ramsey to Peel runs through the village. Kirk-Onchan contains 1451 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Crown: the church, dedicated to Oncha, the mother of St. Patrick, contains three hundred sittings, but is not entitled to architectural notice. A new church, in the early style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire, is at present being erected, and will contain five hundred sittings. There is a parochial school, and the fair is on the 20th of May, for cattle. The village is pleasantly situated about two miles from Douglas, on the road to Laxey and Ramsey, and the high grounds command interesting and extensive views of the bay and harbour of Douglas, with the vessels going in and out of that much-frequented port, and of the surrounding country, which abounds in bold and varied scenery. The creeks and bays on the coast produce a variety of marine plants and mosses, the latter of which are tinged with various hues, and with the most beautiful shades of red, green, brown, and yellow, and some few with tints of blue: there are several barrows in various parts of the parish. Kirk-Patrick contains 2031 inhabitants: the living is a vicarage, in the gift of the Bishop. The parish was united to St. German's till 1714, when a separation took place, and the present church, containing three hundred and twenty sittings, was erected, chiefly through the exertions of Bishop Wilson, who gave £50 towards the augmentation of the endowment. Mr. Thomas Radcliffe, of Knockaloe, bequeathed £5 per annum out of an estate called Gobbreek, to the master of the parochial school, for teaching children from the former place. A fair for cattle is held annually on May 17th. To the south of the church is the beautiful waterfall of Glen Moij, formed by a rivulet, which, descending from the mountains, winds through the vale, and enters the glen; the banks of which, richly clothed with trees and shrubs, are rugged, and, in some places, nearly perpendicular. The stream, murmuring gently through the various obstructions in its course, falls down the precipitous banks of the glen with a pleasing effect; the adjacent scenery is strikingly picturesque. The glen is surrounded by hills: on the north bank is a precipitous and lofty rock, partly concealed by the ivy that over-spreads it, and the south bank is richly wooded: the vale, winding round the hill, presents a view of the sea, into which the river, after a circuitous course, gently glides. In the vicinity is a vein of lead-ore, near which a mountain stream, descending with impetuosity, and falling over an abrupt rock of considerable elevation, forms a cascade. In this parish are several quarries of blue slate, little inferior in quality to that of Wales. In the several churches, the service is performed alternately in the Manks and English languages. The whole number of dissenting places of worship in the island exceeds forty. By letters patent, dated 1675, Charles II. granted an annuity of £100, payable from his Majesty's Exchequer, out of the excise duties, towards the maintenance of poor clergymen of the Isle of Man, out of which £3 per annum was to be paid to the schools of Castletown, Douglas, Ramsey, Kirk-Andreas, Kirk-Ballaugh, and Kirk-Bride: the impropriate tithes of the several parishes of Kirk-Arbory, Kirk-Christ-Lezayre, Kirk-Lonan, Kirk-Malew, Kirk-Marown, Kirk-Michael, Kirk-Onchan, Kirk-Christ-Rushen, and Kirk-St. Anne's were also purchased from Charles, Earl of Derby, by Bishop Barrow and Archdeacon Fletcher, on lease for ten thousand years, for the sum of £1000, as appears by indenture, dated November 1st, 1666, for the purpose of augmenting the stipends of the poorer livings, and for the erection of a free school, and the support of a master, in each of the parishes in the island. On the death of James, Earl of Derby, in 1735, James, Duke of Athol, as heir-general of the Derby family, took possession of these tithes, for the recovery of which, or for indemnity for the loss, Bishop Wilson and Archdeacon Kippax, in 1742, filed a bill in Chancery, with a view to seize upon the collateral securities, viz., the manors of Bispham and Methop in the county of Lancaster, which, by a decree of the court of Chancery, were assigned to the earl, in consideration of his paying annually, on Easter-Monday, the sum of £219. 7. 10½., at the town hall in Liverpool: this payment having been discontinued in 1809, a bill of reviver was filed by Bishop Crigan and Archdeacon Mylrea, who eventually obtained the payment into the Bank of England of £16,000, in discharge of the obligation: the produce of this sum, £600 per annum, is appropriated to the augmentation of all church livings under £90 per annum, which are raised to that sum; to the payment of £60 per annum to the master of the grammar school at Castletown, and £5. 10. per annum to each of the masters of the parochial schools. James, Duke of Ormond, in 1676, charged certain of his estates in Ireland with the payment of £60 per annum, for the establishment of a lectureship in philosophy, history, and logic: after the duke's death the payment was discontinued, and Bishop Wilson obtained, in commutation, the sum of £600, the produce of which is appropriated to that purpose. Bishop Barrow, in 1668, gave two estates in the island, viz., Ballagilley and Hango Hill, then producing £20 per annum, for the education and support of two young men, to supply the Manks' churches, and for such other charitable uses as his trustees should think proper: these estates at present produce £500 per annum. Lady Elizabeth Hastings, in 1739, bequeathed £40 per annum from lands and tenements in Collingham, Shadwell, and Burton-Salmon, in the West riding of the county of York, to be distributed among the parishes of Kirk-Arbory, Kirk-Braddan, Kirk-German, Kirk-Jurby, Kirk-Christ-Lezayre, Kirk-Lonan, Kirk-Malew, Kirk-Marown, Kirk-Maughold, Kirk-Michael, Kirk-Onchan, Kirk-Patrick, Kirk-Rushen, and Kirk-Santan, for the instruction of children. Mrs. Catharine Halsalls, in 1758, bequeathed houses and lands in the Isle of Man, now producing £111. 14. 6. per annum, to erect a dwelling-house for the master of the grammar school at Castletown; to erect and endow a free school there for teaching girls only; to augment the four livings in the patronage of the Bishop, and that of Kirk-Christ-Rushen, with £4 per annum each; and the residue to be annually applied to the support of the widows, and apprenticing the orphan children, of clergymen. The Rev. Dr. Wilson, in conjunction with his father, Bishop Wilson, in 1730, established a fund for the support of widows and children of clergymen, and a sum of money was raised and vested in the English funds for that purpose, producing £12 per annum; which revenue was subsequently augmented by the purchase of one-third of the tithes of Kirk-Michael from the Duke of Athol, which was assigned to trustees. Miss Stevenson, of Ashley Park, in the county of Surrey, also bequeathed £500 South Sea annuities for the use of this charity, which was afterwards exchanged for a mortgage on lands: the whole income arising from these various sources is at present £110 per annum. Bishop Hyldersley left £600 to the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, to supply the island with tracts.

MANACCAN, a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by S.) from Falmouth, containing 591 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £4. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church, dedicated to St. Menacus and St. Dunstan, has lately received an addition of one hundred free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £13 towards defraying the expense. In this parish is the small port of Helford, and at Tregonnell are the ruins of a chapel. In the vale of Manaccan, or Menachan, was discovered, several years since, a mineral substance, which, being analysed, was found to contain a new metal, called menachanite, and subsequently titanium.

MANATON, a parish in the hundred of TEING-BRIDGE, county of DEVON, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Chudley, containing 403 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$.. The Rev. W. Carwithen was patron in 1824. The church, dedicated to St. Winifred, has a rich screen. At Grimspound, in this parish, is an enclosure of loose stones, containing about three acres, within which are several minor enclosures: some have thought it a Druidical work; and others, with greater probability, a Stannary court.

MANBY, a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Louth, containing 236 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 10. 2. Mrs. Wray was patroness in 1806. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MANBY, a hamlet in the parish of BROUGHTON, eastern division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Glandford-Bridge. The population is returned with the parish.

MANCETTER, a parish in the Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. E.) from Atherstone, comprising the market town of Atherstone, and the hamlets of Harts-hill and Oldbury, and containing 4482 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Rev. Benjamin Richings. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, occupies an eminence supposed to have been the site of a camp, being deeply intrenched. Near it was the Roman station called, by Antoninus, Manduessedum, of an oblong form, with large ramparts enclosing an area of about seven acres, intersected by the Roman Watling-street; the north-western side, called Castle banks, being in Warwickshire, and the south-eastern, called Oldfield banks, in Leicestershire. Oval flint axes, or celts, Roman bricks, coins of gold, silver, and brass, with various other relics of antiquity, have been found here. The river Anker, and the Coventry canal, run through the parish. Here are stone quarries, said to be the most extensive in the kingdom; also several very productive mines of manganese, of superior quality. In the village of Mancetter is an hospital, endowed with a bequest of £2000 from James Gramer, in 1724, for six poor men, each of whom receives six shillings a week: there are also a free grammar and two other endowed schools in the parish.

MANCHESTER, a parish in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the manufacturing and market town of Manchester, the chapelries of Ardwick, Blackley, Cheetham, Chorlton cum Hardy, Denton, Didsbury, Gorton, Heaton-Norris, Newton, Salford, and Stretford, and the townships of Beswick, Bradford, Broughton, Burnage, Chorlton-row, Crumpsall, Droylsden, Failsworth, Harpurhey, Houghton, Hulme, Levenshulme, Moss-Side, Moston, Openshaw, Reddish, Rushulme, and Withington, and containing, according to the last census, 186,942 inhabitants, of which number, including Salford, 133,788 are in the town of Manchester, 36 miles (E. by N.) from Liverpool (but only 31 by the rail-road), 54 (S. E. by S.) from Lancaster, and 186 (N. W. by N.) from London. The origin of this town, which is remarkable for the extent of its trade and the importance of its manufactures, may be traced to a period of remote antiquity. In the time of the Druids, it was distinguished as one of the principal stations of their priests, and celebrated for the privilege of sanctuary attached to its altar, which, in the British language, was called Meyne, signifying a stone. Prior to the Christian era, it was one of the principal seats of the Brigantes, who had a castle, or strong hold, called Mancenion, or the place of tents, near the confluence of the rivers Medlock and Irwell, the site of which, still called the "Castle Field," was by the Romans, on their conquest of this part of the island under Agricola, about the year 79, selected as the station of the Cohors Prima Frisiorum, and, with reference to its original British name, called by them Mancunium; hence its Saxon name Manceastre, from which its modern appellation is obviously derived. This station was for nearly four centuries occupied by the Romans, and amply provided with every thing requisite for the accommodation and subsistence of the garrison established in it, having also a water-mill on the Medlock, at some distance below the town, the site of which still retains the name of

Seal and Arms.

Knott mill. The station included a quadrangular area, five hundred feet in length and four hundred in width, the interior not exactly level, but rising from the centre towards the sides, on which a rampart of earth sloping inwards was raised from the ground surrounding the enclosure, which is consequently lower than the site of the castrum: on the summit of this rampart a wall was originally built, which extended round the enclosure, on one side of which was the castle, or fort; but very little of the foundation of the wall is at present discernible, the few remaining portions being under ground, and the greater part of the site covered with modern buildings. From this station, as from a common centre, Roman roads branched off to those of Cambodunum, Eboracum, Condate, Rigodunum, Veratinum, and Rerigonium. In the vicinity of the aboriginal settlement, which has obtained the name of Aldport, Roman urns and other vessels, stones inscribed to centurions of the cohort, votive altars, coins, fibulæ, and lachrymatories, have been found at various times; and without the vallum, foundations of Roman buildings, and other vestiges of antiquity, have been frequently discovered. The Roman road to Cambodunum, commenced at the east gate of the castrum, and pursuing a north-eastern direction, passed over Newton heath into the county of York; the road leading to Eboracum branched off from the former at a distance of less than two miles from Mancunium, and passing by the townships of Chadderton and Royton, continued in a north-eastern direction through Littleborough, and over Blackstone Edge, to the city of York; the road to Condate passed from the east gate of the castrum, through the village of Stretford, to the ford of Mersey, and thence to Kinder-ton; the road to Rigodunum branched off from the road to Condate about a mile from its commencement, and taking a south-westerly direction, crossed the river Irwell at Old Trafford, terminating at Blackrode; the road to Veratinum diverged from that to Rigodunum, and after passing by Eccles, continued through Barton to Warrington; and the road to the station Rerigonium commenced at the north-west gate of Mancunium, and passing Quay-street, ran nearly parallel with Deans-gate, and after crossing the river Irk passed over Kersall moor to Ribchester: there were also several smaller vicinal ways, of which some slight vestiges may be traced.

After the departure of the Romans, the fort of Mancunium was taken from the Britons, about the year 488, by a party of the Saxons, who had forcibly established themselves in this part of the kingdom: they placed a garrison in it, which, however, surrendered to the British, who retained possession whilst Arthur Pendragon was prosecuting his victories over that people. In 620, it was captured by Edwin, King of Northumbria, who annexed it to his dominions; and soon afterwards a colony of Angles settled here. In 627, the inhabitants were converted to Christianity, by the preaching of Paulinus, a missionary employed by Gregory I., and a Christian church was built, and dedicated to St. Michael. Manchester having been taken by the Danes, was, about 920, wrested from their possession by Edward the Elder, who repaired and fortified the castle, and rebuilt the town, which had been almost destroyed in the assaults of the invaders, placing in it a strong garrison of his own soldiers, on account of its being a frontier town between the kingdoms of Mercia and Northumbria. It was raised to the distinction of a burgh, with extensive privileges, and for some time continued highly prosperous; but being exposed to repeated attacks, and having suffered so much injury in the wars between the Northumbrians and the Danes, notwithstanding its enlargement by Edward, it appears, at the time of the Conquest, to have been in every respect inferior to Salford, a Saxon settlement on the opposite bank of the Irwell, which, being a royal demesne, had risen into importance, and imparted name to the hundred: in the Norman survey we find that Manchester contained two churches, but it is not otherwise mentioned as a place of any note. Soon after the Conquest, it came into the possession of Albert de Gresley, whose descendant, Robert, the fourth lord of Manchester, obtained for it, in the reign of Henry III., the grant of an annual fair on the eve and festival of St. Matthew. In the reign of Edward I., the barons, in order to raise a greater number of men to serve in the army destined for the invasion of Scotland, conferred several privileges on their vassals; and Thomas de Gresley, sixth baron of Manchester, upon that occasion, granted to the inhabitants those rights and immunities which have been emphatically called the "Magna Charta of Manchester." This charter, which was granted on the 14th of May, in the year 1301, among other privileges, confers the right of choosing a borough-reeve; of disposing of their lands of inheritance according to their pleasure, reserving only to the heir, in such cases, the prior right of purchase; the power of arresting for debt within the borough the persons of knights, priests, or clerks, and various other privileges. The baron of Manchester was thrice summoned to parliament by writ in the reign of this monarch, by whom he was made Knight of the Bath, and was one of the barons who, in the reign of Edward II., conspired against Piers Gavestone. About seventy years before this, Salford was made a free borough, by charter from Ranulph de Blundeville, Earl of Chester.

In 1352, the manufacture of "Manchester cottons," a kind of woollen cloth made from the fleece in an unprepared state, was introduced, and obtained a high degree of celebrity; and in the course of this reign, numerous Flemish artisans, who had been invited into England by Edward III., settled in the town, where, finding every requisite advantage, they brought the woollen manufacture to a considerable degree of perfection, and laid the foundation of its staple trade; which, though interrupted by the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, and subsequently, in the reign of Edward VI., by a dreadful malady, called the sweating sickness, had, in the reign of Elizabeth, become of such importance, that one of the queen's aulnagers (officers appointed to examine, and affix the seal to, manufactured cloth) was stationed here, in 1565. During the progress of the Reformation, an ecclesiastical commission for the diocese of Chester was established at Manchester, and numbers of popish recusants, from various parts of Lancashire, were imprisoned in the New Fleet, which appears to have been erected about that time, and probably for that purpose. The commissioners were Henry Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon; Edwin Sandys, Archbishop of York; the Earl of Derby; and Dr. Chadderton, Bishop of Chester, who then resided in the episcopal palace at Manchester, but, in consequence of frequent disputes between his servants and the inhabitants removed to Chester. The commissioners, though principally engaged in promoting the reformed religion, and in the detection and punishment of popish recusants, published, during their sittings at Manchester, a declaration against pipers and minstrels attending bear and bull baitings, against the "superstitious ringing of bells, wakes, festivals, and other amusements;" to counteract the influence of which prohibition, James I. published his celebrated Book of Sports. Among the persons confined in the New Fleet, under the authority of this commission, were, Sir John Southworth; James Layborne, an eminent layman, who was executed at Lancaster in 1583, his head having been sent to Manchester, and placed, with those of others, on the steeple of the collegiate church; James Bell, and John Finch, who were executed in 1584; John Townley, Esq.; and the lady of Bartholomew Hesketh, Esq. Having been originally a place of sanctuary, it was one of the eight places to which this privilege was confirmed, by a statute in the 32nd of Henry VIII., which, in the following year, was transferred to Chester. During the threatened invasion by Philip of Spain, Manchester supplied one hundred and forty-four men armed with bills and pikes, thirty-eight archers, and thirty-eight arquebusiers, to assist in repelling the "Invincible Armada."

At the commencement of the parliamentary war, Sir Cecil Trafford, with a view to strengthen the king's cause, supplied the inhabitants of Manchester and the neighbouring towns with arms and ammunition; but the county, anxiously desirous of peace, sent a petition to the king, then at York, requesting him to propose terms of reconciliation with the parliament, the presentation of which was entrusted to a deputation, consisting of the warden of Manchester, and other freeholders of the county, among whom was John Bradshaw, supposed to be the same individual that, six years after, pronounced sentence of death upon the king, as president of the High Court of Justice. All hopes of reconciliation having vanished, Manchester became the scene of much obstinate contention. The commissioners of array visited it, to demand ammunition for the use of the king; but the town having been previously secured for the parliament, by Ralph Ashton, one of the representatives of the county, the inhabitants refused to surrender; and Lord Strange, with a considerable force, attempting to enter it, they took up arms, and being joined by numbers from the adjacent country, a skirmish took place, in which several men on both sides were killed: this event, which was regarded by the House of Commons as the commencement of the war, was, by the Speaker, announced as "terrible news from the north." The inhabitants, apprehending a more serious attack, fortified the town; and the king, having set up his standard at Nottingham, sent Lord Strange, with four thousand infantry, seven pieces of cannon, and some cavalry, to reduce it. After an obstinate conflict for several days, during which it was defended by Captain Bradshaw, aided by Lieut. Col. Rosworm, an able German engineer, Lord Strange, being summoned, on the death of the Earl of Derby, to join the king, whose headquarters were then at Shrewsbury, withdrew his forces, and raised the siege. To guard against future assaults, the fortifications which had been hastily thrown up, were completed and enlarged, and instructions were given by the parliament to the committee for the defence of the kingdom, to levy a body of dragoons to serve in Manchester, and the neighbourhood, and to indemnify the inhabitants for the loss they had sustained in resisting the commissioners of array; and, to supply them with money to defray the expense of future services, a loan was raised, the interest of which was paid by parliament, and, as an immediate resource, the pay of the officers of the garrison was ordered to be levied on the estates of the royalists. Manchester now became the head-quarters of the parliamentary army stationed in Lancashire, and, in 1643, Sir Thomas Fairfax entered the town, whence he despatched expeditions against Preston and Lancaster, both which surrendered to the parliament. It was again summoned by the Earl of Newcastle, at the head of ten or twelve thousand men, but being unsuccessful, the earl took the route to Hull, in pursuit of Fairfax: it does not appear to have sustained any further attack. During the Protectorate of Cromwell, Manchester, in obedience to the Protector's writ to the high sheriff of Lancaster, made two successive returns of a member to serve in parliament, in common with other towns, which have not since exercised the elective franchise. In 1652, the walls were thrown down, the fortifications demolished, and the gates carried away and sold, a measure which appears to have originated in its growing commercial importance, and its increase in wealth and population. The restoration of Charles II., however, was celebrated in the town with the most splendid pomp and ceremony; the utmost festivity and rejoicings took place, and the public conduits were made to flow with wine in copious streams. In 1715, a tumultuous assembly, headed by one Syddall, a barber, demolished the Independent chapel, in Acres Fields, at that time the only dissenting place of worship in the town, and proceeded to commit other depredations; but the insurrection was quelled, and Syddall, with several of his accomplices, were committed to Lancaster gaol: Syddall, on his liberation from prison, joined the rebels in Preston, and, being again taken prisoner, was sent to this town and executed.

In 1745, Prince Charles Edward, the young Pretender, who the year before had visited Manchester, where he was hospitably entertained for several weeks at Ancoat's Hall, the mansion of Sir Edward Moseley, Bart., entered the county of Lancaster, at the head of an army of six thousand men, and advanced to this town, with a view to recruit his forces, and to raise supplies of men, arms, and money. On the 28th of November, the advanced guard, consisting of about one hundred cavalry, entered the town, and demanded quarters for ten thousand men, and on the following day the main body arrived; in the afternoon the young Pretender took up his quarters in the house of Mr. Dickenson, in Market-street, from that circumstance called the palace, and issued a proclamation, requiring all persons who had any duties to pay, or any of the public money in their hands, to pay the same to his secretary at the palace. The borough-reeve was compelled to publish the manifestoes of the rebels; and on the following day, the whole of the Pretender's army, with its train of artillery, consisting of sixteen pieces of cannon, and the baggage, assembled in the town and neighbourhood: the sum of £3000 was levied in money, from two to three hundred men were raised for the service, and placed under the command of Francis Townley, Esq., of Townley Hall, in the county of Lancaster, and many horses were put under requisition for mounting the cavalry and drawing the baggage. On the 1st of December, the rebel army quitted Manchester, marching southward in two columns; and having united at Macclesfield, advanced to Derby, which they reached on the 4th; but to avoid the danger of being enclosed by the armies of Marshal Wade and the Duke of Cumberland, retreated northward to Manchester, where they arrived on the 8th, and continuing their retreat to the north, reached Carlisle on the 10th, closely pursued by the Duke of Cumberland; leaving a garrison of four hundred men in that town, consisting of the Manchester regiment and some Scottish troops, the rebels effected their retreat to the Scottish frontier, which they reached on the 20th of December. On the subsequent surrender of the garrison of Carlisle to the Duke of Cumberland, the officers of the Manchester regiment were sent prisoners to London, where, being tried for high treason, and found guilty, they were executed on Kennington Common. After the execution, the heads of Col. Townley and Capt. Fletcher were placed on Temple Bar, and those of Capt. Deacon and Adjutant Syddall, son of the barber, were sent down to Manchester and placed on the exchange.

In 1759, an act of parliament was passed for discharging the inhabitants from their obligation to grind corn and other grain at the school mill on the river Irk, a custom which had prevailed from a remote period, and had frequently excited a strong spirit of popular discontent. By this act the inhabitants were released from every obligation, except that of grinding malt, which is still retained; and though the sum paid to the feoffees of the mill is very moderate, yet the compulsory clause of grinding malt has induced almost all the public brewers to establish themselves in townships which, though adjoining to, and within the immediate vicinity of, the town, are not subject to that obligation. Christian, King of Denmark, on his tour through England, in 1768, took up his abode in this town, and lodged, with his suite, at the Bull Inn; during his stay he visited the recently-formed excavations for the Duke of Bridgewater's canal. In 1773, the Russian Princess, Czartoriski, arrived here from Birmingham, to inspect the aqueducts and excavations at Worsley, and during her stay visited the principal factories. In 1805, the Archdukes John and Lewis of Austria, accompanied by a retinue of scientific men, spent some time here in visiting the various factories, and inspecting the several processes of the manufactures; and, in 1817, the Grand Duke Nicholas, now Emperor of Russia, honoured the town with a visit for the same purpose. Manchester, in common with other large manufacturing towns, has, during the fluctuations of trade, and the varying state of its manufactures, experienced a proportionate number of popular commotions; and occasional disturbances, arising from the depression of commerce, and the consequent low wages of the operative manufacturer, have been, in some instances, attended with serious results. The improvement in the various branches of its trade and manufactures has, however, been uniformly progressive, and justly entitles it to be considered one of the most extensive and prosperous commercial and manufacturing towns in the kingdom.

Its staple trade is the cotton manufacture, which, in all its various branches, is carried on to an extent almost incredible. The town had obtained considerable eminence for its manufacture of what were called Manchester cottons, which was introduced by the Flemings, in the reign of Edward III.; and in that of Charles I. the linen and cotton trade had made some progress. In the "Treasure of Traffic," published by Lewis Roberts, in 1641, Manchester is said to have purchased linen yarn from Ireland, and cotton wool from London, the goods woven from which were sent to those places for sale. About the year 1740, the manufacturers residing here employed agents in different parts of the country to procure a supply of raw cotton, which was manufactured, by the spindle and distaff, in the cottages of the workmen, chiefly into fustians, thicksets, dimities, and jeans, to which were added cotton thicksets, goods figured in the loom, and subsequently cotton velvets, velveteens, and strong fancy cords. About the year 1760, these goods, which had till then been made only for home consumption, found a market on the continents of Europe and America; and as the quantity of weft produced in the whole county of Lancashire, by about fifty thousand spindles worked by hand, was insufficient to keep the weavers in Manchester constantly employed, and consequently to afford a supply adequate to the increasing demand, recourse was had to the aid of machinery, and Mr. John Kay invented the instrument called the piking peg, by the assistance of which the weaver was not only enabled to produce twice the quantity of work, but also to weave cloths of any width. The facility thus given to the weaving department caused a corresponding increase in the demand for yarn, and Mr. Thomas Highs, in conjunction with Mr. Kay, invented the spinning jenny, the powers of which were greatly increased by the improvements of Mr. Hargreaves, whose success exciting the apprehensions of the hand-workmen, caused the destruction of his machinery, and his retreat to Nottingham, where he died in indigence. Mr. Highs continued to make the spinning jennies for sale, and also invented the water-frame, or throstle, for spinning twist by means of rollers: these machines were subsequently improved under Sir Richard Arkwright, whose exclusive patent right was annulled by a decision of the court of King's Bench, in 1785, and the privilege of using such machinery was thrown open to the public. The late Sir Robert Peel, Bart., assisted by Mr. Hargreaves, first brought the cylindrical carding-engines into use, and made many improvements in the application of machinery to the cotton manufacture, by the adoption of which, aided by the powers of the steam-engine, the quantity of goods of every description manufactured in this town has been prodigiously increased.

Every process of that manufacture is carried on to a very considerable extent, but the branch of it for which Manchester is most distinguished is the spinning, in which department alone there are in the town and vicinity one hundred and fourteen factories, worked by one hundred and eighteen steam-engines, the aggregate power of which is equal to that of three thousand nine hundred and eighty-one horses; by this machinery, about two million one hundred and eighty-two thousand three hundred and fifty spindles, and six thousand nine hundred and twenty-six power-looms, are set in motion. The power-loom is a recent invention, originating with the Rev. Mr. Cartwright, of Holland House, in the county of Kent, who, after repeated attempts, ultimately succeeded in establishing a factory upon that principle at Doncaster, and was indemnified by parliament for the losses he had sustained in the course of his experiments. Mr. Grimshaw, of Manchester, adopting Mr. Cartwright's plan, established a factory in which were five hundred power-looms, but the building having been destroyed by fire, the design was for a time abandoned. The difficulties which had impeded the general adoption of this invention were finally removed by the aid of Mr. Johnson's machine for dressing the warps, and, in 1806, the use of the power-loom was again introduced, with complete success. The factories, in several of which the whole process of the manufacture, from the introduction of the raw material to its completion, is carried on, are immense ranges of building, from six to eight stories in height; some employing from eighteen hundred to two thousand persons each, and the whole furnishing employment to upwards of thirty thousand persons. The making of muslin was first attempted about the year 1780, at which time the machine called the mule was introduced into the spinning factories, and to such a degree of perfection has this branch of manufacture been brought, that the muslins of Manchester are little inferior to those of India. The silk manufacture has, within the last few years, been revived, under very favourable circumstances, and is rapidly improving; the number of mills already established is considerable, and the silks manufactured are not inferior in the beauty of their texture to those of Spitalfields, or of France. The principal articles at present manufactured are, velvets, fustians, jeans, ticking, checks, gingham, nankeens, diaper, quilting, calico, muslins, muslinets, cambric handkerchiefs, small wares, silks, and, in fact, every variety of cotton and silk goods. There are also extensive bleaching-grounds, and works for printing and dyeing, and for every other department of the manufactures; and, in addition to what may be considered the staple manufactures of the town, are numerous others dependent on them, such as that of machinery of all kinds, for which there are extensive forges, foundries, &c., employing about ninety steam-engines, of the aggregate power of one thousand seven hundred horses. There are also several laboratories for the making of oil of vitriol, and other chemical productions used in the different processes of the trade, for bleaching, dyeing, &c.: in the vicinity are several mills for the manufacture of paper of all descriptions, from the coarsest kind, for packages, to the finest kinds of writing and printing paper, all which have been brought to a high degree of perfection, and are manufactured on a very large scale. There are extensive manufactories for hats, which have flourished for many years; also various other branches of manufacture, which have all improved with the increasing trade of the town, and afford employment to a very great portion of the inhabitants. Engraving, as connected with the printing of calico, muslin, and cotton goods, is extensively carried on; and there are saw-mills on a very extended scale.

For the purchase of the various productions of the town, of which large quantities are exported, foreign merchants have either established agents, or one of their partners, resident here, to conduct their commercial transactions, and to purchase not only Manchester goods, but also the produce of all the adjoining manufacturing districts, which are accumulated here as in a central depôt. A chamber of commerce was established in 1820, by which the trading interests of its members, and those of Manchester generally, have been greatly promoted: twenty-five directors are annually chosen at a general meeting of the subscribers, held in February, to whom the management of its affairs is entrusted.

The exchange and commercial buildings were erected from a design by Mr. Harrison, in 1806, at an expense of £20,000, advanced on shares of £50 each, by four hundred proprietary members, who subsequently added £30 each to the original shares, for the purchase of the site: it is a spacious, handsome, and well-arranged edifice of Runcorn stone, in the Grecian style of architecture: the north front, which faces the market-place, is semicircular, and ornamented with lofty fluted columns of the Doric order; the news-room, which occupies the basement story of this part of the building, is elegantly provided with every accommodation, and lighted by a semicircular dome and handsome windows of plate glass: at the distance of fifteen feet from the walls is a circular range of pillars of the Ionic order, supporting the ceiling; and over the central fire-place is a full-length portrait of Thomas Stanley, Esq., for many years member for the county, finely painted by the late Sir Thomas Lawrence: there are two thousand subscribers belonging to this establishment. Above the news-room, and resting on the pillars which support the ceiling, is a circular range of building, fifteen feet in breadth, and two stories high (originally forming part of the extensive establishment of Mr. W. Ford, bookseller), of which the lower contains the Exchange library, belonging to a proprietary of four hundred members, and comprising more than fifteen thousand volumes: the proprietary ticket is £10. 10., and the annual subscription £1. The gallery is lighted by a range of windows immediately above those in the circular part of the news-room, but of smaller dimensions, and is well arranged for the reception of the books; the upper story is divided into apartments for various uses. In the south part of the building is the post-office, adapted in every respect to the commercial importance of the town; and the chamber of commerce occupies another part of the building. A handsome geometrical staircase leads from the hall to the upper part of the Exchange buildings, in which is an elegant dining-room, ninety-two feet long, and twenty-nine feet wide, with a rich mantelpiece of Abyssinian marble at each end, and an orchestra on the north side: this room, which was opened in celebration of the anniversary of the birthday of George III., in 1809, is well adapted for public entertainments: there are several ante-rooms, and a variety of offices, connected with the general purposes of the institution.

The vast trade and commercial importance of this town have been in a great degree promoted by its proximity to the port of Liverpool, whence its manufactures are exported to every quarter of the globe, and with which it has a facility of communication by means of the Mersey, and Irwell navigation, constructed in 1720, under an act of parliament amended in 1794, when the proprietors were incorporated; and the celebrated Bridgewater canal, of which a description is given in the article on LANCASHIRE; both of them communicating with the river Mersey at Runcorn. The Manchester, Bolton, and Bury canal, constructed by act of parliament in 1791, crossing the Irwell at Clifton, and again at Little Lever, passes for fifteen miles through a district abounding with coal and mineral produce, and unites with the Leeds and Liverpool canal near Blackburn, by a branch formed in 1793. The Ashton under Line canal, constructed in 1792, is carried, by a lofty archway, in an oblique direction over Store-street; and by another aqueduct, of equal strength and beauty of design, it crosses the river Medlock, branching off to Stockport, and at Fairfield, by another branch, communicates with Oldham. The Rochdale canal, constructed in 1794, forms a communication from the Duke of Bridgewater's canal at Manchester to the Calder navigation at Sowerby bridge, beyond which is a cut from Salter-Hebble to Halifax. By means of the Grand Trunk canal, a line of communication has been established with London, Bristol, and other principal towns. In 1826, an act was obtained for the construction of an iron rail-road between Manchester and Liverpool, adapted to the use of carriages drawn by locomotive engines impelled by steam, for the conveyance of merchandise and passengers. This stupendous undertaking was completed in 1830, at an expense of upwards of £800,000, subscribed in shares of £100 each, by a company of proprietors: the line of road is carried, by a series of arches, commencing at the Company's warehouses, in the Liverpool road, across the roofs of the houses in Water-street, and over the river Irwell, by a handsome stone bridge of two arches, each sixty-five feet in span, and thirty feet high from the surface of the water to the central summit. After passing over a level tract of ground beyond the river, for nearly four miles and a half, it is, by means of inclined planes, viaducts, and other contrivances, continued through grounds of various elevation, rising, at its greatest altitude, to a height of one hundred and twenty-three feet above, and falling, at its greatest depression, to a depth of one hundred and twenty-four feet and a half below, the general level. The whole line from Manchester to Liverpool is thirty-one miles in length; which distance, though it may be travelled in little more than an hour, is generally performed in about two hours: on its course not less than sixty-three bridges have been erected, and two tunnels made. This important work was opened to the public with a grand procession, on which occasion the late Mr. Huskisson, member for Liverpool, having alighted from one of the carriages, which had halted for a few minutes, in endeavouring to regain his seat fell in the line of one of the locomotive engines, which was travelling with a velocity of thirty miles an hour, and was so severely injured, that he died in the course of the evening: for a more minutely detailed account of this noble undertaking, see the article on LANCASHIRE. A joint-stock company, for the conveyance of goods by water, called the New Quay Company, was originally established in 1822, with a capital of £30,000: the shareholders are chiefly merchants and traders, and the company has a considerable number of vessels plying between Manchester and Liverpool.

In addition to the various and numerous branches of inland navigation, by which a facility of conveyance by water is obtained to every part of the kingdom, the trade of the town employs more than two hundred conveyances by land, for the more prompt distribution of its merchandise and manufactures, and upwards of one hundred coaches daily, for the accommodation of passengers.

The town is situated on the banks of the river Irwell, which here receives the tributary streams of the Irk and the Medlock, and on the north-west bank of which is situated the township, or district, of Salford, connected, by means of five bridges, with Manchester, of which it forms an integral part. Of these bridges, the most ancient, which had existed from time immemorial, was rebuilt in the reign of Edward III.: the Strangeways iron bridge was erected in 1817, and a sixth bridge, in connexion with the Manchester and Liverpool railway, has been built over the same river. Over the Medlock are nine bridges, in various parts of the town, of which that leading from Oxford-street crosses the river in an oblique direction. There are also seven bridges over the river Irk, of which six are very low, and subject to be flooded at high water; the seventh is a very lofty structure of three arches, and a great ornament to the town, connecting a new line of road, from the extremity of Miller-street, with what was anciently Strangeways park, and forming an entrance into the town, which avoids the steep ascent of the Red Bank, and the dangerous turn in the old road from Scotland-bridge. Exclusively of these, there are several smaller bridges over the Shooter's brook, and not less than thirty over the numerous branches of the canals which intersect the town. The town is well paved, and lighted with gas, under the direction of two hundred and forty commissioners, appointed by an act of parliament passed in the 9th of George IV., for cleansing, paving, lighting, watching, and regulating it, and forming a body corporate, with a common seal: the gas-works are superintended by thirty directors chosen from among the commissioners. The inhabitants are supplied with water by the Manchester and Salford Water Company, established by act of parliament in 1809, which is conveyed by pipes from their reservoirs at Beswick and at Gorton, that at the latter place, covering more than fifty acres of ground, having been excavated in 1825. Salford was formerly included in the same jurisdiction with Manchester, with respect to its police, the same act of parliament being applicable to both; but by an act passed in the 9th of George IV., they were separated, and Salford is now governed by a distinct code of regulations, under an act passed in the 11th of George IV., and in the same session the local act for Manchester was amended. The environs, in many parts, particularly in Broughton, abound with scenery pleasingly diversified; and in the neighbourhood are some handsome ranges of building, and numerous elegant villas: among these are Ardwick Green, in the centre of which is a fine sheet of water, surrounded with respectable residences; Salford Crescent, occupying an elevated site, and commanding a beautiful view of the windings of the Irwell, with the fertile vallies on the opposite bank, and sheltered by rising hills. On the bank of the same river are several successive tiers of houses, which rise above each other from the margin of the river; and on the Irk is Gibraltar, an irregular cluster of rural and picturesque cottages. The older part of the town contains several ancient houses (which, however, are fast disappearing), interspersed with modern dwellings; and the streets, with the exception of such as have been improved under various acts of parliament, are inconveniently narrow: the more modern parts contain many spacious streets, in which are numerous handsome and respectable houses; but the general plan appears to have been more adapted to the accommodation of its extended trade than to the display of elegance and symmetry in its general appearance. Cotton-mills, factories, and warehouses of immense extent, have been erected in those parts of the town previously occupied by the most pleasant dwelling-houses, and every other part of it is crowded with numerous cottages of families employed in the various works.

The Literary and Philosophical Society, established in 1781, consists of ordinary, honorary, and corresponding members, who pay £2. 2s. on their admission, and an annual subscription of £1. 1s.; they hold meetings every alternate Friday, from October till the end of April, in a hall containing suitable apartments; gold and silver medals are awarded for the best dissertations on particular subjects: the society has published seven volumes of transactions, in the English, French, and German languages, which are much circulated on the continent. The Philological Society, consisting of thirty resident, and fifty corresponding, members, was instituted in 1803; and an Agricultural Society, consisting of members residing within thirty miles of the town, was established in 1767, and is one of the earliest institutions of that kind in England: its object is to bestow annual premiums for useful discoveries in cultivation, for superior specimens of produce both in cattle and in crops, and for the encouragement of cottagers who, by their labour, have maintained their families without parochial assistance, and of farming servants who have continued for the greatest length of time, and with the best characters, in one situation; all subscribing members and their tenants, in the counties of Lancaster and Chester, may claim the premiums. The new circulating library, in St. Anne's street, containing four thousand volumes, was established in 1792. A part of Cheetham's hospital is also appropriated as a library, to which, under certain regulations, the public enjoy free admission. Mr. Cheetham bequeathed £1000, to be vested in land, directing the produce to be applied in the purchase of books; and £100 to provide a place for their reception: this fund, by the management of the trustees, has considerably accumulated, and the library at present contains more than sixteen thousand volumes, some valuable manuscripts, a collection of prints, and several natural and artificial curiosities. The Portico, an elegant edifice of the Ionic order, was erected by subscription, in 1806, at an expense of £7000: the building, which is of Run-corn stone, contains a library, a committee-room, a news-room lighted by a dome, a reading-room, and other offices. This institution, which belongs to a proprietary of four hundred members, holding shares originally of the value of £13. 13s., afterwards increased to £21, and paying an annual subscription of £2. 10s. per annum, is under the regulation of a committee. The library, which forms a gallery round the walls of the news-room, is sixty-five feet long, and forty-two feet wide; and the committee-room and reading-room are each thirty feet long, and sixteen feet wide. A library, established in Spear-street, in 1802, is at present held in Fountain-street, and contains a very good collection of theological and other works. The law library was instituted by the members of that profession, in 1820: the proprietary ticket is £5. 5s., and the annual subscription £1. 11s. 6d. There is also a library in St. Anne's-street. The society for promoting the study of natural history was projected in 1821, and rapidly attained its present state of maturity and importance: there are at present more than three hundred proprietary members; the terms of admission are £10, and the annual subscription £2. 2s. Its concerns are under the direction of a president and council of ten proprietary members, annually chosen, four vice-presidents, a treasurer, four curators, and two secretaries: the buildings comprise a museum, in which, in addition to a valuable collection of insects, made by the late J. L. Phillips, Esq., is an extensive exhibition of the rarest specimens of the animal kingdom, consisting of quadrupeds, birds, and fishes, and of shells, minerals, fossils, and other natural curiosities, scientifically arranged, in a suite of apartments well adapted to their preservation: attached to the museum are, a library of works on natural history, a council-room, a curatory, and apartments for the librarian and keeper of the museum.

The Royal Institution, embracing a variety of objects connected with the pursuits of literature and science, and the cultivation of the fine arts, originated with a few public-spirited individuals (either artists or persons connected with the arts), in 1823, and was soon honoured with the public, and finally with royal, patronage: this institution is under the direction of a president, twelve vice-presidents, and a committee, chosen from a body of nearly seven hundred hereditary and life governors, of whom the former are contributors of forty, and the latter of twenty-five, guineas each. The building, which has been erected from a design by Mr. Barry, of London, and is of a durable and richly-coloured stone, from the vicinity of Colne, forms a splendid addition to the architectural ornaments of the town; it is in the Grecian style of architecture. The principal elevation, towards Mosley-street, has a noble portico of six lofty columns of the Ionic order, supporting a rich entablature and pediment in the centre, on each side of which are columns and pilasters connecting it with the wings; above the doors and windows are panels for bas reliefs symbolical of the design of the institution: the attic story of the hall, rising to a considerable elevation above the wings, is to be surmounted by a finely-sculptured figure of Minerva. The area round the building is enclosed with a handsome iron palisade on a lofty plinth of masonry, with pedestals at the angles of the steps leading to the portico and side entrances, on which are to be placed groups of figures and statues. The centre comprises the hall and the theatre, and one of the wings is appropriated as an academy of the fine arts, with exhibition rooms, and the other as a museum of natural history. The hall, which is wholly lighted from the attic story, is forty feet square, and sixty feet high; it contains a grand staircase of stone, consisting of central and lateral flights, with pedestals for sculptures, leading to a gallery on three sides of the hall, supported on Doric pillars, and to the theatre which is of a semicircular form. On the gallery are entrances on each side, leading through corridors flanked with columns, into the exhibition rooms in each wing of the building; the ceiling of the hall is richly panelled in deeply-recessed compartments, and beneath the attic windows is a rich cornice with a frieze for bas reliefs: ancient sculptures and casts from the antique will be ranged in the hall and corridors. The theatre, which will hold six hundred persons, has a gallery supported on columns of bronze, and the walls are decorated with engaged columns, and with isolated columns in the angles: the ceiling is richly panelled, and the theatre is lighted by a lantern, which, by machinery, may be darkened instantaneously, at the will of the lecturer. There are three exhibition rooms in each wing, which may be thrown into one; they are twenty-three feet in height, and lighted from the ceiling; the principal room in each wing is forty-eight feet long, and thirty feet wide, and the others are thirty feet square. There are also various rooms for the use of the officers and others connected with the institution, to which access is obtained from the hall and from other parts of the building. The whole cost of this elegant pile, when complete, will be about £50,000, and the building will comprehend an ample and complete arrangement for the various purposes contemplated in its erection.

A Floral and Horticultural Society was instituted in 1823, and a Botanical and Horticultural Institution in 1828: the garden for the latter, about two miles from the Exchange, on the new Stretford road, comprising about sixteen acres of ground, contains a great variety of green-house, herbaceous, Alpine, American, rock, and medicinal plants, and is under the care of a curator, who resides on the spot. The entrance, on one side of which is the curator's house, and on the other the council-room; botanical library, and porter's lodge, is a handsome structure, in the Grecian style and Ionic order, the erection of which cost about £2000. A mechanics' institution was established in 1824, and is supported by subscription: the building was erected in 1827, at an expense of £7000, and contains a library, in which are two thousand volumes, and a theatre, in which lectures are delivered on those branches of science which are of practical application in the exercise of their trades. The theatre royal was erected in 1806, at an expense of £15,000, advanced on shares by a proprietary of forty: it is a plain, but commodious, edifice, of which the interior is well arranged and handsomely decorated. The amphitheatre, or, as it is called, the minor theatre, was built in 1753, for a principal theatre, but being found too small, was rebuilt by act of parliament in 1775, and having been burnt down in 1789, was again rebuilt and opened for its present use in 1790. The gentlemen's private subscription concerts were established in 1777, when a room, adapted to the accommodation of eight hundred auditors, was built in Fountain-street which being afterwards found too small, a new concert-room was erected, in 1829, for the reception of one thousand two hundred subscribers, in Lower Mosley-street, at an expense of £7000: the entrance is through a handsome lofty portico of six columns of the Corinthian order, supporting a rich entablature and pediment; the concert-room is one hundred and seven feet long and forty-nine wide: there are eight public concerts in the season, at which vocal and instrumental performers of eminent talents are engaged: the private concerts, to which the subscribers and their families are admitted, take place every fortnight. The assembly-rooms in Mosley-street were erected in 1792; they form a capacious suite of rooms elegantly fitted up, and superbly decorated; the ball-room is eighty-seven feet long, and forty-four feet wide; the walls and ceiling are beautifully painted in compartments, and lighted with brilliant chandeliers and lustres of cut-glass: the tea-room is fifty-four feet long, and fifty-one feet broad, similarly decorated, and over the mantel-piece is a full-length portrait of Lord Strange: a billiard-room of equal dimensions, and a card-room of smaller size, are also included in the buildings, which were raised by shares of £100 each. The first of a series of triennial musical festivals was attempted here, with complete success, in 1828, for the encouragement of which the sum of £20,000 was immediately advanced, on shares of £100 each, as a guarantee for the indemnity of the managers. The late Sir Robert Peel, Bart., on accepting the office of patron, presented the stewards with a contribution of £500. Oratorios were performed in the collegiate church, and miscellaneous concerts and dress balls were given in the theatre and assembly-rooms: the produce of the performances, which combined the first-rate musical talents in the country, and were brilliantly and numerously attended, exceeded £15,000; and, after paying all expenses, a surplus of more than £5000 was distributed among the various charitable institutions. The races, which were established in 1730, commence on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week, and continue to the end of the week: the course, which is enclosed by railing, and carefully guarded against accidents, is on Kersal moor, and is about a mile in circuit; a grand stand and numerous booths have been erected on various parts of it, for the accommodation of the spectators, the number of whom is seldom less than two hundred thousand. A riding school and gymnasium have been established, for which a building was erected, in 1829, near the concert-rooms, at the lower end of Mosley-street. The barracks for the cavalry, in the township of Hulme, are a uniform and handsome range of building, affording accommodation for a squadron of horse, and comprehending an area sufficient for the performance of their evolutions. The barracks for infantry, situated in the Regent's road, Salford, are very extensive, and form a compact range of building calculated for the reception of one thousand men, affording, within the enclosure, ample ground for exercise and every requisite accommodation.

The market days are Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday; the first is principally for the sale of merchandise, of which great quantities are brought in carts and wagons from the different factories. The markets are plentifully supplied with corn and provisions of all kinds. The corn market is held in a building in Hanging-ditch, which was opened as a corn exchange in 1820. The hay market is held in Bridgewater-street; the cattle market in the new Smithfield, at Shude-hill; the markets for butchers' meat are held in Brown-street Bridge-street, and the London road, at the back of which is the leather hall, and in other parts of the town. The fish market, which is abundantly supplied with salmon from the river Ribble; with herrings, soles, and flounders, from the north-west coast; and with cod, haddocks, lobsters, and crabs, from the east coast; is held in a suitable building erected on the site of what was formerly called the Old Shambles (which was the only market-place in the town for butchers' meat), at the expense of Sir Oswald Mosley, Bart., near Smithy Door, in 1828; the meal, flour, and cheese market is held in a building on Shude-hill; the fruit, or apple, market is held in Fennel-street, and the upper end of Long Millgate; the vegetable market is held in St. Mary's gate, and in the upper end of Smithy Door, the middle and lower end of which is the market for butter, poultry, and eggs. Salford, which had been previously supplied from Manchester, has also a separate market, for which accommodation has been provided under the town hall, of which the first stone was laid by Lord Bexley, in 1825. The fairs are Easter Monday and Tuesday, for toys; and October 1st and 2nd, for horses, cattle, and pigs: the latter, for greater convenience, has been removed to Camp field, near St. Matthew's church; but the steward of the manor, attended by the borough-reeve and constables, asserts the right of the lord of the manor to hold it in St. Anne's square, where, until within the last few years, it was constantly held: there are some other fairs, but of minor importance. At Salford, a fair, commencing on Whit-Monday, is much frequented by the Yorkshire clothiers, blanket-manufacturers, button-makers, and japanners: the cloth hall, which is a spacious and convenient building, is occupied by numerous tenants during this fair, which lasts for twenty-one days; and there is another fair, commencing November 17th, and continuing for the same space of time; the first day of each is for the sale of cattle.

The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold a petty session for the division every Thursday: the municipal regulations are conducted by a borough-reeve and two principal constables, chosen annually from among the most respectable of the inhabitants, by a jury impannelled by the stewards of the manor, at the latter of the courts leet, which are held every year after Easter and Michaelmas. The constables appoint a deputy to act for them, who has a salary of £600 per annum, and is assisted by four beadles and two hundred special constables. A court of requests for the parish is held over the butchers' market in Brown-street, under an act passed in the 48th of George III., every alternate Wednesday, for the recovery of debts under £5. The lord of the manor of Manchester holds a court baron every third Wednesday; and a court for the hundred of Salford is held every third Thursday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.: the sheriff's county court is also held here monthly, by adjournment from Preston, for the trial of pleas, and the recovery of debts not exceeding £10, in actions in which the parties reside in the hundred of Salford. The quarter sessions are held at Salford by adjournment, at which the business for the whole of the hundred of Salford is transacted, under the superintendence of a chairman, who has a salary of £800 per annum, paid by the hundred; the number of prisoners tried at these sessions is generally about two hundred. A barrister, with a salary of £1000 per annum, paid out of the police rates of Manchester and Salford, sits daily as a magistrate, under the provisions of an act of parliament, for the despatch of business, in which he is assisted by some of the county magistrates resident in the neighbourhood. The town hall is a noble and elegant edifice, erected under the superintendence and from a design of Mr. Francis Goodwin, in the Grecian style of architecture, at an expense of £40,000, after the model of the Temple of Erectheus, at Athens, with a beautiful tower and dome in the centre, resembling the tower of Andronicus, called the "Temple of the Winds:" the principal entrance is by a magnificent colonnade with a rich entablature, in front of which are some sculptured representations of the town of Manchester, and emblems of trade and commerce; in the wings are niches containing statues of Solon and Alfred; in the medallions of the attic are busts in alto relievo of Pythagoras, Lycurgus, Hale, and Locke. The building contains various departments for transacting the public business of the town; on the principal floor is a splendid public room, one hundred and thirty-two feet long, forty-three feet eight inches wide, and fifty-one feet and a half in height to the centre of the principal dome: the interior of this noble room is divided into three parts by two ranges of eight elegant Ionic pillars, so disposed that each part may form a separate room; the central part is lighted by a magnificent dome, supported on sixteen dwarf columns of Scagliola marble, corresponding with the exterior design of the tower; and the other parts are finished in a very chaste style of classic beauty. The light is elegantly introduced into the extreme sections of the great room by concealed skylights, and through stained glass in the panels of the ceiling and dome, decorated to correspond with those that are not pierced for that purpose. Three staircases lead to this splendid room, with the interior of which the principal staircase will be made to harmonize. The town hall at Salford is a handsome stone edifice, with a noble portico in the Grecian Doric style, after that of the Temple of Theseus, supporting a triangular pediment; it affords in the lower part an area for the use of the market, and contains in the upper an elegant suite of assembly-rooms. The large room, which extends the whole length of the building, is elegantly fitted up, and decorated with pilasters supporting a richly-ornamented frieze and cornice; the ceiling is chastely embellished, and the room is appropriated to the use of the Salford courts, which are held here, being also occasionally used for public balls and concerts: the approach is by two handsome stone staircases. The principal entrance to the market-place is from the centre of the town hall, through a Doric colonnade; there are separate markets for meat, vegetables, fish, and poultry, chiefly covered over and well ventilated: this building was erected under the superintendence of Messrs. Lane and Goodwin, at an expense of £10,000.

VOL. III.

The Chorlton-row town hall, dispensary, and constables' dwelling-house, are connected in one building, the front of which is handsome and imposing. In the central part is a boldly-projecting portico of four Doric columns supporting a pediment, of which the frieze is ornamented with wreaths; the wings are decorated with antæ, rising from a rustic basement. The portico leads to the public offices on the ground-floor, including a committee-room, principal clerk's office, assembling-room for the poor, and the pay-office; over these is a spacious room for public meetings, well fitted up, and approached by a wide staircase and lobbies. On the basement floor are the watchmen's assembling-room, the lamplighters' room, oil-cellar, and three lock-up rooms, and in the attic are ample store-rooms. One of the wings is appropriated as a residence for the constable, and the other as a dispensary, which was established and is supported by subscription: this building was erected under the superintendence of Mr. Richard Lane, at an expense of £4500. The New Bailey, or house of correction for the hundred of Salford, adjoining which is the governor's residence, was erected in 1790, upon the radiating principle, and comprises twenty-four wards, the same number of day-rooms and airing-yards, one hundred and fifty workshops, for the classification and employment of the prisoners, and a tread-mill, with eight wheels, for such as are condemned to hard labour: the outer walls include an area of twenty-seven thousand square yards: over the entrance, which is a large rusticated stone building, is a sessions-room, in which the weekly and quarter sessions are held; adjoining it are the grand jury rooms and withdrawing-rooms for the magistrates and barristers, and in the lower story are the turnkey's lodge, and rooms for the confinement of prisoners prior to examination. The discipline observed in this prison, which is capable of receiving nine hundred and twenty-six prisoners, and in which there are generally five hundred, is admirably calculated to reclaim the guilty, and to afford them, on their release, the means of future subsistence by honest industry; those who have learned any trade are regularly employed in the exercise of it, and receive a considerable portion of their earnings; and such as have not, prior to their committal, are taught, during their confinement, some trade by which they may honestly maintain themselves after their discharge.

Manchester comprises only one parish, which is in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester. The old collegiate church, which, till after the Reformation, afforded accommodation for all the inhabitants of Manchester and Salford, was founded and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, by Thomas, Lord de la Warre, in the 9th of Henry V., who endowed it for a warden and eight fellows; this establishment, the revenue of which was £226. 12. 5., was dissolved in the reign of Edward VI., and re-established in that of Elizabeth, under the designation of the Warden and Fellows of Christ's College, Manchester. The dilapidation of the church, and the misappropriation of the collegiate funds, under the wardenship of Richard Murray, induced the inhabitants to petition the throne for a revival of the former charter, in 1635, and Charles I. granted them a new charter of foundation, with rules for the government of the college, drawn up by Archbishop Laud. Under this charter, the management is vested in a warden, to be appointed by the crown, who must at least be a bachelor in divinity, or of canon and civil laws; and in four fellows, who must be masters of arts, or bachelors of laws; they are a body corporate, with a common seal, under the designation of the "Warden and Fellows of Christ's College, Manchester." The same charter provides for the appointment of a sub-warden, treasurer, collector, registrar, a master of the choir, organist, four singing men (either clerks or laymen), and four boys skilled in music, to be chosen by the warden and fellows; and ordains that there shall be continually in the college, two chaplains, or vicars, of the degree of bachelors of arts, and two clerks to administer the sacraments, visit the sick, and perform other religious offices. During the usurpation of Cromwell, the Independents established their own form of worship in the college, in 1649; and, in the same year, the chapter-house and the college chest were broken open, and the foundation deeds seized by the soldiers, and sent, with other papers, to London, where they were subsequently destroyed in the great fire of 1666. The college was soon afterwards dissolved by an act of parliament for the sale of dean and chapter lands, and, during the interregnum, the last warden officiated as parochial minister, for an annual stipend. After the Restoration, the institution was revived, subject to the statutes of Charles I., and the warden reinstated in his office. The church is a spacious and elaborately ornamented structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a handsome square embattled tower, strengthened with buttresses, and crowned with pinnacles; the roof of the nave, which rises to a considerable height above the aisles, is concealed by a rich pierced parapet and decorated with pinnacles; the windows are spacious, and filled with elegant tracery, and the exterior, which is relieved by the projection of some beautiful chapels, has a splendid and truly magnificent appearance. The view of the interior is strikingly impressive; the lofty nave is lighted by a noble range of clerestory windows of fine proportion and beautiful design, and the choir is splendidly enriched with tabernacle-work of elaborate and delicate execution; the roof is finely groined and ornamented with grotesque figures of angels playing on musical instruments, shields, and other devices, richly carved; considerable portions of the original stained glass are still preserved in several of the windows; and the altar is decorated with a piece of tapestry representing the offerings of the early Christians, and the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira. In different parts of the church, and in several chapels, are many ancient and interesting monuments.

Trinity church, at Salford, was founded and endowed by Humphrey Booth, Esq., in 1635, but having fallen into decay, it was rebuilt in 1752: it is a neat edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, and of the Doric order, with a steeple, and contains some handsome monuments and mural tablets: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Sir Robert Gore Booth, Bart. St. Ann's church, on the south side of St. Ann's square, founded in 1709, under the auspices of Lady Ann Bland, is a spacious structure in the Grecian style of architecture, and of the Corinthian order, with a tower formerly surmounted by a spire, which has been taken down; the interior, affording accommodation for one thousand one hundred and seventy-five persons, is a fine specimen of handsome and appropriate decoration: the living is a rectory not in charge, in the patronage of the Bishop of Chester. St. Mary's, between Deans-gate and the river Irwell, erected by the Warden and Fellows of the College, by act of parliament in 1756, is a handsome edifice of the Doric order, with a lofty tower and spire, one hundred and eighty-six feet in height; the interior, which contains nine hundred and ninety-seven sittings, though dark, from the massive proportions of the pillars supporting the galleries, is very elegant: the altar-piece is embellished with a well-executed painting of the Ascension, after Raphael, by Williams; and the window is enriched with stained glass, beneath which are the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul: the living is a rectory not in charge, in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. Paul's, a neat edifice of brick, was erected in 1765, and contains one thousand one hundred and forty-seven sittings: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. John's, in Byrom-street, was built by Edward Byrom, Esq., under the authority of an act of parliament, in 1769: it is a handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a tower; the interior, which affords accommodation for one thousand and ninety persons, is remarkably neat, and handsomely ornamented: the chancel windows are embellished with stained glass; in one of the south windows is a beautiful representation of Christ entering into Bethlehem, in ancient stained glass, brought from a convent in Rouen; and in the corresponding window, on the opposite side, is also some ancient stained glass, brought from the continent: the vestry-room is richly ornamented with painted glass, and contains several fine paintings, among which are those of Paul before Felix, the Last Supper, the Holy Family, the Descent from the Cross (a copy of the original in St. Peter's church), a perspective view of the church, and other subjects: there are some handsome monuments and tablets in the church, and a piece of sculpture, by Flaxman, erected by the congregation, as a tribute of respect for their pastor, the Rev. J. Clowes: the church is entirely vaulted underneath, and is the property of the heirs of the founder: the living is a rectory not in charge, in the patronage of the Heirs of Edward Byrom, Esq., with reversion, after the lapse of two presentations from the period of its consecration, to the Warden and Fellows. St. James', erected by the Rev. Cornelius Bayley, D.D., in 1787, is a spacious and handsome brick edifice, with a small stone spire, and contains one thousand three hundred and ninety sittings: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Dr. Bayley, with reversion, after sixty years from the date of consecration, to the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. Michael's, a large edifice of brick, with a foundation for a steeple not yet built, and containing nine hundred sittings, was founded by the late Rev. Humphrey Owen, in 1789: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Heirs of the founder, with reversion, after sixty years, to the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. Mark's was founded by the late Rev. E. Ethelston, and finished by his son, in 1794: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Heirs of the founder, with reversion, after sixty years, to the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. Peter's was erected by subscription among the inhabitants, and consecrated in 1794: it is a handsome edifice of Runcorn stone, in the Grecian style of architecture, with a stately tower and a noble portico of the Doric order: the interior, which contains five hundred and fifty sittings, is remarkable for the elegance and chasteness of its decoration; the altar-piece is embellished with a fine painting of the Descent from the Cross, by Annibal Caracci: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Trustees for building the church, with reversion, after sixty years, to the Warden and Fellows. St. Stephen's, Salford, a neat building of brick ornamented with stone, with a handsome tower, was founded, in 1794, by the Rev. N. M. Cheek, to whose memory a neat mural tablet has been erected: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Heirs of the founder, with reversion, after sixty years, to the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. George's, a large building of brick, with a tower of the same material, was opened for divine service in 1798, and consecrated in 1818, when it was purchased by subscription: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Bishop of Chester. All Saints', in the centre of Grosvenor-square, a large and elegant structure in the Grecian style of architecture, was built at the sole charge of the Rev. Charles Burton, L.L.B., at an expense of £14,000, and consecrated in 1820: the interior is elegantly ornamented; in the window over the altar is a fine painting of the Passion of Our Saviour in the Garden of Gethsemane: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Founder, with reversion to the Warden and Fellows. St. Matthew's, in Castle field, was erected, in 1825, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £11,917: it is an elegant structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a tower and spire, and contains one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight sittings, of which nine hundred and seventy-eight are free: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. Philip's, in Salford, a handsome edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, with a tower and semicircular portico of the Ionic order, and containing one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight sittings, of which one thousand three hundred are free, was erected, in 1825, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £13,423. 5.: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. George's, Hulme, an elegant edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a tower, and containing two thousand and two sittings, of which one thousand two hundred are free, was built in 1828, at an expense of £14,416. 19. 5., by grant from the parliamentary commissioners: the interior is elegantly arranged, and has a grand and imposing effect: the roof is elaborately groined, and enriched with bosses and flowers; the columns separating the nave from the aisles are surmounted by a handsome range of clerestory arches; the altar is highly decorated, and the east end is lighted by three beautiful windows enriched with elegant tracery; the tower is one hundred and thirty-five feet high. The commissioners have also granted a sum of £9900 for the erection of a church, to be dedicated to St. Andrew, in Travis-street, and to contain two thousand sittings, of which seven hundred are to be free, which is at present in progress. An episcopal chapel at Ardwick, dedicated to St. Thomas, was consecrated in 1741, and enlarged in 1777; it is a neat building of brick: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of the College. St. Clement's, in Lever-street, erected in 1793; and St. Luke's chapel, in Bedford-street, built in 1804, are open for the performance of divine service, according to the liturgy of the Church of England, but have not been consecrated. There are five places of worship for Baptists; three for a society calling themselves Bible Christians; one for the Society of Friends; nine for Independents; one for Welch Independents; one for Independent Methodists; two for Methodists of the New Connexion; one for Primitive, one for Tent, eleven for Wesleyan, and two for Welch, Methodists; one for Presbyterians; two for Swedenborgians; and two for Unitarians; there are also three Roman Catholic chapels, and a synagogue. Of the dissenting places of worship, several are conspicuous for architectural beauty; among which may be noticed the Roman Catholic chapel of St. Augustine, an elegant structure in the later style of English architecture, built in 1820, from a design by Mr. Palmer, at an expense of £16,000: under the chapel are school-rooms for one thousand two hundred children. The meeting-house for the Society of Friends is a spacious structure, equally conspicuous for the chaste simplicity of its character and the beauty of its Ionic portico, of which the design was taken from that of the Temple of Ceres on the Ilyssus: the interior is divided, near the centre, into two distinct houses by a sliding partition, of which the upper part is by machinery raised above the ceiling, and the lower depressed beneath the floor, when it may be convenient: it was erected under the direction of Mr. Lane, at an expense of £12,000. The Wesleyan meeting-house in Oxford road has a handsome portico of the Doric order; and that in Irwell-street, Salford, has a handsome Ionic portico and pediment. A general cemetery, for the interment of persons of all religious denominations, according to their several rites, comprising four acres, surrounded with a wall, was opened in 1821: the entrance is from Rusholme road, through a handsome iron gate, on the left of which is a chapel for the performance of the funeral service, and on the right a dwelling-house of similar design for the resident registrar.

The free grammar school was founded, in the 7th of Henry VIII., by Hugh Oldham, Bishop of Exeter, who endowed it with certain houses, tenements, and corn-mills, in the town of Manchester, and with lands at Ancoats adjoining, producing a revenue exceeding £4000. The establishment consists of a head-master, whose salary, including £30 allowed for a drawing-master, is £446 per annum; a second master, with a salary of £218; an assistant to the head-master, with a salary of £160; an assistant to the second master, with a salary of £125; and a master of the lower school, with a salary of £120 per annum: the head and second masters, who are appointed by the President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, have each a stall in the collegiate church. The number of scholars is in general from one hundred and fifty to two hundred, who receive gratuitously a classical education, but pay for other instruction. There are twelve exhibitions, of £40 per annum each, to either of the Universities, belonging to this school, which also, in turn with the schools of Hereford and Marlborough, has an interest in sixteen scholarships in Brasenose College, Oxford, and in the same number in St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Sarah, Duchess of Somerset, in 1679, and varying in value from £18 to £26 each per annum: there are also in the nomination of the Warden of the Collegiate Church, and the Rectors of Prestwich and Bury, as trustees of Hulme's estates, fifteen fellowships, varying from £60 to £120 each, in Brasenose College, for bachelors of arts, who may remain there four years after taking that degree, founded by William Hulme, Esq., of Kearsley, in this county, which are frequently conferred upon scholars from Manchester. The school-house is a plain but spacious building, erected in 1777, on the site of the original edifice, having an owl, the crest of the founder, sculptured on a large stone medallion over the entrance; and containing an upper school-room, ninety-six feet long, and thirty feet wide, at one end of which are the arms of the founder emblazoned; and a lower school-room, of smaller dimensions: the property of the school is vested in twelve trustees, and its management is superintended by the Warden of the College.

The Blue-coat hospital, part of which is appropriated to the use of the Cheetham library, was founded, in 1653, by means of a bequest from Humphrey Cheetham, Esq., of Clayton hall, near Manchester, who left £7000 to trustees, to purchase estates for its endowment; and a sum of money to purchase a house for the reception of forty scholars, of whom, fourteen were to be natives of Manchester, six of Salford, three of Droylsden, two of Crumpsall, ten of Bolton, and five of Turton, which number has, in the same proportion, from the augmentation of the funds, been increased to eighty: the boys, who are nominated by the churchwardens of the several townships, and elected by the trustees, are clothed, maintained, educated, and apprenticed. The buildings of the college founded by Lord de la Warre were, after its dissolution, purchased by the trustees from the Earl of Derby, to whom it had been presented by the Crown, and appropriated to the use of the hospital. The premises occupy the site of the baronial mansion of the Gresleys, on the bank of the river Irk, near its confluence with the Irwell, and comprise an extensive range of building, exhibiting, through all its subsequent repairs, strong features of its collegiate architecture: the lower apartments are assigned to the use of the Blue-coat hospital, and the upper story contains the library and apartments of the governor and librarian: the library extends through a long gallery divided into compartments; adjoining it is a large reading-room, ornamented with antique carvings, and portraits of the founder; of Dr. Alexander Nowell, Dean of St. Paul's; Dr. William Whitaker, successively Master of Trinity, Queen's, and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge; Robert Bolton, a learned divine; and John Bradford, a native of Manchester, who having received the rudiments of his education in the grammar school, was afterwards Fellow of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and was burned as a heretic in the reign of Mary. The ladies' jubilee school, for maintaining, educating, and qualifying as household servants female orphans, was established in 1809, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III.: the school-house is a neat and commodious building on the borders of Strangeways park; there are thirty children in the school, which is supported by subscription, and is under the direction of a committee of ladies. Miss Hall, one of the original and most zealous promoters of this institution, bequeathed, at her death in 1828, £44,000, to be equally divided among four charities in the town, viz., this school, the infirmary, the lying-in hospital, and the fever ward. In 1723, Mrs. Ann Hinde bequeathed land and messuages, now producing nearly £200 per annum, for the education and clothing of twenty-eight children of Manchester, and twenty-nine of the township of Stretford. St. Paul's charity school, with a dwelling-house for the master, was erected in 1777, for the clothing and instruction of poor children, and is partly supported by subscription; it has also a permanent income of £34.5. per annum: this school was suspended in 1823, and the endowment allowed to accumulate. The National schools in Manchester and at Salford were both founded in 1812, and are supported by subscription: in each there are at present three hundred boys and the same number of girls. The Lancasterian school was founded in 1809, and the present building, in Marshall-street, was erected in 1813, at an expense of £5000: the school-room is one hundred and fifty feet long, and sixty-six wide, and will contain more than one thousand children; there are at present six hundred and ninety boys, and two hundred and ninety girls in the school, which is supported by subscription. There are Sunday schools connected with the established church and the various dissenting congregations, in which not less than from twenty to thirty thousand children are instructed: there are also several infant schools, which are numerously attended.

The infirmary was established, in 1752, by Joseph Bancroft, Esq., in conjunction with Charles White, Esq., M. D.; and, in 1755, a building for the purpose was erected by subscription: it has been supported with a liberality commensurate with its importance in a large manufacturing town, and, since it was first opened for the reception of patients, has afforded medical relief to more than half a million of the labouring class: the buildings, which have been progressively enlarged, and to which other establishments have been attached, contain one hundred and eighty beds for the accommodation of in-patients, with apartments for the officers and attendants, and a surgery, library of medical books, committee-rooms, and other offices; also a complete set of baths, for the exclusive use of the patients. The grounds are tastefully laid out in gravel walks, lawns, and parterres, and form a public promenade, to which the fine pool in front of the buildings adds considerable beauty. A complete set of hot, cold, vapour, and medicated baths has been fitted up here, with every accommodation for the public use, the profits arising from which are appropriated to the support of the institution. A lunatic hospital and asylum was founded in 1765, and the building was opened for the reception of patients in the spring of the following year. The dispensary was established in 1792, and an edifice for its use erected by public subscription adjoining the infirmary: it is of brick, and is ample and commodious, adapted more to use than to the display of architectural beauty; in the centre of the front is a clock, the dial of which is illuminated at night. In 1830, his Majesty, on the solicitation of the chairman and committee, graciously became the patron of this institution, which is now styled "The Manchester Royal Infirmary, Dispensary, Lunatic Hospital, and Asylum;" the buildings for these several uses being already contiguous, it is intended, in the ensuing spring, to give them a uniformity of design, by facing the front and the north side with stone. The plan comprehends a principal and a side front, of which the elevation is strikingly elegant and imposing: the principal front has in the centre a lofty and boldly-projecting portico of four fluted Ionic columns, thirty-eight feet high, supporting a pediment, of which the frieze and cornice are carried round the building, the angles of which are ornamented with antæ of appropriate character: the side front is of similar design, differing only in the slighter projection of the portico, which has but two columns in the centre, with engaged antæ at the angles. The whole building is three stories high above the basement, and the lower story is channelled in horizontal lines. The fever hospital, in Aytoun-street, is a plain and substantial structure of brick, erected by subscription, at an expense of £5000, in 1805: it is under the superintendence of a Board of Health, contains twenty-one wards for the reception of one hundred patients, and is furnished with all requisite offices and every convenience for promoting the restoration of health, and preventing the spread of contagious disorders.

The lying-in hospital, in Stanley-street, Salford, was instituted in 1790, for the assistance of poor married women, and for the cure of diseases incident to females, and to children under two years of age: it is supported by subscription, and its benefits are extended by the Ladies' Auxiliary Society for visiting the patients, and furnishing supplies of linen and other necessaries. The school for the deaf and dumb, at present held in this building, was established in 1825, for children of both sexes, and consists of three classes of pupils, viz., parlour boarders; general boarders, who pay each £26 per annum to the funds of the institution; and the children of the indigent poor, who are gratuitously maintained and instructed. The governors intend to erect a suitable building for the purposes of this school, as soon as their funds will enable them: it was commenced under the care of Mr. Vaughan with fourteen scholars, and there are now upwards of fifty receiving instruction: no child is admitted under nine years of age, nor above fourteen. An institution, in Faulkner-street, for curing diseases of the eye, was established by subscription in 1815, and, though its annual income does not exceed £200, affords relief to one thousand five hundred patients generally during the year. The Lock hospital, in Bond-street, established in 1819, for the recovery of persons suffering from disease, has, since its institution, administered relief to many thousands, of whom a very large proportion have been received as in-patients; and the female penitentiary, in Rusholme road, instituted in 1822, as a temporary asylum for such as have deviated from the path of virtue, and may be desirous to qualify themselves for reputable situations; both these institutions are supported by subscription. There are various provident societies, among which is that of the commercial clerks, established in 1802; each member pays an admission fee according to his age, and an annual subscription: from these funds, aided by honorary contributions, support is derived in sickness and old age, and a provision made for widows and children: the number of members amounts to nearly a thousand. The Manchester Society for the encouragement and improvement of female servants, was esta-lished in 1816; at the rooms of the society in Chapel walk, a free register office is opened for supplying members of the institution with servants, and also for gratuitously supplying female servants with situations, and for the distribution of annual premiums to servants, proportioned to the length of their continuance in the same family, and the propriety of their conduct. There are also numerous societies, adapted to the state of the manufacturing population; savings banks; associations for clothing the poor, among which the most considerable are, the Manchester and Salford Church Clothing Society, and the Salford Dorcas Society, both instituted in 1822, for the distribution of clothes among the needy and destitute. The Strangers' Friend Society was instituted in 1791, under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Adam Clarke: it is under the direction of a committee, and is open to all objects of distress, without any regard to their religious tenets. The Samaritan Society, a similar institution, was established in 1824; and various other institutions for the relief and assistance of human misery are liberally supported. There are funds at the disposal of the borough-reeve, amounting to more than £4000 per annum, arising from charitable bequests, for distribution in bread, clothes, money, and other necessities, among the aged, infirm, and indigent poor.

Among the distinguished natives of Manchester, or persons who have been otherwise connected with it, may be enumerated, William Crabtree, an astronomical writer, and the inventor of the micrometer, born at Broughton, within the parish, and killed at the battle of Marston Moor, in 1644; John Byrom, an ingenious poet, and the author of a popular system of short hand, born at Kersal Moor, near the town, in 1691; John Ferriar, M.D., author of Illustrations of Sterne, &c., and other popular works; Thomas Barritt, a distinguished antiquary and heraldist, whose large and valuable heraldic collections in manuscript have been placed in the library of Cheetham's hospital; Thomas Faulkner, an enterprising traveller, who published the earliest authentic account of Patagonia, and died in 1774; the Rev. John Whitaker, the Manchester historian; Thomas Percival, M.D., an eminent physician and popular writer; Charles White, M.D., F.R.S., a distinguished surgeon and anatomist; and Joseph Farington, R.A., a landscape painter of considerable celebrity. Manchester gives the titles of duke and earl to the family of Montagu.

MANEA, a chapelry in the parish of COVENEY, southern division of the hundred of WITCHFORD, Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.E. by S.) from March, containing 657 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MANEWDEN, a parish in the hundred of CLAVERING, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W.) from Stanstead-Mountfitchet, containing 656 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14. The Rev. H. Marsh and others were patrons in 1803. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A fair is held here on Easter-Monday.

MANFIELD, a parish partly in the western, but chiefly in the eastern, division of the wapentake of GIL-LING, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Darlington, containing, with the township of Cliffe, 493 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a handsome ancient structure, with a fine tower. Here is a free school, with an endowment of £10 a year, payable out of the income arising from the charity estate of the parish.

MANGERSBURY, a hamlet in the parish of STOW on the WOLD, upper division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, county of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S.S.E.) from Stow on the Wold, containing 226 inhabitants. The old Roman Fosse-way passes through this place.

MANGOTSFIELD, a parish in the hundred of BARTON-REGIS, county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Bristol, containing 3179 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the Consistory Court of the Bishop of Bristol, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Thomas Wadham, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. James. There is a place of worship for Independents. Here was once a nunnery, of which part of the cloisters was seen by Leland, but there is not now any vestige of it.

MANLEY, a township in the parish of FRODSHAM, second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Frodsham, containing 333 inhabitants.

MANNINGFORD-ABBOTS, a parish in the hundred of SWANBOROUGH, county of WILTS, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. S.W.) from Pewsey, containing 159 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Sir J. D. Astley, Bart. The river Avon runs through the parish.

MANNINGFORD-BOHUN, a tything in the parish of WILSFORD, hundred of SWANBOROUGH, county of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Pewsey, containing 228 inhabitants.

MANNINGFORD-BRUCE, a parish in the hundred of SWANBOROUGH, county of WILTS, 2 miles (S.W.) from Pewsey, containing 222 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Rev. Mr. Wells. The church is dedicated to St. Peter; over the altar is a tablet inscribed to the memory of Mary Nicholas, who was greatly instrumental in the preservation of Charles II., after his defeat at Worcester.

MANNINGHAM, a township in the parish of BRADFORD, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N.W.) from Bradford, containing 2474 inhabitants, who are principally employed in the spinning of worsted yarn and the manufacture of woollen goods.

MANNINGTON, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Aylesham, containing 16 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Iteringham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £1. 16. $5\frac{1}{2}$.

MANNINGTREE, a market town and parish, in the hundred of TENDRING, county of ESSEX, 36 miles (N.E. by E.) from Chelmsford, and 61 (N.E. by E.)

from London, containing 1265 inhabitants. The ancient name of this place was Scidinghoo, or, as it is called in Domesday-book, Sciddinchou; and in the reign of Henry VIII. it had received the name of Many-tree, of which the present appellation is an obvious corruption. Here was formerly a guild, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the revenue of which was £8. 5. 4.; and the importance of the place may be inferred from a certificate of the value of chantry lands, in which it is termed "a great town and also a haven town, having in it to the number of seven hundred houseling people." It is situated on the southern bank of the river Stour, on the road from London to Harwich, is irregularly built, and the streets are partially paved, but not lighted; the inhabitants are supplied with excellent water. The malt trade is carried on to a great extent, and corn, coal, and deals are imported. The Stour was made navigable from this town to Sudbury by act of parliament in the 4th and 5th of the reign of Anne. The market is on Thursday, for corn and cattle; and there is a toy fair on the Thursday in Whitsun-week. The petty sessions for the division of Tendring are held on Mondays at Mistley, Thorpe, Great Bromley, and Manningtree alternately, when overseers, surveyors, and constables, are appointed. A court baron is held here annually by the lords of the manor of Mistley and Manningtree; the court leet formerly held is discontinued. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of the Rector of Mistley. The church has been enlarged by the addition of three hundred and forty-five free sittings, towards defraying the expense of which, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels contributed £450. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school for children of both sexes is supported by voluntary contributions.

MANSELL-GAMAGE, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Hereford, containing 154 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir J. G. Cotterell, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Giles.

MANSELL-LACY, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Hereford, containing 287 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5. 3. 11½., endowed with £800 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir Uvedale Price, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

MANSENGH, a chapelry in the parish of KIRKBY-LONSDALE, LONSDALE ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale, containing 157 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Kirkby-Lonsdale. The chapel, dedicated to St. Peter, was built in 1726, by the subscriptions of Jacob Dawson and others. The river Lune runs through the chapelry.

MANSFIELD, a market town and parish, comprising the hamlets of Pleasley Hill, Radmansthwaite, and Moor-Haigh, in the northern division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, county of NOTTINGHAM, 14 miles (N. by W.) from Nottingham, and 138 (N. N. W.) from London, containing 7861 inhabitants. The name of this place, anciently written Maunsfeld, is derived from its situation on the small river Mann, or Maun, which rises about three miles westward: the town is of great antiquity, and is supposed to have been of British or Roman origin. During the Saxon Octarchy it was a temporary residence of the Mercian kings, for the convenience of hunting in the Royal forest of Sherwood: in the reigns of Edward the Confessor, William the Conqueror, and William Rufus, it was a royal demesne, and so continued till the time of Elizabeth, except that, in the reign of Henry VIII., it was, with other manors, given to the Duke of Norfolk; but afterwards restored to the crown, in exchange for other property: it was ultimately granted away, by letters patent, in the 44th of Elizabeth. The custom of gavelkind prevails in this manor, within which there is a small manor belonging to the Dean of Lincoln. Till the year 1715, the courts for the forest of Sherwood, celebrated in ballad story as the scene of the exploits of the renowned archer, Robin Hood, and his band of freebooters, were held at Mansfield. The town is situated on the road from London to Leeds, in a deep vale, in the centre of the ancient Forest of Sherwood: it is of considerable size, and consists of three principal streets, besides others branching from them, which are narrow and irregular: the houses are principally built of grey stone, and, at the entrance to the town from Southwell, there are several excavated in the sand-stone rock. Considerable improvement has been made within the last five years, under two acts of parliament obtained in 1823 and 1825, under the authority of one of which the town is lighted with gas, by a joint-stock company, the approach from the London road has been widened, and the market-place considerably enlarged. On the north side of the town is a cold bath, supplied by a spring issuing from an adjacent rock. A small theatre is open during the summer months; and races take place at the July fair: a subscription library was established in 1825, and there is an excellent news and reading-room. The moot-hall was erected in 1752, in the market-place, at the expense of Henrietta Cavendish Holles, Countess of Oxford and Mortimer: besides the apartments for the transaction of public business, the building comprises an assembly-room. Mansfield has some considerable manufactures in cotton, hosiery, and lace; of the first, one mill contains two thousand four hundred spindles, and affords employment to one hundred and sixty persons; besides this there are six other cotton-mills upon the river Maun, within two miles of the town: upwards of seven hundred frames are engaged in weaving stockings and gloves, both of silk and cotton; there are iron-foundries for light castings; and a very extensive trade is carried on in malt, also in cutting and working into architectural ornaments the fine freestone obtained from several adjacent quarries, which is afterwards sent to various parts of the kingdom. The trading interests of the town have been much benefited by the construction of a double railway, about seven miles in length, from Mansfield to Pinxton basin, there communicating with the Cromford canal, under an act of parliament passed in 1817, at an expense of £33,000: the price of coal obtained from the pits at Pinxton and Kirkby has thus been reduced about one-third. In the reign of Henry III. the inhabitants obtained a charter for a weekly market on Monday, afterwards altered to Thursday; also the privilege of housebote and haybot, or timber for repairs, and wood for fences, out of the forest, which they still enjoy. The market has been held on Thursday from time immemorial: there are two annual meetings (not chartered fairs), on April 5th and July 10th, for the sale of cattle and hogs, and a fair on the second Thursday in October, for horses, cattle, sheep, and cheese.

The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the court of the Lord of the Manor of Mansfield, rated in the king's books at £7.7.6., and in the patronage of the Duke of Portland, as lessee under the Dean of Lincoln. A chaplaincy is attached to the church, for the support of which the vicar and churchwardens were incorporated and invested with lands in the 4th and 5th of Philip and Mary; there is likewise an afternoon lectureship on Sunday, the stipend arising out of certain lands, called the "Eight Men's Intake," and from a gallery in the church, called the "Vicar's Gallery:" the chaplain is appointed by the vicar and churchwardens, and the lecturer by the trustees of the endowment. The church, which is dedicated to St. Peter, exhibits specimens of each style, from the Norman to the later English; the two lower portions of the tower are in the early Norman style, and there is one window in the early English; the arches, piers, and north door, are in good decorated character; the tower is surmounted by a low spire. There are places of worship for General Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. The free grammar school was founded by letters patent, dated March 8th, 1561, for the education of youth in grammar, under a master and an under-master: the vicar and churchwardens for the time being were incorporated governors, and enabled to acquire and hold lands, and, with eight of the principal inhabitants, who are chosen by the rest of the parishioners, appoint the master and under-master: the deed of incorporation having reference to the maintenance of the chaplain, as well as of the school, and the lands belonging to each having become indistinguishable, it was decided in Chancery, about 1680, that two-thirds of the income of the joint estate should be paid to the chaplain, and the remaining third to the master and his assistant, in the proportion of two-thirds to the former, and one-third to the latter. Four scholarships, of £10 each per annum, were founded at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, by Dr. Sterne, Archbishop of York, one for natives of Mansfield. The school-house was built in 1567, and rebuilt in 1705, when Queen Anne gave twenty tons of timber from the Forest of Sherwood for that purpose: the master's house, which adjoins the school, was erected in 1719. A free school, for the clothing and education of thirty-six poor boys, was established in 1702, and was at that period supported by subscriptions amounting to £12 per annum. In 1709, Samuel Brunts bequeathed lands, directing the proceeds, which then amounted to £436.15., to be thus applied; £4 per annum in putting poor boys to school, £4 per annum in apprenticing boys, and the remainder to be distributed, in sums of £4 per annum each, to poor residents in Mansfield not receiving alms. In 1725, Faith Clarkson bequeathed the sum of £2000 to trustees, for erecting a school-house, and vesting the remainder in land for charitable uses: by a decree in Chancery, in 1743, it was awarded that the rental of these lands should be divided between Mansfield and Mansfield-Woodhouse, in support of a master and mistress, to teach twenty boys and twenty girls in reading, writing, and arithmetic; £8 to be applied in clothing ten boys and ten girls of the school, and £10 in apprenticing two boys: the number of children in this school is sixty-two; the master and mistress receive together a salary of £40 per annum. In 1784, Charles Thompson bequeathed £1200 in the three per cents. to the trustees of Samuel Brunts' charity, for the better educating of poor boys, and £400 to the vicar and churchwardens, the interest to be applied in the purchase of coats and petticoats for twenty poor persons: a school-house was built in 1786. An infant school was established in 1830. By deed, dated January 15th, 1691, Elizabeth Heath founded and endowed almshouses for twelve poor persons: the inmates receive 40s. each per month, with clothing and a load of coal at Christmas; and the surplus rents are applied in apprenticing poor children. In 1795, Joseph Sales bequeathed £1000 three per cents. to the vicar and churchwardens, as trustees, the interest to be divided amongst six poor housekeepers of Mansfield, of the age of fifty and upwards. A bequest of £10 per annum, to be divided amongst poor housekeepers, was made by John Bold, in 1726; and there are numerous other benefactions for the relief of the poor. In the neighbourhood are traces of several Roman exploratory camps; also two Roman villæ, one containing nine rooms, and the other thirteen, with hypocausts, baths, and other appendages; in one of them was a tessellated pavement, also various fragments of patera, earthenware, and other relics of antiquity. Remains of two Roman sepulchres, with urns, bones, &c., have been discovered near the same spot. Humphrey Ridley, an eminent physician and anatomist, was born here about 1653. Dr. Sterne, Archbishop of York, and Dr. William Chap-pel, afterwards Bishop of Cork and Ross, in Ireland, were natives of Mansfield; and Robert Dodsley, author of the "Economy of Human Life," was born in the vicinity, and apprenticed in the town. James Murray, inventor of the patent circular saw, resided here. Sir William Murray, on his being appointed Lord Chief Justice of the court of King's Bench, was elevated to the peerage, November 8th, 1756, by the title of Baron Mansfield, of Mansfield, in the county of Nottingham, of which he was created Earl, October 19th, 1776, and obtained a fresh patent, August 1st, 1792, creating him Earl of Mansfield, of Caen Wood, in the county of Middlesex; the original barony expired at his death, but the earldom is now enjoyed by his grand nephew.

MANSFIELD-WOODHOUSE, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.) from Mansfield, containing 1598 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the court of the Lord of the Manor of Mansfield, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Duke of Portland. The church, dedicated to St. Edmund, is a large structure, with a spire-steeple one hundred and eight feet high, which was rebuilt in 1304, together with one of the aisles, after having been injured by a fire, which also destroyed part of the village. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. It anciently formed part of the adjoining parish of Mansfield, but it is not known at what period the separation took place. The village is large, and contains several very respectable houses. The free school was founded by Faith Clarkson, in 1725, and endowed with certain lands for a master and a mistress. Charles Thompson also, in 1784, bequeathed £1300, and Richard Radford, by deed dated May 10th, 1827, gave £800, the interest of both to be applied in educating children. There are lime-kilns and quarries of excellent freestone in the parish. Several hundred acres of land, formerly barren, have lately been converted into rich arable land, by means of irrigation, the Duke of Portland having dug a canal through this and the adjoining parish of Clipstone, communicating with the river Man, the waters of which are used for that purpose. In this parish are thirteen hundred acres of land, which, with some in the parish of Mansfield, is the only unenclosed part of the ancient Forest of Sherwood. In 1786, Major Rooke, distinguished for his fondness for antiquarian research, discovered two Roman villæ in the parish, one of which he called Villa Urbana, and the other Villa Rustica: the former contained nine rooms and a hypocaust, part of a very elegant mosaic pavement having been found in the centre room; and the latter comprised thirteen rooms, two hypocausts, and a cold bath: the walls of the rooms were plastered and painted, and the floors stuccoed. About one hundred yards to the south-east were two Roman sepulchres, in one of which was an urn containing ashes, with fragments of bones lying near it: coins and various other Roman relics were also found. Major Rooke enclosed the villæ with a stone wall, erected a square building over the room containing the mosaic pavement, and planted a variety of shrubs around them; but the whole, since his death, has suffered from neglect. Dr. Mason, Bishop of Sodor and Man, was born in this parish.

MANSRIGGS, a township in the parish of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.) from Ulverstone, containing 62 inhabitants.

MANSTON, a parish in the hundred of REDLANE, Sturminster division of the county of DORSET, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Shaftesbury, containing 140 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £12. 5., and in the patronage of Lord Viscount Bolingbroke. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is very ancient. Thomas Dibben, a divine, orator, and Latin poet, was born here; he died in the Poultry Compter, in 1741, having many years previously become insane.

MANTHORP, a joint township with Little Gonerby, in the soke and borough of GRANTHAM, parts of KESTVEN, county of LINCOLN, 1 mile (N. N. E.) from Grantham. The population is returned with Little Gonerby.

MANTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of WITHAM on the HILL, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KES-

TEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Bourne, containing 107 inhabitants.

MANTON, a parish comprising the township of Cleatham in the wapentake of CORRINGTON, and the hamlet of Twigmoor in the eastern division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Glandford-Bridge, and containing 198 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8. W. Dalyson, Esq. was patron in 1793. The church is dedicated to St. Hibald.

MANTON, a parish in the hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Uppingham, containing 229 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. G. W. Smyth, Esq. was patron in 1820. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A college or chantry was founded here, in the 25th of Edward III., by William and John Wade, for a master and two brethren, whose revenue at the dissolution was valued at £22. 18. 6.

MAPERTON, a parish in the hundred of CATSASH, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Wincanton, containing, with the hamlet of Clapton, 165 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £13. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Wadham College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

MAPLEBECK, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Southwell, containing 193 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Duke of Newcastle. A hard stone, fit for building, and a durable material for roads, is obtained here. Maplebeck is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings.

MAPLEDERWELL, a parish in the hundred of BASINGSTOKE, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Basingstoke, containing 186 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Newnham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MAPLE-DURHAM, a parish in the hundred of LANGTREE, county of OXFORD, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Reading, containing 508 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £12. 10., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Eton College. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, has been the burial-place of the ancient family of Blount for many generations. An almshouse for six poor people, each of whom receives one shilling and sixpence weekly, is supported by Michael Blount, Esq.

MAPLESCOMBE, formerly a parish, now forming part of that of KINGSDOWN, in the hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, 6 miles (N.N.E.) from Seven-Oaks. The church is in ruins, and the living has been annexed to that of Kingsdown.

MAPLESTEAD (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Halstead, containing 428 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4. J. Judd, Esq. was patron in 1797. The church, dedicated to St. Giles, has a chapel attached to the south side, belonging to the proprietor of Dynes hall, and containing two costly monuments of the family of Deane, its former possessors.

MAPLESTEAD (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Halstead, containing 313 inhabitants. The living is a donative, within the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of — Davis, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. John of Jerusalem, is ancient, and remarkable as being one of the few remaining models of the Holy Sepulchre; the east end is semicircular, and it is said once to have had the privilege of sanctuary. Juliana, wife of Fitz-Aldelm de Burgo, in the time of Henry I., gave the entire parish to the Knights Hospitallers, who had a preceptory here.

MAPPERLEY, a township in that part of the parish of KIRK-HALLAM which is in the hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Derby, containing 338 inhabitants. Henry Leaper, in 1791, left an annuity of £6 towards the support of a Sunday school, established in 1792. This township is entitled to share in the benefits of West Hallam school, founded by John Scargill.

MAPPERTON, a parish in the hundred of BEAMINSTER-FORUM and REDHONE, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Beaminster, containing 123 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. $1\frac{1}{2}$. H. C. Compton, Esq. was patron in 1822. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was, in 1291, styled a chapel to Netherbury: it was rebuilt, in 1704, by Richard Broadrep, Esq., and the interior handsomely fitted up: in the chancel is a fine monument of the Broadreps, and underneath it the family vault. There is a small churchyard, but the substratum being rock, the inhabitants bury at Netherbury, for which privilege they annually pay a trifling acknowledgment.

MAPPERTON, a hamlet in the parish of ALMER, hundred of LOOSEBARROW, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Blandford-Forum. The population is returned with the parish.

MAPPLETON, a parish in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, county of DERBY, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.W.) from Ashbourn, containing 201 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to the vicarage of Ashbourn, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has a dome surmounted by an urn. The river Dove is here crossed by a stone bridge, having a remarkably flat arch, its span being seventy feet, and its semidiameter only eleven. Rowland Okeover, Esq., in 1727, vested certain lands in trustees for (amongst other purposes) building almshouses for three clergymen's widows, and providing them with £10 per annum; which sum, in consequence of the increased value of the estates, has been raised to £30: the building comprises a centre and two wings. Mappleton is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MAPPLETON, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, containing, with the townships of Great Hatfield (which is partly in the parish of Sigglesthorne) and Mappleton with Rowleston (which is partly in the liberty of St. Peter of York), and exclusively of Great and Little Cowdon, 314 inhabitants, of which number, 187 are in the township of Mappleton, $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Beverley. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of the East riding of York. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has some portions of ancient architecture remaining. A school, for which the building was erected by voluntary subscription, in 1820, is conducted on Dr. Bell's system.

MAPPOWDER, a parish in the hundred of BUCKLAND-NEWTON, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, 6 miles (S.W. by S.) from Sturminster-Newton, containing 247 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £17. 14. 7. Earl Spencer was patron in 1814. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is an embattled structure with a low plain tower, and contains, among other memorials, several to the family of Coker, whose ancient mansion, which was a large and handsome building, erected in the reign of Elizabeth, has been converted into a farm-house. Of this family, Mr. Coker, author of a "Survey of Dorsetshire," was a member.

MARAZION, an incorporated market town, in the parish of ST. HILARY, hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, $63\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Launceston, and 282 (W. S.W.) from London, containing 1253 inhabitants. The ancient name of this town was Marghasiawe: the more recent appellation of Market-jew, still in use among the common people, is supposed by some to take its origin from a market formerly held here, which was much frequented by Jews; while others deduce it, somewhat fancifully, from Market-die Jou, in reference to its Thursday's market; thus making it a corruption of the Latin name for that day, Dies Jovis. In the early part of the reign of Henry VIII., a party of French soldiers, having landed from a fleet then cruising in the channel, took possession of Marazion; but, on the approach of the sheriff of the county with the posse comitatus, they set fire to the town, and retreated to their ships: it again suffered by conflagration, in the reign of Edward VI. The town is very pleasantly situated on the eastern side of Mount's Bay, chiefly at the bottom of a hill, by which it is sheltered on the north: the air is particularly mild and salubrious; the streets are not lighted, nor regularly paved; and, on account of its neighbouring mines, the inhabitants are badly supplied with water. It is stated to have formerly been a trading town of great note, and to have fallen into decay in consequence of the second conflagration, having continued in a very dilapidated condition till the grant of a charter by Elizabeth. The profits of a fair held here were given to the priory of St. Michael's Mount, in the reign of Henry I.; and in the reign of Henry III., that religious community was empowered, by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, to hold three fairs and three markets, which had been previously granted to them at Marghas-bigan, by charter of the kings of England, on their own land at Marchadyon. In the year 1331, a market on Monday, and a fair on the festival of St. Andrew, to continue three days, were granted to Ralph de Bleyon. The present market is held on Saturday, and there is a fair on Michaelmas-day for horses and cattle. The town was incorporated by charter from Queen Elizabeth, in 1595: the corporation consists of a mayor, eight burgesses, and twelve capital inhabitants; the mayor being chosen from among the burgesses by the corporation, who also appoint the town clerk; the burgesses are elected from the capital inhabitants: the mayor is the only justice of the peace within the borough. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of St. Hilary, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1100 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. Catherine. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. In 1753, Joseph Hill gave £100 for the instruction of children, and £40 to the poor inhabitants. There is also a free school.

MARBURY, a township in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Northwich, containing 35 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the township.

MARBURY, a parish in the hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, containing, with the townships of Marbury with Quoisley, and Norbury, 833 inhabitants, of which number, 395 are in the township of Marbury with Quoisley, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Whitchurch. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of Whitchurch, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester. The church, an ancient structure, has an elegant chancel, rebuilt by the late Earl of Bridgewater. A branch of the Chester canal passes through the parish. A school-house was erected in 1688, by subscription among the inhabitants. Courts are held annually for the manors of Marbury and Norbury, at which constables are appointed.

MARCH, a market town and chapelry in the parish of DODDINGTON, northern division of the hundred of WITCHFORD, Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 31 miles (N. by W.) from Cambridge, and 80 (N.) from London, containing 3850 inhabitants. The town is situated on the banks of the navigable river Nene, by means of which corn, and the local horticultural produce, are conveyed to Cambridge, Lynn, Peterborough, and other places. The market, granted to Sir Alexander Peyton, in 1671, is on Friday, chiefly for butchers' meat; and there are two fairs, each of which continues three days, commencing on the Monday before Whitsuntide, and on the second Tuesday in October: at the first of these, horses are sold only on the third day. Manorial courts are held in the guildhall, a modern and commodious edifice situated in the High-street; and this place is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests, for the recovery of debts under 40s. throughout the Isle of Ely, established by act of parliament passed in the 18th of George III., held here once a month. The chapel, which is dedicated to St. Wendreda, is a very ancient structure, with a spire at the west end: it was erected about the year 1343, at which period an indulgence was granted by the Pope to all who should contribute to it; in the interior are several ancient monuments. A school was founded, in 1696, by William Neale, Esq., for the education of eight boys in Latin and English, and endowed with thirty-three acres and a half of land in Whites Fen, upon the special condition that the land should never be broken up, unless overgrown with rushes, and in that case it was to be once cropped with oats, and again laid down as greensward; a forfeiture of the property to the heirs of the donor to be the penalty of infringing this condition. Mr. Henry Wade having bequeathed a house and lands for charitable purposes, the rents were appropriated, under a decree obtained in the court of Chancery in 1713, in the following manner: £20 per annum to a schoolmaster, for the instruction of twenty poor children of March; £20 per annum for apprentice fees; £5 per annum for decayed housekeepers; and the residue in the purchase of heifers, on Easter Monday, for poor housekeepers: the schoolmaster on Neale's foundation receives the above-mentioned salary, and the further sum of £6. 15., arising from land devised, in 1653, by Mr. James Sheppard, and the interest of £30, the gift of Mr. Gabriel Sheppard, for the instruction of children. There are some unendowed almshouses for the parochial poor. Between this town and Wisbeach, in the year 1730, urns enclosing burnt bones, and a vessel containing one hundred and sixty Roman denarii of different emperors, were discovered.

MARCHAM, a parish in the hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Abingdon, containing, with the chapelries of Frilford and Garford, 1173 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £14. 15. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. John Elwes, the eccentric miser, died here in 1789.

MARCHINGTON, a chapelry in the parish of HANBURY, northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Uttoxeter, containing 463 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Hanbury. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. This parish is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MARCHINGTON-WOODLANDS, a township in the parish of HANBURY, northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Uttoxeter, containing 318 inhabitants. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MARCLE (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Ledbury, containing 168 inhabitants. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £7. 1. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Hereford. The church has long been in ruins, and the inhabitants bury at Ledbury.

MARCLE (MUCH), a parish in the hundred of GREY-TREE, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Ledbury, containing, with the chapelry of Yatton, 1060 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with Kinnaston, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £14. 0. 5., and in the patronage of James Kyrle Money, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

MARDALE, a chapelry partly in the parish of BAMPTON, and partly in that of SHAP, WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Orton. The population is returned with the respective parishes. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Shap, in which parish the chapel is situated.

MARDEN, a parish in the hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Hereford, containing, with the chapelry of Amberley, 815 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5. 13. 5., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The church, dedicated to St. Ethelbert, stands on the banks of the Lugg, over the spot where King Ethelbert was buried, and where a well, which still exists, is superstitiously said to have miraculously sprung up at the time the edifice was dedicated to his memory.

MARDEN, a parish in the hundred of MARDEN, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Goudhurst, containing 2051 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There is a place of worship for Independents. Sir Charles Booth, in 1792, left certain property to be vested in the three per cents., now bearing an annual interest of about £44, for the support of a school, in which two hundred children are educated on the Madras system. A fair is held on the 10th of October.

MARDEN, a parish in the hundred of SWANBOROUGH, county of WILTS, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from East Lavington, containing 200 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 17. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MARDEN (EAST), a parish in the hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 8 miles (S. W.) from Midhurst, containing 85 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £4. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Marden in the Cathedral Church of Chichester.

MARDEN (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Midhurst, containing 20 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £6. 17. 8. T. P. Phipps, Esq. was patron in 1806.

MARDEN (UP), a parish in the hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 9 miles (S. W.) from Midhurst, containing 306 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Compton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The Rev. Dr. Cox, in 1741, left £100 in support of a school for this parish and that of Compton.

MAREFIELD, a township in that part of the parish of TILTON which is in the hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Melton-Mowbray, containing 32 inhabitants.

MAREHAM le FEN, a parish in the soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Horncastle, containing 609 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church is dedicated to St. Helen. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MAREHAM on the HILL, a parish in the soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Horncastle, containing 133 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MARESFIELD, a parish in the hundred of RUSHMONDEN, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Uckfield, containing 1439 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £12. Lord Viscount Gage was patron in 1812. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, has lately received an addition of fifty-seven sittings, of which fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £35 towards defraying the expense. The Rev. Richard Bonner, in 1689, devised a messuage and garden, with two small rent-charges, toward the support of a school, which bequest is applied to the support of a National school, wherein from one hundred to one hundred and fifty children are educated, chiefly at the expense of Sir John and Lady Shelley. A cattle fair is held on September 4th. The greater part of Ashdowne Forest is in this parish.

MARFLEET, a parish in the middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (E.) from Kingston upon Hull, containing 127 inhabitants. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, endowed with £100 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty. H. Grylls, Esq. was patron in 1824. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MARGARET (ST.), a parish in the hundred and county of HERTFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. by E.) from Hoddesdon, containing 97 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of the Lord of the Manor. A college, or chantry, for a master and four secular priests, was founded here in 1315, by Sir William de Goldington, Knt., in consequence of the impoverishment of the tithes, oblations, and other ecclesiastical rights of the church; but it was dissolved in 1431, for neglect and the misapplication of its revenue. This parish is situated between the New River and the Lea.

MARGARET'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 13 miles (W. S. W.) from Hereford, containing 317 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Oxford.

MARGARET (ST.) at CLIFFE, a parish in the hundred of BEWSBOROUGH, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Dover, containing 613 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 10. The church is a spacious structure, in the Norman style. This place has received the adjunct to its name from its high situation on the chalk cliffs overlooking the English channel. In a small bay where there is a pier, or jetty, for protecting the fishing craft, the finest-flavoured lobsters in England are caught.

MARGARET-MARSH, a parish in the hundred of STURMINSTER-NEWTON-CASTLE, Sturminster division of the county of DORSET, 4 miles (S. W.) from Shaftesbury, containing 84 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Iwerne-Minster, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

MARGARETTING, a parish in the hundred of CHELMSFORD, county of ESSEX, 1 mile (N. E. by E.) from Ingatestone, containing 479 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £9. 2. C. Phillips, Esq. and others were patrons in 1827. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, has a wooden belfry surmounted by a spire. The Rev. C. F. Bond, in 1827, left £100 Bank stock towards the support of a Sunday school, which is attended by about fifty children. A house, called Killigrew's farm, is said to have been the frequent resort of Henry VIII.: it seems to have been a place of great security, being surrounded by a moat, which, within memory, was crossed by a draw-bridge, having two watch towers.

MARGATE, a sea-port, market-town, and parish, in the cinque-port liberty of DOVER, of which it is a member, though locally in the hundred of Ringslow, or Isle of Thanet, lathe of St. Augustine, county of KENT, 44 miles (E. N. E.) from Maidstone, and $72\frac{1}{2}$ (E.) from London, containing, according to the last census, 7843 resident inhabitants, and, at the present time (1830), 9500. This place, formerly a small fishing village, was distinguished by a mere, or stream, having its influx into the sea; from which circumstance it obtained the name of Mere-gate, and, subsequently, Margate. About the middle of the last century it became much frequented as a bathing-place, from the fineness of the beach and the purity of the air; and, though originally consisting of one scattered and irregular street, it has, by the erection of new buildings at various times, to meet the wants of the increased number of visitors, attained its present importance. A pier of timber was constructed at a very early period, and, for its preservation, two pier-wardens and sub-deputies were appointed by the lord wardens of the cinque-ports, and certain rates on corn, and other imported produce, were granted in the reign of Elizabeth. In 1787 an act was passed for the general improvement of the town, and the rebuilding of the pier, when the entire property and management of the latter were vested in the commissioners for paving and lighting the town, and under this act the old wooden pier was cased with stone; but in a violent storm, on the 14th of January, 1808, it was irreparably injured. In July, 1812, an act was obtained for "separating the management of the pier and harbour from the concerns of the town, and establishing a joint-stock company of proprietors," with a court of fifteen directors, who were empowered to raise money for the building of a new pier, and to levy certain tolls on goods and passengers, to be applied to the liquidation of the original capital and the interest thereon, and the surplus to accumulate until it amounts to the sum of £20,000, as a fund for the future repairs of the pier: this effected, the company will be dissolved, and the pier again placed under the control of the commissioners of the town, as heretofore. Under this act a new pier was projected, on an entirely new site, by the chairman of the directors, Daniel Jarvis, Esq., M.D., and carried into execution from a design by Mr. Rennie and Mr. Jessop, engineers: the work, which had been commenced April 6th, 1810, was completed in 1815, at an expense of £100,000: it is a handsome and substantial stone structure, nine hundred feet in length from east to west, in its plan forming a portion of a polygon, and well calculated to afford protection to the vessels in the harbour: it is divided into two stages of buildings, the lower forming a quay, and the upper a promenade, defended on the sea side with a stone parapet, and on the land side by iron railing: this promenade, which, as a marine walk, is probably unrivalled, was designed by Mr. Thomas Edmunds, builder, of Margate. To the east of the pier is "Jarvis' landing-place" for passengers, when the depth of water will not allow vessels to reach the pier. This important work was executed in the year 1824, without any additional toll, or cost to the public, by the Pier Company, at an expense of £8000: it is constructed entirely of English oak, and extends northward into the sea one thousand one hundred and twenty feet from the shore, forming, at low water, a most delightful promenade. An act of parliament has been obtained, by which certain regulations are enforced to preserve order during the landing and embarking of passengers. At the extremity of the pier, a stone lighthouse has lately been erected, from a design by Mr. William Edmunds, architect, of this town, the shaft of which forms a Grecian Doric column, placed on an octagonal base, serving as a look-out house; the column is surmounted by an ornamental chamber, or lantern of iron. A new pier-house has also been built, under the superintendence of the same architect, for the use of the directors and their officers, having a bell-turret, and a clock with four illuminated dials. At the entrance of the landing-place, a handsome cast-iron archway has been placed, by the Pier Company, in compliment to their talented and spirited chairman, Daniel Jarvis, Esq., and, as a further mark of respect, a granite column has been erected, on which is inscribed a detailed account of the principal improvements that have been effected in the town chiefly through the exertions of that gentleman. The harbour, though, from its situation, much exposed to storms from the north-east, has been greatly improved by the construction of the new pier, and affords good shelter for vessels: several trading vessels are constantly sailing between this place and the Dutch coast. This being the nearest and most convenient port for the passage to the opposite coast, caused it to be formerly, and again recently, selected as the station for the Ostend mail packets, but this distinction it does not at present enjoy. Amongst the distinguished persons who have embarked, or landed, at Margate are, the Elector Palatine and his consort, in the reign of James I.; William III.; George I.; George II. and his queen Caroline; the Duke of Marlborough; the late Duke of York, on his expedition to Flanders, in 1793; Admiral Duncan, after his victory off Camperdown, in 1797; and the troops on the expedition to Walcheren, in 1809: the wounded from the battle of Waterloo were also landed here, in 1815.

The town is pleasantly situated, partly on the acclivities of two hills, and partly in the valley below; it is lighted with gas, well paved, and abundantly supplied with excellent water from wells. Considerable improvements have been effected, and others are still in progress, by the commissioners for paving and lighting, under the authority of numerous acts of parliament; sea-defences have been erected, new roads formed, streets widened and Macadamised, public pumps erected, the open areas in the squares and other places enclosed with handsome iron railings, and shrubberies planted; insomuch that the town presents, in general, an appearance of neatness and order highly creditable. The London entrance is, in particular, distinguished by an esplanade, equalled only in extent and beauty by the celebrated work of that nature at Weymouth; it is protected by a stone wall, and lighted with gas, presenting, at night, an imposing appearance, and forming an extended crescent, which is terminated by the pier: the whole of the sea-defences are constructed of stone, and exceed a mile in length, having cost upwards of £20,000. The market is held on Wednesday and Saturday, under a grant obtained in 1777. The town hall and market-place were rebuilt in 1821, at an expense of £4000: a prison is attached, for the temporary reception of criminals prior to their removal to Dover. The public subscription library, in Hawley-square, is a handsome building, and there are also three other excellent libraries, affording the usual accommodation. The bathing-rooms in High-street, on the New-road, and the more recently-constructed and extensive works of that kind on the Fort, are all of the best description: the warm baths have every modern improvement for the comfort and accommodation of those who frequent them; while the cold bathing unites with the most powerful local advantages the best description of machines, drawn by horses. The theatre is a neat building, erected in 1787, at an expense of £4000. The subscription and assembly rooms, attached to the Royal Hotel, are very spacious; the ball-room is ninety feet in length by forty-three feet wide, with card, ante, and refreshment, rooms: the whole comprise a most splendid suite, and are under the direction of a master of the ceremonies. Independently of the various hotels and numerous inns and taverns in the town, there are many public and private boarding-houses of the first class. Several handsome bazaars and boulevards have lately been erected by individuals at considerable cost. Adjoining the town, the Tivoli Gardens have been recently opened, and possess the advantages of a most delightful situation, of ornamental sheets of water, and thick plantations. In 1815 steam-packets were established; the number of passengers in that year was twenty three thousand five hundred, and, in 1830, the number amounted to ninety-five thousand: these vessels now ply daily between London and Margate, making the passage in about six hours and a half, and, in the season, two thousand persons frequently arrive in one day. The trade of the town is almost entirely connected with the resort of visitors; here are, however, a very extensive brewery, a rope-manufactory, and some establishments for ship-building, &c. A large number of sea-faring men obtain their subsistence in winter by rendering aid to vessels in distress, which is locally called "Foying," and in summer by fishing and taking out pleasure parties in open boats.

Margate being a member of the port of Dover, the mayor of that town appoints one of the inhabitants to act as his deputy, and the town is subject in all matters to the jurisdiction of that port, and of its sessions; although, by a late act of parliament, appeals in certain cases are allowed to be tried at the Canterbury quarter sessions. In 1811, local magistrates were appointed, two of whom are now resident. A court of requests is held, for the recovery of debts under £5, the jurisdiction of which extends over the parishes of St. John (Margate), St. Peter the Apostle, Birchington, and the ville of Wood; and a court leet for the manor of Minster, which comprises most of the parishes in the island, is held annually about Michaelmas.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a spacious building of flint and stone, with a square tower and low spire, erected at various periods and in different styles: it was originally a chapel of ease to Minster, and was made parochial in 1290: there are several monuments of great antiquity, and a fine organ. At the east end of the north aisle is a strong building of stone, which, from 1661, till 1761, was used as a magazine for gunpowder, but is now appropriated as a vestry-room. To the taste and influence of the present vicar, the Rev. W. F. Baylay, the town is indebted for much of the improvements which it has undergone during the last twenty years. The new church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was completed in 1829, from a design and under the superintendence of Mr. William Edmunds: it is an elegant structure of Bath stone, in the early style of English architecture, and consists of a nave nearly sixty feet high, and two side aisles, elaborately groined: the east end is terminated by a recess for the altar, having a noble window filled with stained glass; and at the west end is a deep recess for the organ, which represents a shrine, having, in front, a stone screen, with pierced arches, buttresses, and finials with elaborate carving: the organ forms part of the architecture of the church. The side windows are adorned with stained glass, representing the armorial bearings of the principal subscribers, which, with the east window, are considered to be splendid specimens of the art, the expense having been defrayed by private subscription. The exterior of the building is decorated with buttresses, pinnacles, and carved finials. The tower rises to the height of one hundred and thirty-five feet, and, from the commanding site on which it is built, is seen at a very considerable distance, being the first object perceivable on approaching the English coast. The church contains two thousand sittings, of which one thousand two hundred are free; and its total cost was about £28,000, towards which the parliamentary commissioners contributed £10,000, £6000 was raised by private subscription, the Pier Company gave £2000, and the remainder was levied by parish rates. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of St. John's, who appointed the Rev. F. Barrow first incumbent. A charity school, established by subscription in 1787, for thirty girls and thirty boys, afterwards extended to forty of each sex, has, since the adoption of the National system of education, afforded instruction to three thousand children. Drapers' hospital, about half a mile from the parish church, was founded in 1709, by Michael Yoakley, a member of the Society of Friends, for aged women, who are accommodated in nine comfortable dwellings, and are supplied with money, clothes, and fuel: in the centre is a chapel for the Society of Friends. The Royal sea-bathing infirmary was instituted in 1792, and opened in 1796, under the patronage of his late Majesty, George IV.; the building consists of a centre and two wings, capable of accommodating two hundred patients. There are likewise numerous charitable bequests for the relief of the poor, an account of which has recently been published by a committee of gentlemen, in order that the intentions of the founders may not be frustrated by neglect, or otherwise.

About a mile and a half to the south-west of the town is Dandelion, the fortified mansion of a family of that name in the reign of Edward I., of which a gatehouse, flanked with four towers, remains in good preservation. About a quarter of a mile to the south of the parish church is Salmstone Grange, where are the remains of a chapel, or oratory, formerly belonging to the monastery of St. Augustine; and in the middle of a field, about a mile and a half further, at a place called Chapel Bottom, are the ruins of Dene chapel, held under a license from the abbey of St. Augustine, in 1230, by Sir Henry de Sandwich. It is supposed that a severe battle was fought between the Danes and the Saxons in this neighbourhood, from the number of graves discovered on both the hills contiguous to the town. Various coins and other antiquities have, at different times, been found; and, on the excavations being made for Trinity church, two urns, filled with human bones, standing in, and likewise covered with, patera, were found, in a fine state of preservation, having the name of the Roman Emperor Maximilian impressed on the different pieces.

MARHAM, a parish in the hundred of CLACK-CLOSE, county of NORFOLK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Swaffham, containing 678 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. A Cistercian nunnery, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here in 1251, by Isabella de Albini, Countess of Arundel, which at the dissolution had a revenue of £42. 4. 7.

MARHAM-CHURCH, a parish in the hundred of STRATTON, county of CORNWALL, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Stratton, containing 647 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. John Kingdon was patron in 1818. The church is dedicated to St. Marvenne. The Bude and Holsworthy canal passes to the north of the church.

MARHOLM, a parish in the liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Peterborough, containing 120 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £9. 2. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$. Earl Fitzwilliam was patron in 1791. The church, dedicated to St. Guthlac has an ancient font, and, amongst other memorials, a magnificent marble monument to William, Earl Fitzwilliam, and Anne his Countess. In this parish is Abbey Milton, one of the seats of that noble family, a large irregular structure, the most ancient part of which is of the time of Elizabeth.

MARI-ANSLEIGH, a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from South Molton, containing 289 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MARK, a parish in the hundred of BEMPSTONE, county of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Axbridge, containing 1150 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Consistorial Decanal court of Wells, endowed with £30 per annum private benefaction, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Harrowby. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MARK-EATON, a township in the parish of MACKWORTH, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. N. W.) from Derby, containing 258 inhabitants.

MARKBY, a parish in the Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Alford, containing 94 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £300 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. — Massingberd, Esq. was patron in 1808. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

MARKET-RASEN, county of LINCOLN. — See RASEN (MARKET).

MARKET-STREET, a chapelry comprised within the parishes of CADDINGTON, FLAMSTEAD, and STUDHAM, partly in the hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, and partly in the hundreds of FLITT and MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Luton. The population is returned with the respective parishes. The ancient name of Merk-gate, or Mark-gate, of which the present is a corruption, appears to have been derived from Merk, a boundary, and Yate, or Gate, this place having formerly been the end of the enclosed country, where it is supposed there was a gate on the high road or Watling-street. On a hill in the vicinity, where is now an ancient mansion, a nunnery of the Benedictine order, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, formerly stood: it was founded about 1145, principally by Geoffrey, Abbot of St. Alban's, and at the dissolution its revenue was valued at £143. 13. 8.: the monastic buildings were converted into a mansion in the time of Edward VI., which is still called the priory. The village is on the great road from London to Birmingham, and consists of one long-street; the manufacture of hats and bonnets of straw-plat is somewhat considerable. A fair is held here about Michaelmas, but the day depends upon that of Luton fair. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with a rent-charge of £20, and with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Daniel Goodson Adey, Esq., as proprietor of the manor, under the provisions of an act of parliament passed in the 14th of George II. The chapel, which is dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is situated in Cell, or Priory park, and was erected about a century ago, for the accommodation of the three parishes, in lieu of one at the manor-house, which had been burnt down. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Here is a grammar school: the school-house and close were conveyed to trustees by John Coppin, Esq., January 25th, 1666; the incumbent of the parish is the nominal master.

MARKET-STREET, a township in the parish of WYMONDHAM, hundred of FOREHOE, county of NORFOLK, containing 1308 inhabitants.

MARKFIELD, a parish in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Leicester, containing 1078 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 8. The Marquis of Hastings was patron in 1804. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, has lately received an addition of one hundred and seventy sittings, of which eighty-five are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £60 towards defraying the expense.

MARKHAM, a parish in the South-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.) from Tuxford, containing, with the chapelry of West Drayton, 756 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £11. 18. 11½. The Duke of Newcastle was patron in 1811. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a large ancient structure, with a lofty embattled tower, and contains a monument to the memory of Judge Markham, erected in 1409. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. James Gunthorpe, in 1706, and William Dunston, in 1713, bequeathed rent-charges of £5 each towards the support of a school, in which twenty children are clothed and educated, the deficiency being supplied by voluntary contributions.

MARKHAM (WEST), a parish in the South-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Tuxford, containing 209 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with that of Bevercoates united, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Richard Miller, in 1721, left an annuity of £8 for the instruction of poor children. Sir John Markham, Chief Justice of the King's Bench in the reign of Edward IV., and remarkable for his integrity and impartiality in the discharge of his official duties, was born here.

MARKINGTON, a joint township with Wallerthwaite, in that part of the parish of RIPON which is within the liberty of RIPON, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Ripon, containing, with Wallerthwaite, 457 inhabitants. Here is a small endowment, the gift of Mary Reynard, for the education of poor children.

MARKSBURY, a parish in the hundred of KEYNSHAM, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Pensford, containing, with the tything of Houndstreet, 354 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £10. 4. 2., and in the patronage of General Popham. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There are slight remains of an ancient chapel on Wingsbury hill. A monastery formerly existed within the parish, the site of which is now occupied by a private mansion. Here are some productive coal-mines.

MARKSHALL, a parish in the Witham division of the hundred of LEXDEN, county of ESSEX, 2 miles (N. W.) from Great Coggeshall, containing 59 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14. F. Honeywood, Esq. was patron in 1800. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

MARLAND (PETER'S), a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Great Torrington, containing 343 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, and in the patronage of T. Stevens, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

Seal and Arms.

MARLBOROUGH, a borough and market town, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Selkley, county of WILTS, 27 miles (N. by E.) from Salisbury, and 75 (W. by S.) from London, and containing 3038 inhabitants. The name, anciently written Marleberg, or Marlbridge, is supposed to be derived from the marl, or chalk, hills by which the town is surrounded. Camden supposed this to have been the Cunetio of Antoninus, but more recent researches induced Sir R. C. Hoare, Bart. to place that station at Folly Farm, about a mile and a half eastward from the town, where that celebrated antiquary discovered a tessellated pavement, and other relics of a Roman settlement. At the time of the Norman survey Marlborough had a church, and was held in royal demesne, soon after which period a castle was erected, which seems to have been the cause of the subsequent enlargement of the town. In the time of Richard I., and during his imprisonment in Austria, his brother John took possession of this fortress; but on Richard's return from captivity, he seized it, with all the other possessions belonging to his brother, and on their reconciliation he still retained the castle of Marlborough in his own possession. During the subsequent reign, King John occasionally kept his court here; and in the civil war of this period, Marlborough was possessed alternately by the king and the barons: it seems, indeed, to have been the occasional residence of subsequent sovereigns till the time of Henry VII., and to have formed part of the dowries of several queens. The assizes were held here from the time of Henry III. to that of Charles I.; and in the 52nd of Henry III. that parliament assembled here by which were enacted the laws relative to the police of the kingdom, and to the administration of justice, commonly called the "Statutes of Marlebridge." The castle, borough, &c., were granted by Henry VIII. to Edward, Duke of Somerset, and became forfeited to the crown on the attainder of that nobleman, in the reign of Edward VI., but were subsequently restored to the Somerset family, and have now descended, by intermarriage, to the Marquis of Ailesbury. Even in Camden's time, a few fragments only of the castle were remaining: a large house, now the Castle Inn, which occupies its site, is said to have been commenced by the first duke of Somerset of the Seymour family, and was improved by the Earl of Hertford, in the early part of the eighteenth century: the old keep has been converted into a spiral walk, in the grotto of which Mrs. Rowe wrote the most celebrated of her works, "Friendship in Death;" and here also Thompson is said to have composed a great part of his "Seasons," when on a visit to the Earl of Hertford, one of the most distinguished patrons of literature of that age. In the civil war between Charles I. and the parliament, the latter had a garrison here under the Earl of Essex; but the royal army, commanded by Lieut. Gen. Wilmot, marching hither from Oxford, in December 1642, captured above one thousand prisoners, besides large stores of arms and ammunition, with all which they returned in safety to that city. Marlborough having suffered repeatedly from fire prior to the year 1690, an act of parliament was passed in that year to prohibit the use of thatch as a covering for houses and other buildings within the borough.

The town is delightfully situated on the banks of the Kennet, on the northern verge of the Forest of Savernake, and on the north of it are the open downs: it consists principally of one long street, running from east to west, which is paved, and lighted with gas; the older houses are constructed of wood, and ornamented in front with curious carved work; the more modern are of stone and brick. On the north side of the principal street is a piazza projecting in front of the houses, serving for a promenade in wet weather; and at its eastern extremity is a market-house, erected on the site of a former one, by the corporation, in 1790: the upper story is divided into a council-chamber, an assembly-room, and a court-room. The inhabitants are well supplied with water. The manufactures are inconsiderable: the trade is principally in corn, coal, and malt, and considerable advantages arise from the situation of the town on a great thoroughfare. The Kennet and Avon canal passes within five miles of the town, and in consequence of its not passing through it, the inhabitants have the privilege of a draw-back upon the tonnage of goods. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday; the former market has much declined, being now only for vegetables; the latter is considerable, and has long been celebrated for its extensive supply of grain, cheese, butchers' meat, &c.: fairs are held July 11th, for horses and wool; August 22nd, for lambs, horses, and cows; and November 23rd, for sheep, horses, and cows.

Marlborough is a borough by prescription, and in a charter granted by Elizabeth, after referring to numerous preceding charters, the corporation is designated under the style of "The Mayor and Burgesses:" they are self-elected, and the present number is thirteen. The mayor (who is also coroner, clerk of the market, and escheator) and two of the burgesses are justices of the peace, and, with a town clerk, a chamberlain, two bailiffs, or serjeants at mace, and two high constables, are chosen annually by the corporation: the mayor and justices hold quarter sessions for the borough. The county bridewell and house of correction was erected in 1787: it comprises four day-rooms and airing-yards, and is chiefly occupied by prisoners previously to trial. Courts leet are held by the corporation, at the Lent and Michaelmas sessions, at which five constables (formerly called aldermen) are appointed, one for each ward; and a court, called the King's court, for the recovery of debts to any amount, is held every three weeks, under the charter of the 6th of John. The privilege of sending members to parliament has been exercised ever since the 23rd of Edward I., and the right of election is in the mayor and burgesses: the mayor is the returning officer: the predominant influence is possessed by the Marquis of Ailesbury. In the election of 1826 an effort was made to throw open the borough, and the subject was referred to a committee appointed by the House of Commons, who decided that the members returned by the corporation were duly elected: another attempt has recently been made, two members having been nominated by the opposing party in the election of 1830,

Marlborough comprises the two parishes of St. Mary the Virgin and St. Peter and St. Paul, within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Salisbury: they are divided into five wards, viz., the Green ward and Marsh ward, in St. Mary's parish; the High ward and Bailey ward, in the parish of St. Peter and St. Paul; and Kingsbury ward, in both parishes. The living of St. Mary's is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £10. 9. 4., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean of Salisbury: the church, a neat edifice of brick, with an ancient stone tower, beneath which is a Norman doorway, sustained considerable damage during the civil war, in 1641. The living of the parish of St. Peter and St. Paul is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £12, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury: the church, which stands at the western extremity of the main street, has a lofty square tower with battlements and pinnacles; the nave is supported by light pillars. There are places of worship for Huntingdonians, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school was founded and endowed with the revenue of the dissolved hospital of St. John, by grant of Edward VI. to the mayor and burgesses who were also empowered to make rules for its government: the nomination of the schoolmaster, originally given to the Duke of Somerset, is now exercised by the Marquis of Ailesbury; the income is from £200 to £300 per annum: the children of parents who have resided seven years in the town are alone eligible according to the rules, and the number of scholars on the foundation is in general about twenty. The scholars share, alternately with those of the free schools of Manchester and Hereford, in sixteen exhibitions at Brasenose College, Oxford, and sixteen scholarships at St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Sarah, Duchess of Somerset, in 1679; and Mrs. Brown bequeathed a rent-charge of £5 for any poor scholar from this school to the University of Oxford. A National school is supported by voluntary contributions: the school-rooms were erected at the expense of the late Earl of Ailesbury. An almshouse was formerly supported from the funds of the corporation, to which several donations and bequests were made for its support in the reign of Charles II., when it was rebuilt at the expense of that body, but, in 1725, they conveyed it to the officers of St. Mary's parish, by whom it is at present used as a workhouse. Northward from the town is a common, on which each householder has a right to turn two milch cows; and eastward of it is a close, of about eighty acres of arable ground, of which a certain portion is granted to each member of the corporate body during his own life and the widowhood of his wife, on the payment of a sum by way of fine, and a fixed rent; the cows of the commoners are depastured on the eighty acres after the harvest: and the inhabitants have an ancient privilege of turning two horses, from Old May-day to Old Martinmas-day, into the adjacent Forest of Savernake. The monastic institutions here were, a Gilbertine priory, dedicated to St. Margaret, founded in the reign of John, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £38. 19. 2.; a convent of White friars, founded in 1316 by the merchants of this town; St. John's hospital, founded in the reign of Henry II.; and St. Thomas' in that of Henry III., and annexed to the priory of St. Margaret in the reign of Richard II. A chapel and other portions of the priory were standing a few years since. Among the distinguished natives of this town the following may be specified: Henry of Marlborough, an English historian of the fourteenth century; Sir Michael Foster, an eminent lawyer, and one of the judges of the Court of King's Bench, born in 1689; Walter Harte, poet and historian, who died in 1773; Dr. Henry Sacheverell, of political celebrity, born in 1672, during the incumbency of his father in the parish of St. Peter and St. Paul; and John Hughes, a poet, and one of the writers in the Spectator, born in 1677. Marlborough confers the title of duke on the family of Spencer Churchill.

MARLCLIFT, a hamlet in the parish of BIDFORD, Stratford division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, 5 miles (S.) from Alcester. The population is returned with the parish.

MARLDON, a parish in the hundred of HAYTOR, county of DEVON, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Totness, containing 384 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Paington, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Exeter, and in the patronage of Sir S. Northcote, G. Templar, Esq., and the Rev. J. Templar. The church has a rich stone screen. In the village of Compton are considerable ruins of an ancient castellated mansion, occupied by Sir Maurice de la Pole in the reign of Henry II.

MARLESFORD, a parish in the hundred of LOES, county of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Wickham-Market, containing 436 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 6. 8. A. Arcedeckne, Esq. was patron in 1823. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

MARLINGFORD, a parish in the hundred of FOREHOE, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Wymondham, containing 179 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 8½., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. L. Forman, Esq. and others were patrons in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. Mary: the nave and chancel are thatched.

MARLOW, a township in the parish of LEINTWARDINE, hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, containing 68 inhabitants.

MARLOW (GREAT), a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 35½ miles (S. by E.) from Buckingham, and 31 (W. by N.) from London, containing 3763 inhabitants, of which number, 2532 are in the borough. The ancient name of this place was Merlaw, supposed to be derived from the Saxon word Mere, a marsh, and Law or Low, a hill. The town, situated on the banks of the Thames, consists of two principal streets, which cross in the market-place: the surrounding scenery is replete with variety and beauty. Races are held in July; and there is a good news-room. The river is here crossed by a wooden bridge, but an iron suspension bridge is in progress of erection. There are some paper-mills and copper-works in the neighbourhood, which, with the manufacture of lace and covered wire, and rope-making, furnish considerable employment to the labouring class: there is likewise a good trade in corn, timber, and malt. The market, held on Saturday, has nearly fallen into disuse; a pleasure fair is held on the 1st of May, and another for cheese, &c., on the 29th of October. The principal civil officer is a high constable. The borough first sent representatives to parliament in the 28th of Edward I., and continued so to do till the 2nd of Edward II., when the privilege ceased for upwards of four hundred years, but was restored upon petition to the House of Commons in the 21st of James I., and has since been exercised without intermission: the right of election is in the inhabitants paying scot and lot; the number of voters is about five hundred, and the high constable is the returning officer. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a venerable structure, and contains several ancient monuments. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. In 1628, Sir William Borlase bequeathed estates for teaching twenty-four poor children, apprenticing six of them annually, and teaching twenty-four women to make bone-lace, and for a man to keep a house of correction. A National school for children of both sexes is supported by subscription. In the 7th of James I., John Brinkhurst devised to trustees almshouses for six poor widows, and 5s. per quarter to each inmate. The Royal Military College, established at High Wycombe in 1799, was removed to this town in 1802; but, in 1812, it was again removed to Sandhurst in Berkshire.

MARLOW (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. N. E.) from Great Marlow, containing 775 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 5. 10. The Rev. G. F. L. Nicolay was patron in 1822. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is principally in the later style of English architecture. Here was a small convent of Benedictine nuns, founded, in honour of the Virgin Mary, by Geoffrey, Lord Spencer, before the reign of John, the revenue of which at the dissolution was estimated at £37. 6. 11.

MARLSTON, a joint township with Leach, in that part of the parish of ST. MARY, CHESTER, which is in the lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Chester, containing, with Leach, 108 inhabitants.

MARNHAM, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Tuxford, containing, with the township of Grassthorne, 351 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £8. 19. 2., and in the patronage of Earl Brownlow. The church is dedicated to St. Wilfrid. A school was lately erected by Lord Brownlow for the instruction of ten children, £10. 10. being allowed to the master out of the rents of a charitable bequest from Henry Nicholson, in 1677. A fair for horses, cattle, swine, &c., is held on September 12th. The river Trent is here crossed by a ferry.

MARNHULL, a parish in the hundred of STURMINSTER-NEWTON-CASTLE, Sturminster division of the county of DORSET, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Shaftesbury, containing 1273 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £31. 6. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. H. Place was patron in 1778. The church is dedicated to St. Gregory. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MARPLE, a chapelry in the parish of STOCKPORT, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Stockport, containing, in 1821, 2646 inhabitants, since which period the population is supposed to have nearly doubled. The village is situated on the road from London to Manchester through Buxton, and was anciently called Mupull, in allusion to an expansion of the waters of the river Goyt in the vale below. The scenery is remarkably picturesque: the banks of the river, which, from the highest points, may be seen for several miles, are rocky, precipitous, and well-wooded; and the view from the churchyard includes the mountains of the peak on one side, and the Welch hills on the other. The cotton manufacture, established here by the late Samuel Oldnow, Esq., is considerable, and many of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of hats. This place derives importance from the Peak Forest and Macclesfield canals, which pass through it: a direct communication is afforded by the former from the Cromford canal and the Peak Forest railway to the Ashton canal, and thence to Manchester; and the Macclesfield canal (which is now in progress) unites the Peak Forest and the Trent and Mersey canals, and thus forms, not only a direct, but the shortest, water conveyance from London to Manchester. Marple forms part of His Majesty's manor and forest of Macclesfield, at the court leet whereof constables and other officers are appointed. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Stockport. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a neat edifice, capable of accommodating one thousand persons: it was rebuilt and enlarged in 1812, and the tower contains the bells taken from the old church at Stockport. Samuel Oldnow, Esq., who projected the Peak Forest canal, and was a great benefactor to this place and neighbourhood, was interred here. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. This is the birthplace of John Bradshaw, who was president of the court that condemned Charles I: he bequeathed £700 to purchase an annuity for maintaining a free school at Marple, but the change of property brought about by the Restoration prevented his bequest becoming available. His brother Henry founded a small school here, and endowed it with the interest of £100, which has since been augmented with other benefactions.

MARR, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Doncaster, containing 162 inhabitants. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Kinnoul. The church, dedicated to St. Helen, is principally in the early style of English architecture; the tower is surmounted by a small spire, and has two singular arched recesses, one on the north, the other on the south, side.

MARRICK, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Richmond, containing 621 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with a rent-charge of £10, and £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1500 parliamentary grant. W. Powlett, Esq. was patron in 1815. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, occupies part of the site of a Benedictine nunnery, founded in honour of the Blessed Virgin, by Roger de Asc, about the close of the reign of Stephen, and which at the dissolution had a revenue of £64. 16. 9. Two poor widows of this parish, not paupers, receive £5. 12. per annum from an institution called the Duke of Bolton's charity.

MARRISHES, a township in the parish and lythe of PICKERING, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Pickering, containing 210 inhabitants. This township is divided into East and West Marrison.

MARSDEN, a chapelry partly in the parish of HUDDESFIELD, but chiefly in that of ALMONDBURY, upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Huddersfield, containing 2330 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £1100 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Almondbury. Independents and Wesleyan Methodists have each a place of worship here. At the distance of half a mile, the Huddersfield and Manchester canal passes under a tunnel three miles in length.

MARSDEN (GREAT), a chapelry in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by W.) from Colne, containing 1893 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £1500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Whalley.

MARSDEN (LITTLE), a township in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Burnley, containing 2052 inhabitants.

MARSH (CHAPEL), a parish in the wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 9 miles (N. N. E.) from Louth, containing 411 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of North Coates, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists; and several trifling donations have been made for the support and education of the poor.

MARSH-GIBBON, a parish in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Bicester, containing 738 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £21. 9. $4\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Near the manor-house are some slight vestiges of earth-works, said to have been thrown up by the parliamentarians, in their advance to this place in 1645.

MARSHAM, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, 2 miles (S.) from Aylsham, containing 624 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 12. 9. Lord Viscount Anson was patron in 1787. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The manufactures of worsted and bombazine are carried on here.

MARSHFIELD, a market town and parish in the upper division of the hundred of THORNBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Bristol, and 102 (W. by S.) from London, containing 1569 inhabitants. The town consists chiefly of a single street of old buildings, nearly a mile in length. The trade is principally in malt, a great part of which is the produce of the vicinity. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held on the 24th of May and 24th of October, the former chiefly for horned cattle, and the latter for sheep, horses, and cheese. A bailiff is annually elected at the manorial court, and is assisted by a serjeant at mace; his jurisdiction extends to a considerable distance round the town. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £29. 4. 9., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome and spacious fabric, in the later style of English architecture, with a fine square tower at the west end. There is a place of worship for Unitarians. A free school was founded, about 1722, by John Harrington, Esq., who gave the school-house; it was subsequently endowed with messuages and lands for the support of a schoolmaster, in 1731, by Dionysia Long: the annual income, arising from this and other benefactions, is £62. 5., and twenty children are instructed: the present school-room was built in 1793. Almshouses for eight poor persons were founded and endowed by Nicholas Crispe, in 1625; and there are benefactions for apprenticing poor boys, and other charitable purposes. In this parish are some barrows and intrenchments, supposed to have been raised by the Britons, or Saxons, about 561, when the battle of Dirham took place in this neighbourhood. Leland mentions the existence of a nunnery also, but there are no vestiges of it. In the vicinity are three stones, which mark the limits of the counties of Gloucester, Somerset, and Wilts.

MARSHFIELD, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WENTLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (S. W.) from Newport, containing 483 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £6. 2. 6., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The church is a large and handsome structure in the later English style; in the chancel are several stone stalls.

MARSHWOOD, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of WHITCHURCH-CANONICORUM, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Beaminster, containing 532 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Whitchurch-Canonorum, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol. This place, which takes its name from the marshy, woody vale in which it is situated, was anciently an honour, the only one in the county, and the head of a barony.

MARSK, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Richmond, containing 290 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £12. 6. $5\frac{1}{2}$. J. Hutton, Esq. was patron in 1808. The church is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. A school, erected in 1814, by John Hutton, Esq., is endowed with about £20 per annum, arising from land and money given by John Jackson and — Hutchinson, for the education and support of the poor.

MARSK, a parish in the eastern division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Marsk and Redcar, and containing 1249 inhabitants, of which number, 576 are in the township of Marsk, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Guilsbrough. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 11. $10\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant. Lord Dundas was patron in 1799. The church, dedicated to St. German, stands near the edge of the cliff, its spire serving as an excellent land-mark. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Marsk hall was built by Sir William Pennyman, Bart., in the style which prevailed in the time of Charles I.

MARSTON, a township in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Northwich, containing 404 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the township.

MARSTON, a parish in the wapentake of LOVEDEN, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Grantham, containing 393 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Hougham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, and in the patronage of Sir J. H. Thorold, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Dame Margaret Thorold, in 1718, gave land, the income to be applied in teaching poor children, and apprenticing one yearly, with a premium of £5.

MARSTON, a parish in the hundred of BULLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Oxford, containing 340 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. T. H. Whorwood. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The river Cherwell forms part of the boundary of this parish.

MARSTON, a township in the parish of CHURCH-EATON, western division of the hundred of CUTTLE-

STONE, county of STAFFORD, 6 miles (W.) from Penkridge. The population is returned with the parish.

MARSTON, a chapelry in that part of the parish of ST. MARY, LICHFIELD, which is in the southern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Stafford, containing 96 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation of Stafford.

MARSTON, a quarter in the parish of CHURCH-BICKENHILL, Solihull division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Coleshill. The population is returned with the parish.

MARSTON, a hamlet in that part of the parish of WOLSTON which is in the Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Coventry. The population is returned with the parish.

MARSTON, a tything in the parish of POTTERNE, hundred of POTTERNE and CANNINGS, county of WILTS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Devizes, containing 192 inhabitants.

MARSTON, a chapelry in the parish of YARDLEY, lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, though locally in the upper division of the hundred of Halfshire, county of WORCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Birmingham. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a donative. The chapel was erected in 1704, by Job Marston, Esq.

MARSTON (BUTLER'S), a parish in the Kington division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W. by S.) from Kington, containing 275 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. Near it is an old mansion of stone, now used as a kennel for the hounds of the Warwickshire hunt. Upon an artificial mount on the green is a decayed elm, of remarkably large dimensions, capable of containing twelve persons, and formed by nature into the appearance of a grotto.

MARSTON upon DOVE, a parish in the hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Burton upon Trent, containing, with the townships of Hilton and Hoon, and the hamlet of Hatton, 905 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £7. 15. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of E. S. Pole, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is partly in the early and partly in the decorated style of English architecture.

MARSTON (ST. LAWRENCE), a parish in the hundred of KING'S SUTTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Brackley, containing 482 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, consolidated with the rectory of Warkworth, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £20. S. Blencowe, Esq. was patron in 1809.

MARSTON (LEA), in the county of WARWICK.— See LEA-MARSTON.

MARSTON (LONG), a chapelry in the parish of TRING, hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Tring, with which the population is returned. The chapel is dedicated to All Saints.

MARSTON (LONG), a parish in the ainsty of the city, and East riding of the county, of YORK, comprising the townships of Angram, Hutton, and Long Marston, and containing 579 inhabitants, of which number, 388 are in the township of Long Marston, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Tadcaster. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £24. 3. 9. Sir R. T. Lawley, Bart. was patron in 1821. The church, dedicated to All Saints, was erected about 1400. A National school has been established here, and is partly supported by a rent-charge of £10, the bequest of Richard Roundle, and the interest of £150 left by the Rev. Marmaduke Buck, in 1757. Within the parish is Marston Moor, the scene of a memorable and most obstinately disputed battle, fought on July 2, 1644, between the royalists under Prince Rupert, and the parliamentarians, commanded by Fairfax, in which fifty thousand British troops were opposed to each other, and which ended in the total defeat of the king's army.

MARSTON (MAGNA), a parish in the hundred of HORETHORNE, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Yeovil, containing 324 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £6. 10. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. Mrs. Williams was patroness in 1785. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat stone structure, with a strong tower crowned with an embattled pediment and pinnacles. In the porch, two feet below the surface of the earth, have lately been found several large stones carved with crosses entwined with palm leaves, and covering human skeletons. Sir John St. Barbe, in 1736, devised the rectory, parsonage-house, and lands for the education of ten poor boys of this parish and that of Ashington: fourteen children are instructed. On opening a pit in 1788, near the margin of a brook, some fine specimens of a calcareous blue stone, almost filled with Cornua Ammonis, overspread with white pearl, were discovered, and raised in masses sufficiently large to form slabs, which took a beautiful polish, and were much in request for side tables. In the same field irregular heaps of mundic, with large metalliferous Cornua Ammonis, were also found; and the quarries on the hills, from one of which the brook takes its rise, abound in Ammonites Nautili, Belamnites, &c.

MARSTON (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Winslow, containing 558 inhabitants. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat structure, containing three stone stalls and a piscina; the chancel was built by the offerings of those who frequented a chalybeate spring here, which once was in high repute, though now scarcely known.

MARSTON (POTTER'S), a chapelry in the parish of BARWELL, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Hinckley, containing 16 inhabitants.

MARSTON (PRIORS'), a parish in the Burton-Dassett division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Southam, containing 593 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Priors' Hardwick, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. The Oxford canal passes through the parish. James West, in 1705, and Josiah Kay, in 1711, bequeathed property now producing £40 a year, for teaching and apprenticing poor children.

MARSTON (SOUTH), a chapelry in the parish of HIGHWORTH, hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, county of WILTS, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Highworth, containing 299 inhabitants. It is in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Highworth in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury.

MARSTON-BIGOTT, a parish in the hundred of FROME, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Frome, containing 471 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £11. 19. $9\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Earl of Cork and Orrery. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, was taken down, within the last fifty years, and another erected on a more convenient site.

MARSTON-FLEET, a parish in the hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Aylesbury, containing 43 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 2. $8\frac{1}{2}$. Lord Viscount Dillon was patron in 1776. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MARSTON-JABBETT, a hamlet in the parish of BULKINGTON, Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Nuneaton, containing 82 inhabitants.

MARSTON-MAISEY, a parish in the hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, county of WILTS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Cricklade, containing 184 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of Maisey-Hampton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1000 royal bounty.

MARSTON-MONTGOMERY, a parish in the hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Ashbourn, containing 469 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Cubley, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. The church is dedicated to St. Giles. A school is supported by small annual donations.

MARSTON-MORETAINE, a parish in the hundred of REDBORNESTOKE, county of BEDFORD, 4 miles (N. W.) from Ampthill, containing 899 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £33. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the later style of English architecture: the tower is detached. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MARSTON-SICCA, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Chipping-Campden, containing 272 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £17. 10. The Rev. William Loggin was patron in 1808. The church is dedicated to St. James.

MARSTON-STANNETT, a chapelry in the parish of PENCOMBE, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Bromyard. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of Pencombe, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £410 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Pencombe.

MARSTON-TRUSSEL, a parish in the hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Market-Harborough, containing, with the township of Thorpe-Lubbenham, 217 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £15. 2. 11. Richard H. Bullivant, Esq. was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

MARSTOW, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (S.W.) from Ross, containing 132 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Selleck, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Selleck. The church is dedicated to St. Martin.

MARSWORTH, a parish in the hundred of COTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Ivinghoe, containing 391 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has the appearance of considerable antiquity; in the windows are some fragments of stained glass; parts of the floor are of Roman brick; and near the altar is a fine tomb, but much mutilated, in memory of some of the family of West. The old Roman Ikniel-street bounds the parish on the south-east, and the discovery of swords, urns, coins, and other ancient relics, in forming the Grand Junction canal, affords some reason for considering it the site of a Roman station, though historians have not recorded it as such.

MARTALL, a joint township with Little Warford, in that part of the parish of ROSTHERN which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Nether Knutsford, containing, with Little Warford, 267 inhabitants.

MARTHA (ST.), in the county of SURREY.—See CHILWORTH.

MARTHAM, a parish in the western division of the hundred of FLEGG, county of NORFOLK, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from Caistor, containing 845 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Christopher Amys, in 1622, bequeathed £112, which, together with a tripling bequest by Robert Bower, in 1622, is applied in teaching poor children.

MARTIN, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by S.) from Horncastle, containing 55 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 4. 2., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of John Oldham and — Slater, Esqrs. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The Horncastle canal passes through the parish.

MARTIN, a hamlet in the parish of TIMBERLAND, first division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $10\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Sleaford, containing 589 inhabitants.

MARTIN, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of DAMERHAM, county of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Cranbourne, containing 528 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of South Damerham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury.

MARTIN, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Skipton, containing 382 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £14. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$. Mrs. Heber was patroness in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

MARTIN (ST.), a parish in WEST hundred, county of CORNWALL, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N.) from East Looe, containing, with the borough of East Looe, 1181 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £36. 2. $3\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Dowager Countess of Sandwich and Viscount Barnard. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parish is bounded on the west by Looe harbour, and on the south by the English channel. Here was formerly a nunnery.

MARTIN (ST.), a parish in the hundred of OSWESTRY, county of SALOP, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Ellesmere, containing, with the townships of Ifton-Rhyn, Weston-Rhyn, and Bron-y-gath, 1852 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £5. 2. $3\frac{1}{2}$, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. There is an ancient wood carving in the roof of the church, in allusion to St. Martin, a translation of whose life was made from the Latin by John Trevor in 1488. The Ellesmere canal passes through the parish, and at its verge, crosses the valley of the Ceiriog by means of an aqueduct, near the neat village of Chirk, where it enters Wales: it then immediately passes under a tunnel, and, a little further on, under another, whence it is continued to the beautiful vale of Llangollen, where it is carried over the river Dee by Pont-y-Cyssylltau aqueduct, a stupendous structure of nineteen tall arches by Mr. Telford: on the banks of the canal, near the Welch boundary of the parish, are some coal works. The great road from Shrewsbury to Holyhead has here been recently diverted from its original course, whereby a considerable distance has been saved, and the steep acclivity of Chirk hill avoided.

MARTIN (ST.), a township in that part of the parish of CATTERICK which is in the eastern division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S. E.) from Richmond, containing 23 inhabitants. About the year 1100, Wymar, chief steward to the Earl of Richmond, gave the chapel of St. Martin, with certain land adjoining, to the abbey of St. Mary, at York, upon which a cell of nine or ten Benedictine monks was established here, and continued till the dissolution, when its revenue was estimated at £43. 16. 8.

MARTIN (ST.) in MENEAGE, a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Helston, containing 504 inhabitants. The living is a rectory not in charge, with that of Mawgan, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter. Helford river is navigable on the north of this parish. Tremayne was for some time the residence of the circumnavigator, Captain Wallis.

MARTIN'S (ST.) STAMFORD-BARON, a parish in the liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (S. E.) from Stamford, containing, with the hamlet of Woothorpe, 1226 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 9., endowed with £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Marquis of Exeter. Here is a trifling endowment, the gift of Lady Dorothy Cecil, for teaching and apprenticing poor children. A Benedictine nunnery, in honour of our Lady St. Mary and St. Michael, was founded here in the time of Henry II., by William de Waterville, abbot of Peterborough, to which abbey it was subordinate; it had at one period forty nuns, but at the dissolution it possessed a revenue of only £72. 18. 10.

MARTIN (STOWE), a chapelry in the parish of TAMERTON-FOLIATT, hundred of ROBOROUGH, county of DEVON, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Plymouth.

MARTIN-HUSSINGTREE, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, though locally in the lower division of the hundred of Oswaldslow, county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Droitwich, containing 217 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £5. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

MARTINDALE, a chapelry in the parish of BARTON, WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Ambleside, containing 155 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John de Whelpdale, Esq. Here is a free school, with an endowment of £13 a year, arising from the rent of an estate left by the relict of the Rev. Richard Birket, a former incumbent.

MARTINHOE, a parish in the hundred of SHERWILL, county of DEVON, 12 miles (E. by N.) from Ilfracombe, containing 204 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £8. 10. 10., and in the patronage of G. Courtenay, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Martin.

MARTINSCROFT, a joint township with Woolstone, in the parish of WARRINGTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Warrington. The population is returned with Woolstone.

MARTINSTHORPE, a parish in the hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Uppingham, containing 4 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £6. 0. 5. The Duke of Devonshire was patron in 1801. The church, which was dedicated to St. Martin, is now in ruins.

MARTLESHAM, a parish in the hundred of CARLFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Woodbridge, containing 413 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 18. 9. Mrs. Goodwin was patroness in 1798. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The navigable river Deben forms the eastern boundary of the parish.

MARTLEY, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, county of WORCESTER, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Worcester, containing, with the hamlet of Hillhampton, 1264 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £22. 10. T. B. Paget, Esq. was patron in 1795. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has lately received an addition of two hundred and one sittings, of which one hundred and fifty-one are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £100 towards defraying the expense.

MARTOCK, a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of MARTOCK, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Ilchester, and 130 (W.) from London, containing 2560 inhabitants. The name of this place is said to be derived from mart and oak, from the fact of the market having been formerly held under an oak-tree in the centre of the town, the site of which is now occupied by an elegant fluted column, in imitation of the pillar of Trajan, at Rome. The town consists principally of one street, about a mile and a half in length: the river Parret passes through it. The manufacture of fine gloves is carried on to a limited extent, but was formerly of greater note. There is a fair on the 21st of August. A court leet is held in October, by the lord of the manor. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Load, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £15. 10., endowed with £230 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Treasurer in the Cathedral Church of Wells. The church, which is dedicated to All Saints, is an elegant structure, in the ancient style of English architecture, with a fine embattled tower at the west end: in the interior is a superb altar-piece in stucco. There is a place of worship for Independents. A free grammar school was founded, in 1661, by William Strode, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £12, but the endowment being insufficient to support a classical master, it has been discontinued; a few poor children are, however, taught to read by the clerk of the parish, who resides in the school-house. The old Roman Fosseway skirts the south-east boundary of the parish.

MARTON, a township in the parish of WHITE-GATE, or NEW CHURCH, first division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Northwich, containing 582 inhabitants.

MARTON, a chapelry in the parish of PRESTBURY, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Congleton, containing 341 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty. D. Davenport, Esq. was patron in 1806. The chapel is a rude building of wood, with a chancel and spire of more modern date: it had formerly a chantry, which is said to have been founded in the reign of Edward III., by Sir J. Davenport and his son, of whom there are in the cemetery two recumbent figures in armour.

MARTON, a chapelry in the parish of POULTON, hundred of AMOUDERNESSE, county palatine of LANCASTER, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Kirkham, containing 1397 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £800 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £2200 parliamentary grant. J. Clifton, Esq. and others were patrons in 1814. A free school was founded in 1717, by James Baines, who endowed it with a messuage and lands producing £91 a year: a master and an assistant are elected annually, and the average number of scholars is about one hundred. There is also a Sunday school, attended by about eighty children, towards the support of which Margaret Whitam left an annuity of 40s.

MARTON, a parish in the wapentake of WELL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Gainsborough, containing 395 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Roman Tilbridge-lane passes through the parish, which is bounded on the west by the river Trent.

MARTON, a parish in the Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Southam, containing 317 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £7. 14. 8. T. W. Knightley, Esq. was patron in 1805. The church is dedicated to St. Esperit.

MARTON, a joint township with Sewerby, in the parish of BRIDLINGTON, wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, 2 miles (N. E.) from Bridlington. The population is returned with Sewerby. Here are vestiges of an ancient ravine, consisting of a double line of defence, with breast-works, extending one mile and a quarter from the southern shore of Flamborough-head: this immense work is ascribed to the Danes, and is therefore termed "Danes' Dike."

MARTON, a township in that part of the parish of SWINE which is in the middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Kingston upon Hull, containing 129 inhabitants. There is a Roman Catholic chapel.

VOL. III.

MARTON, a parish in the western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (N.) from Stokesley, containing 397 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 9., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church, dedicated to St. Cuthbert, is a small ancient edifice, situated on an eminence at the western end of the village. Captain James Cook, the great circumnavigator, was born here, of humble parents, October 27th, 1728; he was killed at Owhyhee on the 14th of February 1779.

MARTON, a township in that part of the parish of SINNINGTON which is in PICKERING lythe, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Pickering, containing 255 inhabitants.

MARTON, a joint parish with Grafton, partly within the liberty of St. PETER of YORK, but chiefly in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (S.) from Aldborough, containing 464 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Grafton, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £2. 19. $4\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. Various small sums, from a bequest by Nicholas Stowell, in 1597, and other subsequent donations, are applied to the instruction of poor children.

MARTON in the FOREST, a parish in the wapentake of BULMER, North riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Easingwold, containing, with the chapelry of Moxby, 164 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. A priory of Augustine canons and nuns, the latter of whom soon after removed to Moxby, was founded here, in honour of St. Mary, by Bertram de Bulmer, who lived in the reigns of Stephen and his successor, the revenue of which at the dissolution was £183. 2. 4. The nunnery at Moxby, which was erected before 1167, by Henry II., in honour of St. John, the Apostle and Evangelist, had at the dissolution a revenue of £32. 6. 2.

MARTON (LONG), a parish in East ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Appleby, containing 714 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £21. 15. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Earl of Thanet. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, is a large edifice. A commodious place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists was erected here in 1816. The village of Long Marton, one of the most considerable in the county, having been rebuilt within the last twenty years, presents an appearance of neatness and opulence. Marton House, a handsome stone edifice, situated at its northern extremity, is occupied by the principal agent to the London Lead Company, whose mining office is here. A trifling endowment left by Thomas Machel, and two annual donations by Miss Fearon and Mrs. Rippon, are applied in teaching poor children.

MARTON le MOOR, a chapelry in that part of the parish of TOPCLIFFE which is in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Boroughbridge, containing 201 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Topcliffe. There is a small endowment, the bequest of the Rev. Mr. Day, for the education of the poor.

2 M

MARWELL, or MEREWELL, a hamlet in the parish of CARISBROOKE, liberty of WEST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S.) from Newport. A college of four priests was founded here, by Henry de Blois, Bishop of Winchester, and augmented by two of his successors.

MARWOOD, a parish in the hundred of BRAUNTON, county of DEVON, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Barnstaple, containing 869 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £24. 8. $6\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, has an ancient wooden screen. There were formerly two chapels within the parish, one at Patsford, now converted into a cow-house, the other at Whitefield, of which only two pillars remain. Here is a school, endowed, in 1782, by the Rev. R. Harding, with about £10 per annum, and, in 1814, with £100 three per cents., by William Westacott. Judge Littleton is said to have been born at West Marwood.

MARWOOD, a township in that part of the parish of GAINFORD which is in the south-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Barnard-Castle, containing 212 inhabitants. Barnard castle and demesne are within this township; and on an eminence adjoining the town of Barnard-Castle, some vestiges of the ancient town of Marwood, once a considerable place, have been discovered; near the same spot is an old chapel, but divine service has not been performed in it for a great number of years.

MARY'S (ST.), a parish in the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, though locally in the hundred of New Church, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from New Romney, containing 103 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £23. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

MARY (ST.) in ARDEN, a parish partly in the hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, and partly in the hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, 1 mile (E) from Market-Harborough. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Leicester, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church College, Oxford.

MARY le BONE (ST.), a parish in the Holborn division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, forming an extensive suburb to the metropolis, and containing 96,040 inhabitants. This district, now covered with buildings of the first order, and inhabited by families of the highest rank, was formerly an obscure village in the vicinity of London, difficult of access, and containing only a few solitary houses, with a small church, approached by two irregular and inconvenient paths, leading from Vere-street and Tottenham Court-road. The adjoining fields were the lurking-place of robbers, and the church, in Bishop Braybrook's license for its removal, is described as being, from its lonely situation, exposed to continual depredation. From its situation near a bourne, called Aye brook, or Eye brook, and from its dedication to the Virgin, the parish was called St. Mary at Bourne: some, however, have deduced its etymology from St. Mary la bonne, but no sufficient reason can be adduced for its having been thus pre-eminently distinguished above various other places, the churches of which were dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and others ascribe the affix to the discovery of a prodigious quantity of human bones near the site in 1729, but this period is too recent to render the latter derivation probable. Mary le Bone park, now occupied by buildings, was an extensive tract, well stocked with deer, in which Queen Elizabeth entertained the Russian ambassador with the diversion of hunting: the ancient manor-house, in which the Harleian library was deposited previously to its removal to the British Museum, has been taken down, with the exception only of that part of the building containing the library, which is now a boarding-school for young ladies. Behind the old manor-house were Mary le Bone gardens, much frequented as a place of public entertainment in the reign of Queen Anne, the site of which is now occupied by Beaumont and Devonshire streets. On Conduit mead, now Stafford-place, was the banquet-hall used by the mayor and aldermen of the city of London, when they visited the conduits in this part of the parish, which supplied the city with water.

Among the earlier of the numerous and magnificent ranges of building which have been erected in this parish, are Cavendish-square, in the centre of which is a gilt equestrian statue of William, Duke of Cumberland, surrounded by several noble mansions; Manchester-square, a spacious area, the north side of which is occupied by a mansion formerly the town residence of the Duke of Manchester, afterwards that of the Spanish ambassador, and now the residence of the Marchioness of Hertford; Portman-square, of which the centre is beautifully laid out in plantations and walks, and the area surrounded by stately residences; Portland-place, a noble range of lofty and commodious mansions, four hundred and forty feet in length, and one hundred feet wide, opening at the northern extremity into Park-crescent, and commanding a beautiful view of the Regent's Park, bounded by the Hampstead and Highgate hills; Stafford-place, Cumberland-place, and various noble ranges of building, with numerous spacious streets leading from Oxford-street and the Edgware-road, and traversing the parish in all directions; among the principal of which may be noticed Upper and Lower Seymour-street, Wigmore and Mortimer streets, in one continued line; Berkeley-street (West), and Upper Berkeley-street, Great and Upper Mary le Bone streets, Harley-street, Wimpole-street, High-street, Orchard-street, Baker-street, Gloucester-place, York-place, and Upper Baker-street and place: the latter of these have, by a recent construction, been extended to the New road, which crosses the parish from east to west. Among the more recent additions are, Montagu and Bryanston squares, ranges of handsome building with gardens in the central part of the area; Blandford and Dorset squares, and the buildings in Lisson Grove and St. John's Wood, on the west; Osnaburgh-street and terrace, and Albany-street, on the east; on the south, the continuation of Regent-street, Langham-place, and Park-crescent, in front of which is a noble colonnade of duplicated columns of the Ionic order, divided into two quadrants by Portland-place, and ornamented with a bronze statue of the Duke of Kent, the area also being tastefully laid out as a shrubbery. Opposite this, on the other side of the New road, which is bordered by ranges of handsome buildings, are two avenues leading into the park, forming fine ranges of building, decorated with Ionic pillars and cornices, the eastern of which, including the Diorama, is the only range on this side of the park which is within the parish. To the west are, Ulster-terrace, a neat range of building, with a basement story of the Ionic order; York-terrace, divided into two corresponding ranges by York-place, forming an avenue into the park from Mary le Bone church, each range consisting of a basement of the Grecian Doric, from which rise six Ionic columns supporting a triangular pediment in the centre, and four Ionic pillars surmounted by a cornice at each extremity; Cornwall-terrace, an elegant pile of the Corinthian order, consisting of a centre and two wings, richly ornamented; Sussex-place, having also a central portico of six Corinthian columns supporting a triangular pediment, and connected with the wings by a range of duplicated columns of the Ionic order; Clarence-terrace, a noble range of building with a colonnade of the Corinthian order, rising from the balustrade of the basement story, and supporting an enriched cornice and balustrade in front of the attic, and connected with the wings by quadrants of the same order; the centre and the wings being surmounted by conical domes terminating in a point, and disposed in pairs; and Hanover-terrace, consisting of a centre with a portico of six, and two wings of four, fluted columns of the Doric order, supporting triangular pediments, of which the tympana are enriched with subjects in alto relievo, and surmounted by statues of the muses, finely sculptured on the apex, and at each extremity of the base.

The central area of the park is tastefully laid out in plantations, lawns, and pleasure grounds, interspersed with elegant villas embosomed in trees, and varied with beautiful sheets of water, in which are some islands of picturesque appearance: the western side commands a fine view of the Coliseum, which has an imposing grandeur of effect, of the handsome terraces on that side of the park which is without the parish, and of the chapel of St. Catherine's hospital, and other interesting objects: the inner circle, to which is a handsome entrance from York-terrace, by a stone bridge over the artificial water, is laid out in nursery grounds, round which is a pleasant circular promenade and drive for carriages: the outer circle forms a more extensive ride, including an area of more than four hundred and fifty acres, beautifully planted. On the north side are the Zoological gardens, an extensive tract of ground, elegantly laid out and arranged for the reception, classification, and exhibition of animals of every description from various parts of the globe, forming a rapidly-increasing collection of quadrupeds, birds, fishes, reptiles, and insects, classified with a view to promote the study of that important branch of natural history. His present Majesty, William IV., immediately after his accession to the throne, presented a considerable number of animals to the Society, which had been the private collection of George IV. In the intermediate space are St. John's Lodge, the elegant residence of the Marquis of Wellesley; the Holme; the South Villa; and the residence of the master of St. Catherine's hospital, Sir Herbert Taylor, which is in the early style of English architecture, corresponding with the adjacent hospital and chapel; and near St. John's Wood, the splendid villa of the Marquis of Hertford.

The Portman barracks, for the guards, in Portman-street, afford accommodation for five hundred men, with sufficient ground for drilling them. The bazaar in King-street and Baker-street, for the sale of horses, carriages, furniture, jewellery, and fancy articles by commission, is a most extensive establishment, containing stabling for three hundred horses, and galleries for five hundred carriages, which are constantly on sale: the gallery for the sale of fancy articles is four hundred feet in length, and divided into two ranges, on each side of which are the various stalls: the subscription-room, which is handsomely fitted up, is one hundred and thirteen feet in length, forty-five feet wide, and forty-five feet high, and, with four ante-rooms of corresponding embellishment, forms a suite for the exhibition of splendid furniture: the buildings occupy more than three acres of ground, and attached to them is a commodious riding-school of large dimensions. The Oxford-street bazaar, for the sale of fancy articles and the exhibition of panoramic views, is on a smaller scale: it has recently been rebuilt, having, not long after its original establishment, been destroyed by fire. The infirmary, exclusively for sick and lame horses, in Regent-street, near Langham-place, is a neat building, with a colonnade of the Grecian Doric order, and contains arrangements for the reception of from twenty to thirty horses. The London carriage repository, in Langham-place, is a capacious building, with a handsome stone front, in which upwards of three hundred carriages of all descriptions are constantly on sale. The streets are well paved, splendidly lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water by the West Middlesex and other companies. This parish is within the jurisdiction of the magistrates appointed under the police act for the metropolis, passed in the reign of George III., some of whom hold sessions every day, except Sundays, at the police-office, High-street, Mary le bone; and also in the jurisdiction of the county court of Middlesex, for the recovery of debts under 40s., under the act of parliament passed in the 23rd of George II.

The parish is divided into four separate districts: the livings are all rectories, not in charge, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of the Crown. The parochial church is a spacious and handsome structure, in the Grecian style of architecture, with a noble portico of the Corinthian order supporting a triangular pediment, and having at the angles of the building groups of Corinthian pillars, surmounted by a cornice and balustrade: from the lower part of the tower, which is square, rises a circular turret, surrounded by pillars of the Corinthian order, and surmounted by a dome supported on caryatides. The district church of St. Mary, Bryanston-square, is a spacious edifice of brick, with a handsome circular portico of the Ionic order, supporting a cornice and close balustrade, from which rises a circular tower, surrounded by pillars of the Composite order, and surmounted by a campanile turret and dome: it was erected in 1823, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £18,746. 3., and contains one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight sittings, of which one thousand three hundred are free. The district church in Langham-place, dedicated to All Souls, and containing one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one sittings, of which three hundred and twenty-two are free, was erected in 1823, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £17,633. 6. 2.: it is a handsome structure, with a circular range of twelve columns, of the Roman Ionic order, surrounding the base of the tower, and supporting a handsome cornice and balustrade, and surmounted by a circular range of Corinthian pillars, from within which rises a spire terminating in a point, of graceful form and beautiful proportion, but of which the effect is destroyed by the concealment of the base and a considerable portion of its elevation. The altar-piece is ornamented with a fine painting, by Westall, of Christ crowned with thorns. The district church of Christchurch, Stafford-street, containing one thousand eight hundred and forty-four sittings, of which nine hundred and thirty are free, was erected in 1824, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £17,872. 12.: it is a handsome edifice of brick ornamented with stone, with a portico of four Ionic columns supporting a triangular pediment, above which is a square tower, of which the sides are decorated with four Corinthian pillars supporting an entablature and cornice, surmounted by an open campanile turret and dome. The district church dedicated to the Holy Trinity, in Portland-road, was erected in 1827, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £21,525. 4., and contains two thousand and three sittings, of which seven hundred and forty-three are free: it is a neat edifice of brick ornamented with stone, having on each side a range of Ionic pillars supporting a cornice and balustrade, and at the west end an Ionic portico of four columns, above which is a square tower with duplicated Ionic pillars at the angles, surmounted by a small campanile turret surrounded by pillars of the Composite order supporting a conical dome. The old parish church in High-street is now a chapel of ease, as is also St. John's chapel at St. John's Wood, a handsome structure of brick, with a stone portico of four Ionic columns, supporting a triangular pediment, and surmounted by an open campanile turret: the livings are both perpetual curacies, the former in the patronage of the Rector, the latter in that of the Crown: attached to St. John's chapel is an extensive cemetery, and, in addition to the burying-ground of the former, are two capacious cemeteries belonging to the parish, in Paddington-street. The proprietary episcopal chapels are, Oxford chapel, in Vere-street; Portland-street chapel; Bentinck chapel, in Chapel-street, Lisson Grove; Wellbeck chapel, in Westmorland-street; Portman-street chapel; Quebec-street chapel; Margaret-street chapel; Brunswick chapel, in Upper Berkeley-street; Baker-street chapel; and Percy chapel, in Charlotte street. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyan, and Calvinistic Methodists, and for Seceders from the Scottish church; a chapel belonging to the Greek church; and a French, and a Spanish, Roman Catholic chapel.

The parochial school in High-street, for the maintenance, clothing, and instruction, of one hundred girls, was established in 1750, and is supported by subscription: a similar institution for one hundred boys has been recently discontinued. The Philological Society's school, in King-street, Bryanston-square, was established for the instruction of the children of clergymen, and naval and military officers. The central National school, in High-street, is supported by subscription, and is also endowed with a small sum vested in the funds: there are in this institution three hundred boys, and one hundred and fifty girls, of whom one hundred and twenty are clothed: the western district National school, in St. Mary's, Bryanston-square; and the eastern district school, near Langham-place, afford each the means of instruction to nearly four hundred children of both sexes, of whom, about seventy in each school are clothed: there are other schools, supported by the dissenting congregations in the parish. The schools of the Incorporated Society for clothing, maintaining, and educating, poor orphans of clergymen of the established church, were originally founded at Acton, and at Lisson Green, and continued there till 1812, when a spacious and handsome brick building was erected for that purpose at St. John's Wood, near the Regent's park, consisting of a centre containing a committee-room and a house for the master and mistress, and two wings, in the lower part of which are two school-rooms seventy feet in length, and on the upper story dormitories for the scholars: the boys' school, which occupies the north wing, is superintended by a master, who is a clergyman of the established church, and an assistant; and the girls' school by a mistress: to each, which are separate and distinct establishments, there is a matron, or house-keeper. There are at present in this institution from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and thirty children of both sexes: the boys are taught reading, writing, arithmetic, and Latin, and the girls receive an English education, and are instructed in needle-work; a considerable fund, arising from subscription, is appropriated to the apprenticing of the children on their leaving school. The workhouse is a most extensive building, containing every requisite accommodation for one thousand of the poor; and a school of industry, in which the children are taught the earlier parts of the trades to which they are placed out apprentices, with a fee from the parish funds.

Middlesex hospital, in Charles-street, is a spacious building of brick, for the reception of invalids and pregnant women: it is attended by physicians, surgeons, and other medical practitioners; forming a school of medicine and surgery, where lectures are read on the practice of medicine and surgery, and a gratuitous course of clinical lectures regularly delivered. The general lying-in dispensary, in Charlotte-street, Rathbone-place, was established in 1778, for the assistance of married women at their own habitations; and there is a general dispensary in Wellbeck-street. Queen Charlotte's lying-in hospital, Harcourt-street, Bryanston-square, was originally established, in 1752, at Bayswater, and removed to its present situation in 1809: it is under the direction of a committee, of which His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex is president; and is adapted to the reception of from twenty to thirty patients, who receive every necessary attention, and the best medical assistance. The asylum for the recovery of health, in Lisson Grove (North), was originally established in 1821, under the patronage of His present Majesty, whilst Duke of Clarence, and the Princess Augusta, for patients who are in circumstances to contribute towards the expense of their maintenance in the institution: the buildings comprise two separate houses, for the reception of male and female invalids, who are admitted on the recommendation of subscribers, receive medical attendance, and are lodged and boarded in the institution, for 17s. 6d. per week for adult males, 14s. for females, and 10s. 6d. for children: it is under the direction of a committee, of which the Duke of Cambridge is president; about twenty adults and ten children may be accommodated in this institution, which is supported by voluntary contributions. The western general dispensary, in Lisson Grove (South), was first established in 1830, for the visitation and relief of the sick poor in this part of the parish of Mary-le-bone, and the adjoining parish of Paddington, and for the reception of one or two casualty patients: it is supported by subscription, and is gratuitously visited by the most eminent of the faculty.

MARY (ST.) CHURCH, a parish in the hundred of HAYTOR, county of DEVON, 2 miles (N. W.) from Torbay, containing 1005 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £31. 11., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter. Elias Waymouth, in 1755, gave a rent-charge of £2 for teaching poor boys.

MARY (ST.) EXTRA, otherwise WESTON, a parish in that part of the hundred of BISHOP'S WALTHAM which is in the Portsdown division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, adjacent to the town of Southampton, containing 983 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £37. 5. 5., and endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty.

MARY (ST.) in the MARSH, a chapelry in the parish of NEWTON, hundred of WISBEACH, Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Wisbeach.

MARYPORT, a chapelry, market town, and seaport, in the parish of CROSS-CANNONBY, ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 30 miles (S. W. by W.) from Carlisle, and 309 $\frac{3}{4}$ (N. W. by N.) from London, containing 3514 inhabitants. This place, situated at the foot of the river Ellen, which intersects the town, was a very inconsiderable fishing-town, called Ellen-foot, and consisting only of a few small huts, previously to 1750, at which period the foundations of the present town and harbour were laid, by Humphrey Senhouse, Esq., the proprietor of the land, who bestowed upon it the present name of Maryport, in compliment to his lady. It is irregularly built, partly on the sea-shore, and partly on the cliff; the streets are spacious, and the atmosphere healthy: during the bathing-season it is resorted to by a few visitors, the adjacent sands affording great convenience for bathing. The subterraneous productions of the neighbourhood are coal, limestone, and red freestone, the export of which to Ireland, Scotland, and other places, constitutes the chief trade of the port, which possesses one hundred and thirty-four ships, and is a member of the port of Whitehaven. There are three yards for ship-building, and a patent slip; and many vessels of considerable burden have been built for the coasting and foreign trade, by means of which timber is imported from America and the West Indies, and iron and flax from the Baltic. A railway has been constructed for the more ready conveyance of the coal wagons to the harbour: adjoining the town is a large corn-mill. The manufactures consist chiefly of cotton and linen checks, sail-cloth, cables, coarse earthenware, leather, nails, and anchors. The herring fishery is productive, and considerable quantities of salmon trout are caught in the river. The principal market is on Friday, but not for corn; and there is likewise an inferior one on Tuesdays.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of H. Senhouse, Esq. The chapel, erected in 1760, and consecrated by Bishop Lytton, in 1763, is dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Baptists, Burghers, the Society of Friends, Presbyterians, and Wesleyan Methodists. A school, in which one hundred and fifty children are educated on the Madras system, is supported by subscription, each scholar paying one penny per week: the salary of the master is £40 per annum. A school of industry for twenty girls is supported by voluntary contributions. There are several other benevolent institutions for the benefit of the indigent poor. The remains of an important Roman station, with military roads leading to Moresby, Old Carlisle, and Ambleside, are visible on an eminence northward of the town, at the village of Ellenborough: they consist of a square area with double ditches, in which are four entrances: the numerous relics of antiquity discovered are altars, inscriptions, vases, and implements of various kinds, several of which are preserved in the adjoining grounds and mansion of Nether-hall. From this station a wall, extending to Workington, is said to have been constructed by the Romans, as a protection against the invasions of the Picts and Scots. In the southern part of the town is Mote hill, on which is an artificial moated mound, one hundred and sixty yards in circumference.

MARY-STOW, a parish in the hundred of LIFTON, county of DEVON, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Tavistock, containing 376 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage with the curacy of Thrushelton, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £12. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. H. H. Tremayne was patron in 1824. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has an ancient stone font and two stone stalls. On the manor of Sydenham is an old mansion, erected early in the seventeenth century, by Sir Thomas Wise, and garrisoned by some of the adherents of Charles I., from whom it was taken by Colonel Holbourn, in 1645: it is a large building, occupying three sides of a quadrangle.

MASHAM, a parish partly in the liberty of St. PETER of YORK, but chiefly in the eastern division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the market town of Masham, and the townships of Burton upon Ure, Ellingstring, Ellingtons, Fearby, Healey with Sutton, Ilton with Pott, and Swinton with Warthermask, and containing 2767 inhabitants, of which number, 1171 are in the town of Masham, 34 miles

(N. W. by W.) from York, and 223 (N. N. W.) from London. The town is very pleasantly situated upon a gentle eminence in a fertile district, on the western bank of the river Ure: the houses are well built, and the air is remarkably pure. The trade consists principally in the spinning of yarn, for which an extensive manufactory has of late been established, affording employment to about one hundred persons. There is a small market on Wednesday; and fairs are held on the 17th and 18th of September, for live stock. During the spring, a fair for cattle and sheep is held every alternate Monday. A court leet is held annually, at which a constable is chosen, its jurisdiction also extending to the recovery of debts under 40s. The living is a vicarage, with that of Kirkby-Malzeard, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Masham, or in that of the Dean and Chapter of York, being claimed by both, and the matter not yet decided; it is rated in the king's books at £30, and is in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. Masham was formerly a prebend, and the richest in the cathedral church of York, being rated in the king's books at £136: it was dissolved and made a lay-fee, by Archbishop Holgate, in 1546. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small but handsome edifice, in the English style of architecture, with a tower surmounted by a lofty and elegant spire. Over the organ gallery is a fine painting representing an angel praying before the cross of Christ. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Wesleyan Methodists. The grammar school, founded by William Danby, Esq., in 1760, is endowed with property producing about £50 per annum; there are about eighty boys, who are all stipendiary pupils: the master is also superintendent of a charity school, for thirty-six poor children, under the same foundation, endowed with about £24 per annum, from the benefactions of Oswald Coates, Isabel Beckwith, and Ann Danby. Two Sunday schools, in which two hundred and fifty children are instructed, are supported by subscription. This place was anciently the residence of the baronial family of Scroop, to which belonged Henry, Lord le Scroop, Lord Treasurer, and Archbishop Scroop, both beheaded for high treason in the reign of Henry IV.

MASHBURY, a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, 6 miles (N. W.) from Chelmsford, containing 85 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to that of Chignal St. James, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £9. 14. 7.

MASON, a township in the parish of PONTELAND, western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 6½ miles (N. N. W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 127 inhabitants.

MASSINGHAM (GREAT), a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, 9½ miles (N. by W.) from Swaffham, containing 738 inhabitants. The living consists of two consolidated rectories, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated jointly in the king's books at £33. 6. 8. The Marquis of Cholmondeley was patron in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. Mary; that of All Saints has been demolished. A free school here is endowed with a rent-charge of £20, by Charles Calthorpe. A priory of the order of St. Augustine, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Nicholas, was founded here before 1260, by Nicholas le Syre, the buildings of which having fallen to decay, and the estate wasted; in 1475, it was united to the priory of West-acre, and became a cell to that house.

MASSINGHAM (LITTLE), a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, 10½ miles (N. by W.) from Swaffham, containing 125 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 4. Joseph Wilson, Esq. was patron in 1820. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

MATCHING, a parish in the hundred of HARLOW, county of ESSEX, 3¼ miles (E. by N.) from Harlow, containing 599 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £12. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Trustees of Felstead school, on the nomination of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MATFEN (EAST), a township in the parish of STAMFORDHAM, north-eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8¾ miles (N. E. by E.) from Hexham, containing 152 inhabitants. This, probably, was formerly a place of some importance, foundations of buildings being still discernible.

MATFEN (WEST), a township in the parish of STAMFORDHAM, north-eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 9½ miles (N. E.) from Hexham, containing 307 inhabitants. On opening a tumulus, supposed to have been a Druidical mausoleum, coffins of four stones set edgeways, with stone bottoms and covers, were found, containing human ashes: near it was an upright stone pillar, called the Stob stone.

MATHERN, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, 3¼ miles (S. S. W.) from Chepstow, containing 374 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Caerwent, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £6. 3. 6½., and in the patronage of the Chapter of Llandaff. The church is dedicated to St. Theodorick. Charles Pratt, in 1724, bequeathed land, directing the income to be applied in teaching poor children to read. A house, called Monks' Court, is supposed to have been formerly a monastery.

MATHON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Ledbury, containing 633 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

MATLASK, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Holt, containing 184 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

MATLEY, a township in the parish of MOTTRAM in LONGDEN-DALE, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Stockport, containing 324 inhabitants.

MATLOCK, a parish in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, county of DERBY, $17\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Derby, containing 2920 inhabitants. This place, which is equally celebrated for the romantic beauty of its scenery, and the purity of its medicinal springs, was formerly called Mesterford, or Metesford, and consists at present of the village and baths, nearly a mile and a half distant from each other. The waters were first applied to medicinal uses about the end of the seventeenth century, prior to which period, the neighbourhood consisted only of a few rude dwellings inhabited by miners. The original bath of wood was rebuilt of stone by the Rev. Mr. Fern, of Matlock, and Mr. Hayward, of Cromford, who erected some small rooms adjoining it, for the accommodation of invalids: the lease of the buildings was afterwards purchased by Messrs. Smith and Pennell, of Nottingham, who erected two large and commodious houses with stabling, constructed a carriage-road by the side of the river from Cromford, and improved the horse-road from Matlock bridge. A second spring was afterwards discovered, at the distance of a quarter of a mile from the former, a new bath was formed, and additional lodging-houses built for the reception of visitors; and a third spring was opened, at a still later period, within four hundred yards of the first, which, after some difficulties in levelling the hill, in order to obtain the water, previously to its mixing with those of a cold spring, was rendered available to medicinal uses; and a third bath was constructed, and another hotel erected. These springs, which have a mean temperature of sixty-eight degrees of Fahrenheit, issue from an elevation of one hundred feet from the level of the river; at higher or lower points the springs are cold, and possess no medicinal properties. The water is found efficacious in glandular affections, rheumatism, biliary obstructions, incipient consumption, and in all complaints arising from relaxation of the muscular fibres. The usual time of bathing is before breakfast, and between breakfast and dinner; the water is taken internally, in gradually increased quantities: the season commences in April, and ends in November. The three principal hotels, which are all handsome stone buildings, and the lodging-houses, afford accommodation for about four or five hundred visitors: the museum is replete with the natural curiosities of the district, and with urns and vases formed of spar, marble, and alabaster, obtained in the county; and guides are constantly in attendance to conduct visitors through the several caverns in the vicinity.

Matlock Dale, in which the baths are situated, presents, in varying combination, the richest features of majestic grandeur and romantic beauty. The river Derwent, for nearly three miles, pursues its course through the windings of the vale, in some places expanding into a broad lake, from the surface of which are reflected the luxuriant foliage of the woods, and the towering precipices which overhang its banks, and in others rushing with impetuosity through the rugged masses of projecting rocks which contract its channel, forming a variety of beautiful cascades. The High Tor, arising perpendicularly from the river to the height of four hundred feet, is a prominent feature in the scenery of the dale; and on the opposite bank is Masson hill, from the summit of which, called the Heights of Abraham, to which a winding ascent has been recently made, there is an extensive and most interesting view of the magnificent scenery of the dale. Walks have been cut through the woods, in various directions, leading to different points of view, from which the dale is seen in all its variety of beauty; and on the summit of the rocks is a natural and lofty terrace, commanding an extensive prospect of the surrounding country. The village is romantically situated on the banks of the river Derwent, over which is a neat stone bridge forming the principal entrance: the houses, which are of stone, are irregularly built on the steep acclivity of a mountain, rising above each other in gradual succession from the base nearly to the summit. The lead mines were formerly worked to a great extent in the parish, but at present there are only a few in operation. The cotton manufacture was established here by the late Sir Richard Arkwright, who built a factory near the upper end of the dale, in which machinery of a very complicated description is employed with success, in the production of cotton. The market, chiefly for provisions, is well supplied: the fairs are February 25th, April 2nd, May 9th, and October 24th, for cattle, sheep, and swine. The parish is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £11. 2. 6., and in the patronage of the Dean of Lincoln. The church, dedicated to St. Giles, and situated on the summit of a rock, is a small edifice, chiefly in the later style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Independents. The free school was founded, in 1647, by Mr. George Spateman, who endowed it with £80, to which, in 1668, Mr. Anthony Wolley added land producing £5 per annum: the present income is about £45 per annum, and the school is open to all children of the parish, who are instructed in reading, writing, and accounts. There are some charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. On Riber hill, near the church, are the Hirst stones, probably the remains of a cromlech, consisting of four rude masses of grit-stone, one of which, supposed to weigh about two tons, is placed on the others, and has in the centre a hole six inches deep and nine inches in diameter, in which was formerly a stone pillar.

MATSON, a parish in the middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Gloucester, containing 35 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £3. 16. 5½., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The manor-house was built by Sir Ambrose Willoughby, Knt., in the reign of Elizabeth, and during the siege of Gloucester became the head-quarters of Charles I.

MATTERDALE, a chapelry in the parish of GREYSTOCK, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Keswick, containing 299 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Greystock. The chapel was erected in 1685. Robert Grisdale, in 1722, built a school-house, and endowed it with about £12. 12. a year towards the education of poor children.

MATTERSEY, a parish in the Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Bawtry, containing 426 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The river Idle runs through the parish, and is crossed at the village by a handsome stone bridge. Edmund Nettlehip, in 1742, founded a free school for seven poor boys, and endowed it with £140, since vested in lands, and producing about £9 per annum. A priory of Gilbertine canons, dedicated to St. Helen, was founded here before 1192, by Roger de Maresay, which at the dissolution had a revenue of £61. 17. 7.

MATTINGLEY, a chapelry in the parish of HECKFIELD, hundred of HOLDSHOTT, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Hartford-Bridge, containing, with the tything of Hazely Heath, 513 inhabitants.

MATTISHALL, a parish in the hundred of MITFORD, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from East Dereham, containing 930 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Pattesley, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 7. $3\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Caius College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MATTISHALL (BURGH), county of NORFOLK.—See BURGH-MATTISHALL.

MAUGHAN'S (ST.), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of SKENFRETH, county of MONMOUTH, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Monmouth, containing 141 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llangattock-Vibon-Avell, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff.

MAULDEN, a parish in the hundred of REDBORNESTOKE, county of BEDFORD, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Ampthill, containing 1017 inhabitants. The living is a rectory in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £15. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Ailesbury. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the later style of English architecture, and has lately received an addition of one hundred and ten free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £30 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Sundry benefactions have been made for the instruction of children, producing £8. 10. a year, which is paid to the master of a Sunday school.

MAUNBY, a township in that part of the parish of KIRBY-WISK which is in the eastern division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (S. by W.) from North-Allerton, containing 206 inhabitants.

MAUTBY, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of FLEGG, county of NORFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Caistor, containing 78 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Robert Fellowes, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

MAWDESLEY, a township in the parish of CROSTON, hundred of LEYLAND, county palatine of LANCASTER, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Chorley, containing 833 inhabitants. A school, which has been erected on the waste by subscription, is endowed with a trifling sum by Thomas Cook, for a master to teach fifteen children to read.

MAWES (ST.), a borough, small sea-port, and market town, in the parish of ST. JUST in ROSELAND, western division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, 3 miles (E.) from Falmouth, 51 (S. W.) from Launceston, and 265 (S. W. by W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. The name of this town, derived from its patron saint, is, by Leland, attributed to Mauduit, or Machutus, a Welchman; but others, with more probability, consider it to be a corruption of St. Mary's, and, indeed, the town is called St. Mawes, alias St. Mary's, in various ancient records, probably as having belonged to the priory of St. Mary, at Plympton. A castle was erected here, in 1542, by Henry VIII., during the war with France, as a protection to Falmouth harbour: at the dissolution, this fortress, with the lands which had belonged to the priory at Plympton, became the property of the Vyvyan family, who possessed them for several generations. During the civil commotions in the time of Charles I., it fell into the hands of Fairfax, and, at the Restoration, it was sold, with the annexed estate, by Sir Viel Vyvyan to John, Earl of Bath. The castle is now in the custody of a governor, appointed by the king; and the estate is held in moieties by the Duke of Buckingham and James Buller, Esq. The town consists principally of one street, which fronts the sea, and lies at the foot of a hill rising somewhat abruptly from the vale: it is irregularly built, and is chiefly inhabited by fishermen and pilots; it is neither lighted nor regularly paved, but is well supplied with water. The castle stands at the north entrance of the harbour, opposite to that of Pendennis; and there is an open battery below, near the blockhouse. The only branch of manufacture in the town is that of cables, ropes, &c., for small craft. The pilchard fishery, although on the decline, is the principal source of occupation: fourteen thousand hogsheads of pilchards have been exported from St. Mawes and Falmouth, of which port this is a member, in one season. A small market for butchers' meat is held on Friday. A portreeve, commonly called mayor, is presented by a jury at the court leet of the manor, held in October, in the town hall. St. Mawes first sent members to parliament in 1562: the right of election is vested in the resident freemen, and in the freeholders within the borough and manor, resident and non-resident, who, as well as the freemen, must be presented and admitted at the manor court; the number of voters is about twenty-five, and the portreeve is the returning officer: the influence of the Duke of Buckingham is predominant: the elections are always held on the quay, which has been recently repaved. The borough and manor extends over the whole creek and harbour; the lord is entitled to certain duties for anchorage, bushelage, &c., and to the possession of wrecks. A chapel, erected at the expense of the late Marquis of Buckingham, was completed in July, 1812, but has not been endowed or consecrated: it was used for divine service a few years only, and is now appropriated as a school for boys of the town, supported by the Duke of Buckingham, who allows the master a salary of £40 per annum: another school for boys is supported by voluntary contributions. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. In this parish are the remains of a chapel, attached to the barton of Roscassa, now a farm-house.

MAWGAN in MENEAGE, a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Helston, containing 1050 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of St. Martin, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £35. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$. Sir M. Blakiston, Bart. and others were patrons in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. Mogun. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MAWGAN in PYDER, a parish in the hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from St. Columb-Major, containing 580 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £26. 13. 4. The Rev. Philip Carlyon was patron in 1806. The church is an ancient fabric, containing some curious monumental brasses of the Arundels, and a richly-carved screen, separating the nave from the chancel. In the churchyard is a fine old sculptured cross with a niche, representing in high relief the Crucifixion, with other figures, probably taken from some ancient legend, and bearing the inscription Cnegumi fil Enans, in characters of the ninth century. Lanherne house, long the principal residence of the Lords Arundel, was fitted up by his late lordship as an asylum for a convent of Carmelite nuns, who emigrated from Antwerp, and by whom it is still occupied: it contains a neat chapel, adorned with a few good paintings brought over by the nuns. The parish is bounded on the west by the Bristol channel, and has a small harbour, called Mawgan Porth.

MAWNAN, a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Falmouth, containing 536 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £14. 16. 3., and in the patronage of John Rogers, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mawnan. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parish is bounded on the south-east by the English channel, where are two small open bays, called Prisk and Bream bays, and on the south is Helford river, an arm of the sea about a mile wide. A day school for poor children is principally supported by voluntary contributions.

MAWTHORPE, a township in the parish of WELL, Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Alford. The population is returned with the parish.

VOL. III.

MAXEY, a parish in the liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. S. W.) from Market-Deeping, containing, with the hamlet of Deeping-Gate, 544 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Peterborough. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally Norman, with portions in the decorated and later English styles. In this parish are Lolham bridges, which are of great antiquity, having been constructed by the Romans, to conduct the Ermin-street over the low grounds adjoining the river Welland.

MAXSTOKE, a parish in the Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Coleshill, containing 364 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Chandos Leigh, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The parish is bounded on the west and south by the river Blythe. The castle, formerly belonging to the De Clintons, and then to Humphrey Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, who richly covered the gates with iron, is still in perfect repair; and there are extensive remains of a priory of Augustine canons, founded, in 1336, by Sir William de Clinton, Earl of Huntingdon, which was dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. Michael, and All Saints, and at the dissolution had a revenue of £129. 11. 8.

MAYFIELD, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, comprising the chapelry of Butterson, and part of that of Calton, and the townships of Mayfield and Woodhouses, and containing 1435 inhabitants, of which number, 890 are in the township of Mayfield, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Ashbourn. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., and in the patronage of William Greaves, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a handsome structure, having a lofty tower crowned with pinnacles, and bearing the date 1616. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. On the banks of the Dove is an extensive cotton-factory, affording employment to upwards of two hundred persons. The village comprises several handsome houses, cottages, &c., scattered among well wooded and picturesque scenery, the beauty of which, added to the fertility of the soil, induced the Romans to select it for a settlement, a fact fully evinced by the discovery of Roman coins, arms, and other relics in the neighbourhood. Within the parish are two barrows, termed Harlow and Rowloo; vestiges of an ancient paved road were discovered in digging in a morass; and traces of an old fortification, at a place called Clines. At Hallsteads are observable considerable remains of a large moated residence, approached by an ancient bridge in fine preservation, though much obscured by foliage and overhanging rocks. Mayfield is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MAYFIELD, a parish in the hundred of LOXFELD-PELHAM, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Wadhurst, containing 2698 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £17. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Kirby. The church, dedicated to St. Dunstan, is a handsome structure in the later English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The river Rother runs through the parish, which contains iron-ore and some chalybeate springs, but the latter are neglected. A free school was founded and endowed by subscription among the inhabitants, in 1749, and several bequests having been since made, the annual income amounts to £40, which is paid for the instruction of about forty children in a National school established here, in which are about eighty others. Henry III. granted a charter for a market and two fairs to be held at Mayfield; the former has been long disused, the latter are on May 30th for pedlary, and November 13th for cattle and pedlary. There are fine remains of a mansion belonging to the Archbishops of Canterbury before the Reformation, consisting of the gatehouse, porter's lodge, a considerable portion of its magnificent hall, and a large room in that part of the building still habitable, termed Queen Elizabeth's room, which her Majesty occupied in 1573, during the entertainment given by Sir Thomas Gresham, then proprietor of the house, to the queen and her suite, in her progress through Kent. A great fire broke out at Mayfield, in 1389, which burned the church and the greater part of the village.

MAYLAND, a parish in the hundred of DENGIE, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Burnham, containing 218 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Governors of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London. The church is dedicated to St. Barnabas. Dr. John Gauden, successively Bishop of Exeter and Worcester, supposed by some the author of "Eikon Basilike," was born here in 1605; he died in 1662.

MEABURN (KING'S), a township in the parish of MORLAND, WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Appleby, containing 176 inhabitants.

MEARE, a parish in the hundred of GLASTON-TWELVE-HIDES, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Glastonbury, containing 1151 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £13. 2. 8., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of W. T. H. Phelps, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the early style of English architecture, with an embattled tower. Here are remains of encampments, of Danish origin, with a double ditch.

MEALRIGG, a joint township with Langrigg, in that part of the parish of BROOMFIELD which is in ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Wigton. The population is returned with Langrigg. Here is a spa, reputed to be of considerable efficacy.

MEARLEY, a township in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2 miles (S. E. by E.) from Clitheroe, containing 89 inhabitants.

MEASAND, a hamlet in the parish of BAMPTON, WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 4 miles (S. W.) from Bampton. The population is returned with the parish. A small stream, called Fordingdale beck, runs in the vicinity, and has several waterfalls in its course: on the east is Hawes-water lake. The free school was endowed, in 1713, by Richard Wright and Richard Lacy, with an estate producing about £40 per annum.

MEASHAM, a parish in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, though locally in the western division of the hundred of Goscote, county of Leicester, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Ashby de la Zouch, containing 1404 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Marquis of Hastings. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parish is almost surrounded by the river Mease, and the Ashby de la Zouch canal passes through the village.

MEAVY, a parish in the hundred of ROBOROUGH, county of DEVON, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Tavistock, containing 321 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 5., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. The village is situated on the river Mew, which winds through a valley of considerable beauty. Here are the remains of an old mansion, once the residence of the renowned Sir Francis Drake. Near the church is a hollow oak of very large dimensions, and adjoining it are the remains of a stone cross. The Plymouth railway passes through the parish.

MEDBOURNE, a parish in the hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Rockingham, containing, with the chapelry of Holt, 514 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £35. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Giles. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Sarah Moyses, in 1761, bequeathed £800; Thomas Hawkes, in 1785, left £200; and Robert Wade gave a rent-charge of £2; for teaching poor children, and providing them with books. In a field north-westward from the village are the remains of intrenchments, with foundations of buildings, covering a piece of ground about half a mile square. In 1721, a tessellated pavement was discovered, and other Roman remains have been dug up at different times.

MEDLAR, a joint township with Wesham, in the parish of KIRKHAM, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Kirkham, containing, with Wesham, 215 inhabitants.

MEDMENHAM, a parish in the hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Great Marlow, containing 369 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 7. 1. Robert Scott, Esq. was patron in 1801. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. An abbey for Cistercian monks was founded here by Hugh de Bolebec, as a cell to the monastery at Woburn, the revenue of which was valued at £20. 6. 2.: a very small portion of the conventual buildings remains; the site is partly occupied by a modern erection, in imitation of ruins, nearly overgrown with ivy. Above the village are vestiges of a large camp, nearly square, with a single vallum and ditch; the area comprises about seven acres. An ancient circular intrenchment in this parish is called Danesfield.

MEDOMSLEY, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LANCHESTER which is in the western division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 13 miles (N.W.) from Durham, containing 461 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, is in the early style of English architecture, with lancet windows. Christopher Hunter, M.D., physician and antiquary, was born here in 1675, and interred in Shotley church, in July 1757.

MEDSTED, a parish in the hundred of FAWLEY, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Alton, containing 394 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Old Alresford, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the incumbent, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. This parish is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

MEER, a parish in the county of the city of LINCOLN, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Lincoln. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Waddington, not rated in the king's books, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln. The church, which was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has fallen into ruins. Here was anciently a house for Knights Templars; also an hospital, in, or near, Dunston, founded, about 1246, by Simon de Roppele, which, at the suppression of similar establishments, was allowed to continue.

MEERBROOK, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LEEK which is in the northern division of the hundred of TORMONSLow, county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Leek, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Leek. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small edifice with a square tower. Twenty-eight children are educated for £12. 5. per annum, the proceeds of a bequest by John Stoddard, in 1673, and of another by Roger Morris. In the neighbourhood are the Leek rocks, stupendous overhanging masses, two miles in length, with scattered fragments at their bases and in other parts of the valley.

MEESDEN, a parish in the hundred of EDWINS-TREE, county of HERTFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Barkway, containing 164 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £12. 13. 4. The Rev. A. Gaussen was patron in 1819. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MEESON, a township in the parish of GREAT BOLAS, Newport division of the hundred of BRADFORD (South), county of SALOP, 5 miles (N.W. by W.) from Newport. The population is returned with the parish.

MEETH, a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Hatherleigh, containing 270 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 7. 6. The Rev. F. D. Lampriere was patron in 1824. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

MELAY, a joint township with Hayton, in the parish of ASPATRIA, ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Cockermouth. The population is returned with Hayton.

MELBECKS, a township in that part of the parish of GRINTON which is in the western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 14 miles (W. by S.) from Richmond, containing 1726 inhabitants.

MELBOURN, a parish in the hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Royston, containing 1179 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £19. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Ely. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. Here is a school for the instruction of children, with a small endowment, founded by the Rev. W. Ayloff. A fair is held on the first Wednesday in July.

MELBOURN, a parish in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, 7 miles (N.N.E.) from Ashby de la Zouch, containing 2027 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a fine specimen of Norman architecture, with round massive piers, circular arches, fine mouldings, and zigzag ornaments. There are places of worship for General Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists; the Society of Friends had a meeting-house here, which is now occupied as a school for the children of Swedenborgians. In 1738, Lady Eliz. Hastings bequeathed land, now producing £20 per annum, for the education of twelve poor children, who are taught by the master of the National school, which was erected in 1822, at an expense of more than £500, defrayed by the Rev. James Bagge and the National Society. Here was anciently a baronial castle, in which John, Duke of Bourbon, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, was confined for several years: it is said to have been dismantled, in 1460, by order of Queen Margaret, but it was afterwards repaired; scarcely any vestiges remain. Melbourn hall was formerly a palace belonging to the Bishops of Carlisle. The river Trent bounds the parish on the north. This parish is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. Melbourn gives the title of viscount to the family of Lamb.

MELBOURN, a township in that part of the parish of THORNTON which is in the Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Pocklington, containing 437 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MELBURY-ABBAS, a parish in that part of the hundred of SIXPENNY-HANDLEY which is in the Shaston (West) division of the county of DORSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E.) from Shaftesbury, containing 345 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £9. 18. 11½. Thomas Grove and W. Goodden, Esqrs. were patrons in 1794. Walter Blandford, D.D., Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards of Worcester, was a native of this place.

MELBURY-BUBB, a parish in the hundred of YETMINSTER, Sherborne division of the county of DORSET, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.S.W.) from Sherborne, containing, with the chapelry of Woolcombe, 129 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £11. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Earl of Ilchester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is built of flint and stone, chiefly in the later style, with a tower on the south side, which forms a porch; there are some remains of ancient stained glass. Woolcombe chapel has been demolished. On an eminence, called Bubb down, was formerly a beacon.

MELBURY-OSMOND, a parish in the hundred of YETMINSTER, Sherborne division of the county of DORSET, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Sherborne, containing 319 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with which that of Melbury-Sampford was united in 1750, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Earl of Ilchester. The church is dedicated to St. Osmond. A school for the instruction of poor children has an income of £15 per annum, the bequest of Mrs. Susannah Strangeways Horner, in 1754.

MELBURY-SAMPFORD, a parish in the hundred of TOLLERFORD, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Beaminster, containing 78 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united in 1750 to that of Melbury-Osmond, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 5½., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The church is an ancient structure, and contains several monuments to the Strangeways family.

MELCHBOURN, a parish in the hundred of STODDEN, county of BEDFORD, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.S.E.) from Higham-Ferrers, containing 244 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of Lord St. John. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains several ancient monuments and brasses. Here was a preceptory of Knights Hospitallers, the revenue of which was valued at £241. 9. 10.; after the dissolution it was granted by Queen Elizabeth to the first Earl of Bedford: to this preceptory a market and a fair were granted, in 1264. Leland, the historian and antiquary, was a native of this place.

MELCHET-PARK, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of ALDERBURY, county of WILTS, containing 9 inhabitants.

MELCOMBE-HORSEY, a parish in the hundred of WHITEWAY, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Blandford-Forum, containing 153 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £16. Lord Rivers was patron in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. In the vicinity are the remains of the hamlet of Melcombe-Bingham, consisting only of foundations of houses. On an eminence, called Nettlecombe Tout, is a square encampment, occupying a space of twenty acres.

MELCOMBE-REGIS, county of DORSET.—See WEYMOUTH.

MELDON, a parish in the western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Morpeth, containing 156 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £4. 7. 11., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham. The church is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist.

MELDRETH, a parish in the hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Royston, containing 643 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £4. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Ely. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

MELFORD (LONG), a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of BABERGH, county of SUFFOLK, 22 miles (W.) from Ipswich, and $58\frac{1}{4}$ (N.E. by N.) from London, containing 2288 inhabitants. This village is situated on a branch of the river Stour, in one of the most fertile parts of the county, and is surrounded by very beautiful scenery: silk-weaving is carried on to a limited extent. A large fair for cattle is held on the Thursday in Whitsun-week. A court baron is held annually by the lord of the manor, and petty sessions every fortnight by the county magistrates. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £28. 2. 6. The Executors of the Rev. J. Leroo were patrons in 1819. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, presents a fine specimen of the later style of English architecture; the tower is of more modern date: in the interior are several handsome monuments, especially one to the memory of Sir William Cordell, Knt., speaker of the House of Commons, and privy councillor, in the reign of Mary, and Master of the Rolls under Elizabeth. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A school for twelve boys is endowed with about £12 per annum, from a benefaction by John Hill, in 1495, and £2. 8. 1. payable out of the Exchequer, under a grant of Edward VI.; and a school for ten boys and ten girls is endowed with £9 per annum, arising from a bequest by John Moore, in 1713. An hospital, for a warden, twelve poor men, and two poor women, being decayed housekeepers of Melford, was founded, under the authority of letters patent in 1580, by Sir W. Cordell, and endowed with an estate in land, now producing a very considerable income: it is subject to the visitation of the Bishop of Norwich.

MELKRIDGE, a township in the parish of HALTWHISTLE, western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Haltwhistle, containing 288 inhabitants. In this township is Whitcheater, a Roman military station; the site is defended on three sides by steep glens.

MELKSHAM, a market town and parish in the hundred of MELKSHAM, county of WILTS, 28 miles (N.W.) from Salisbury, and 95 (W. by S.) from London, containing, with the chapelry of Seend, 5776 inhabitants. The name is supposed to be derived from Milch, or Melch, milk, and Haur, a dwelling, the adjacent land being chiefly occupied as dairy farms. During the Saxon era this was a place of some importance: at the period of the Norman survey, and for several subsequent reigns, it was held in royal demesne, and gave name to an extensive forest: in the reign of Henry VIII. it had fallen into decay, but during the last century experienced a revival from its cloth manufacture. The town, situated on the great road from London through Devizes to Bath, and on the banks of the Avon, consists principally of one street nearly a mile in length, which is paved and lighted with gas: the houses are in general good, and built of freestone, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. Two mineral springs, one saline and the other chalybeate, were discovered in the vicinity, some years ago; and, in 1816, a new saline spa was formed, by boring to a depth of more than three hundred and fifty feet, to which a pump-room, and hot and cold baths, with every requisite accommodation, have been added: these buildings form the centre of a handsome crescent, with a viranda in front, and near them is an agreeable promenade: the surrounding country abounds with diversified and pleasing prospects. The chalybeate spring, which is contiguous to the old spa, yields about eight hundred gallons per day, and is in its qualities similar to the waters of Tonbridge and Bath. The saline aperient is highly recommended, both for external and internal use, in scrofulous and scorbutic diseases. There is a convenient reading-room, also a circulating library. The business of the town formerly consisted in the manufacture of broad cloth and kerseymere, of which it was once the principal seat, but this is now on the decline: there is some business done in malt and leather. The Wilts and Berks canal passes on the east, and about a mile and a half southward joins the Kennet and Avon canal. The river Avon passes through the town, and is crossed by a handsome stone bridge of four arches, with light and elegant balustrades: adjoining it is one of the largest corn-mills in the county, and contiguous are an extensive factory and dye-houses. The market is held every alternate Monday, for cattle, sheep, pigs, &c.; and there is a cattle fair on the 27th of July. The county magistrates hold here a petty session for the division, on the last Wednesday in every month; a court leet is held half-yearly by the joint lords of the manor; and a court of requests, under an act of the 47th of George III., for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, is held once in three weeks, on Tuesday, alternately with Bradford and Trowbridge. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £38. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a spacious cruciform structure of freestone, with a handsome tower rising from the intersection: part of the building is of the period of the twelfth century, and the whole is crowned with battlements and pinnacles; in the interior, on the south side, are two chantry chapels. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. In 1750, the Rev. Bohun Fox bequeathed £135 for instructing and partly clothing poor children. A Lancasterian school, established in 1829, is supported by voluntary contributions: about two hundred and forty children of both sexes are instructed.

MELLING, a parish in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the chapelries of Arkholme and Hornby, the townships of Farleton, Melling with Wrattton, Roburndale, Wennington, and Wray, and the hamlet of Ca-wood, and containing 2340 inhabitants, of which number, 210 are in the township of Melling with Wrattton, 6 miles (S. by W.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £7. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. A school-room, in which the children of this township are taught gratuitously, was built by subscription, and has a permanent income of £12 per annum, the proceeds of bequests, in 1759, by Rebecca Bland, and in 1770, by William Gillison, for educating and apprenticing children.

MELLING, a chapelry in the parish of HALSALL, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.S.W.) from Ormskirk, containing 528 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant. The Earl of Lonsdale was patron in 1796. The chapel is dedicated to Holy Rood. A school was founded by the lords of Melling, with a residence for the master, about 1700, to which, in 1709, Edward Smith bequeathed the residue of his personal estate, and in 1712, John Tatlock gave £20; there are about twenty-five free scholars, and the master's income is £25 per annum.

MELLION (ST.), a parish in the middle division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.E. by S.) from Callington, containing 321 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £11. 12. 6., and in the patronage of J. T. Coryton, Esq. The river Lynner runs through the parish.

MELLIS, a parish in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Eye, containing 447 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 15., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MELLONS (ST.), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WENTLOOG, county of MONMOUTH,

$3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Cardiff, containing 551 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Llandaff.

MELLOR, a chapelry in the parish of GLOSSOP, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, comprising the townships of Mellor and Ludworth, and the hamlet of Whittle, and containing 4872 inhabitants, of which number, 2099 are in the township of Mellor, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chapel en le Frith. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £400 private benefaction and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late John Thornton, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas, is very ancient; the pulpit is carved out of an old oak tree, and the font is also rudely carved. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, and at Marple Bridge one for Independents. A free school was built about 1639, and endowed with £160 bequeathed by Thomas Walklate, to which some trifling augmentations have been made by subsequent benefactors: the income is £25 per annum, and all the children of the chapelry who apply are educated at a small charge. Here are extensive cotton works, which afford employment to a considerable portion of the inhabitants.

MELLOR, a chapelry in the parish, and lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from Blackburn, containing 1981 inhabitants. On Mellor moor are the remains of a Roman encampment.

MELLS, a parish in the hundred of MELLE and LEIGH, county of SOMERSET, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Frome, containing 1147 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Leigh upon Mendip, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £33. 16. 8. T. S. Horner, Esq. was patron in 1824. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There are extensive coal-works, and iron-manufactories, principally for agricultural implements, in this parish. Two fairs are held annually, on the Monday after Trinity week, and on Michaelmas day. The Frome here flows between rocks that rear their summits to a great height, somewhat resembling St. Vincent's rock below Bristol.

MELLS, a hamlet in the parish of WENHASTON, hundred of BLYTHING, county of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. S. E.) from Halesworth. The population is returned with the parish. In this hamlet there was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Margaret, but it is now in ruins.

MELMERBY, a parish in LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Penrith, containing 250 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £12. 11. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Mrs. Pattenson. The church, built of red freestone, is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. This place had anciently a market and a fair: a feast is held annually on Old Midsummer-day. In the parish are two springs, one sulphureous, and the other chalybeate. There are extensive strata of limestone, and some freestone, and a lead-mine has been worked some years, but it is not very productive. The Roman road called the Maiden way is visible here; its width is twenty-one feet. On the eastern side of the parish is Hartside Fell, a lofty mountain rising one thousand three hundred and twelve feet above the village, over which passes a new road from Alston to Penrith. The Helm winds blow here with great violence.

MELMERBY, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WATH which is in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Ripon, containing 258 inhabitants.

MELMERBY, a township in the parish of COVERHAM, western division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Middleham, containing 112 inhabitants.

MELPLASH, a tything in the parish of NETHERBURY, hundred of BEAMINSTER-FORUM and REDHONE, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Beaminster. The population is returned with the parish.

MELSONBY, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Richmond, containing 440 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £10. 2. 11., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of University College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. James. In 1757, William Cockin bequeathed an estate for the instruction of poor children: the annual profits are £26, for which eight children are instructed.

MELTHAM, a chapelry in the parish of ALMONDBURY, upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Huddersfield, containing 2000 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The manufacture of woollen and cotton goods is carried on here. A school-room was built by subscription, about six years ago; the master receives the interest of £20, the bequest of Matthew Lockwood in 1715; there are no free scholars.

MELTHWAITE, a joint township with Santon, in the parish of IRTON, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Ravenglass. The population is returned with Santon.

MELTON, a parish in the hundred of WILFORD, county of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Woodbridge, containing 607 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Ely. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. What was formerly the House of Industry for the hundred of Wilford is in this parish; it has been converted into a county lunatic asylum. There are a large iron-foundry and an extensive building establishment in the parish. The river Deben is navigable on the south-east, where it is crossed by Wilford bridge.

MELTON, a chapelry in the parish of WELTON, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, East riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from South Cave, containing 107 inhabitants.

MELTON (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of HUMBLEYARD, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Norwich, containing 386 inhabitants. The living comprises the united rectories of All Saints and St. Mary the Virgin, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, each rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Caius College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to the Virgin Mary: the tower was built in 1440. The old church of All Saints, which stood in the same churchyard, was taken down in the 12th year of the reign of Queen Anne.

MELTON (HIGH), a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Doncaster, containing 137 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £600 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. R. F. Wilson, Esq. was patron in 1826. The church is dedicated to St. James. There is a place of worship for Independents.

MELTON (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of HUMBLEYARD, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Norwich, containing 210 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Emanuel College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MELTON-CONSTABLE, a parish in the hundred of HOLT, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Holt, containing, with Little Burgh, 111 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with Little Burgh, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of Sir Jacob Astley, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. This parish is said to derive its name from the office of constable having been bestowed on the family of De Mealton by the Conqueror.

MELTON-MOWBRAY, a market town and parish, in the hundred of FRAMLAND, county of LEICESTER, 15 miles (N. E.) from Leicester, and 105 (N. W.) from London, containing, with the chapelry of Freeby and the township of Welby, 2990 inhabitants. The ancient name of this place was Medeltune, which has been gradually contracted to Melton, indicating the situation of the town in the middle of the five hamlets which compose the parish; the adjunct is the name of its ancient lords, which they assumed by command of Henry I. During the civil commotion in the time of Charles I., a severe action took place in this neighbourhood, between the royalists and the parliamentary troops, in February, 1644, when the forces of the latter, consisting of about two thousand men, were routed with great slaughter. The town sustained considerable damage by fire in 1613, and in 1637 the plague raged here with great violence. It is situated on the direct road from London to Leeds, in a valley on the little river Eye, and is small but neatly built: the streets are paved, watched, and lighted, the expense being defrayed out of the rental of the Town Estate, consisting of property in land, anciently the gift of some unknown benefactor, which produces nearly £800 per annum, and is under the management of a committee of twenty-one, and two wardens, chosen annually by the inhabitants: the first fifty lamps were given by Lord Harborough, in the year 1790. There is a good supply of water: the Eye and the little brook Scalford are crossed by three bridges, one of which, at the extremity of the town, leading to Oakham, was rebuilt in 1820. Here is a building fourteen feet in diameter, called the Manor oven, in which, in the time of Sir Matthew Lambe, an attempt was made, on the plea of feudal right, to compel the inhabitants to bake their bread; but they having resisted the claim, constructed for themselves another oven of larger dimensions. The principal attraction of Melton, and one great cause of its increasing improvement as a town, may be referred to the celebrated hunt to which it gives name: the season commences in November, and continues about five months, during which there is an influx of sportsmen from all parts of the kingdom, and there is stabling for nearly seven hundred horses. Here is a permanent subscription library and news-room. The principal article of manufacture is bobbin net-lace, and there is a minor one of worsted hosiery. The general traffic has been facilitated, especially in the supply of coal, by opening a navigable communication with Loughborough, called the Melton-Mowbray and Oakham canal, which was effected in 1790, and which, near the town, is intersected by the river Wreak. The market is on Tuesday, and on every alternate day there is a large shew of cattle. Fairs are held on the Monday and Tuesday after January 17th, March 13th, May 4th, Whit-Tuesday, August 21st, and September 7th, principally for horses, cattle, and sheep. A court leet and baron, for the recovery of debts under 40s., is held every three weeks.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £16. 8. 9., and in the patronage of Peter Godfrey, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious, lofty, cruciform structure; the tower, which rises from the intersection, is partly in the early style of English architecture, and at the west end is a handsome entrance porch; the nave is separated from the aisles by six high pointed arches on each side, springing from clustered columns. In the reign of Elizabeth, the church was considerably heightened, and a series of elegant windows was put up over the aisles: in 1736, the south and north-east pinnacles being struck by lightning, precipitated fragments of five or six hundred weight through the north transept: the edifice is at present undergoing a thorough repair, and the work is executed in perfect accordance with the original style of the building. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. Schools appear to have been established here at a very early period, and are noticed as existing previously to 1347, when they were taken under the patronage of Edward III., as possessor of the temporalities of the priory of Lewes. Two schools are at present maintained from the town estate; the National, or lower, school, open to all children of the town above six years of age, free of expense, who are removed, at the discretion of a committee, to the upper school, which is limited to forty-four boys, the number in both schools being about three hundred: there are two exhibitions from this school, conjointly with another at Leicester, to Lincoln College, Oxford. An hospital was founded in 1638, by Robert Hudson, Esq., for six unmarried men, who were to receive £13 per annum each, by quarterly payments: it has been recently rebuilt and enlarged for the additional accommodation of six poor women, who are maintained from a benefaction made by the Rev. Henry Storer, of Frisby, in 1620, for the benefit of the poor, and now producing yearly £27. 10. In 1756, Mr. John Bourne bequeathed £300, directing the interest to be applied to the support of three unmarried poor inhabitants of Melton, and legally settled there, of the age of sixty years. John de Kirkeby, Bishop of Ely in 1286, and founder of Ely palace, Holborn; Archbishop William de Melton, who attained the dignity of Lord High Chancellor of England in the reign of Edward III.; and the talented, but eccentric, John Henley, who, under the popular appellation of Orator Henley, acquired considerable notoriety about the middle of the last century, were natives of this place: Henley was educated at the free school and the Archbishop was buried in the church.

MELTON-ROSS, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 5½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Glandford-Bridge, containing 126 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Præbendary of Melton Ross with Scamblesby in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln.

MELTONBY, a township in the parish of Pocklington, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, 2¼ miles (N. by W.) from Pocklington, containing 78 inhabitants.

MELVERLEY, a parish in the hundred of OSWESTRY, county of SALOP, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Shrewsbury, containing 225 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, and in the patronage of the Rector of Llandrinio. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

MEMBURY, a parish in the hundred of AXMINSTER, county of DEVON, 3½ miles (N. N. W.) from Axminster, containing 837 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Axminster, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, contains a monument to the memory of Sir S. Calmady, who was mortally wounded at the siege of Ford House during the great civil war; likewise a monumental effigy of a lady. A cattle fair is held on the 10th of August. In the neighbourhood is an ancient encampment, formed by a single vallum, enclosing two acres.

MENDHAM, a parish partly in the hundred of EARSHAM, county of NORFOLK, but chiefly in the hundred of HOXNE, county of SUFFOLK, 1½ mile (E. by S.) from Harleston, containing 835 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5. 5. 2½., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant. Mrs. Whitaker was patroness in 1788. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. At Bruninghurst, in this parish, a Cluniac priory, subordinate to Castleacre in Norfolk, was founded by William, son of Roger de Huntingfield, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary: there are extensive remains of the conventual buildings.

MENDLESHAM, a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, 15½ miles (N. N. W.) from Ipswich, and 79 (N. E.) from London, containing 1250 inhabitants. The town is situated in a deep miry soil, and consists of two long and irregular streets; the houses are of mean appearance, and the adjacent roads in bad condition. A market was granted in the reign of Edward I., but has been long disused. A fair is held on the 2nd of October and the following day, for cattle and toys. Two constables are elected at the manorial courts. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £14. 9. 2., and in the patronage of the Rev. Robert Field. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In 1473, Robert Lake bequeathed, for charitable purposes, property in land, which, with other benefactions, produces about £350 per annum, from which £20 per annum is paid for the support of a charity school for fifteen poor children; £20 per annum for the maintenance of a Sunday school; and nearly £200 per annum is distributed by the trustees in weekly gratuities to the necessitous poor. There are six unendowed almshouses. About the close of the seventeenth century, an ancient silver crown, weighing sixty ounces, was found here; and, in 1758, a gold ring, bearing an inscription in Runic characters, was turned up by the plough: from these and other circumstances, Mendlesham is supposed to have been the residence of Redwald, one of the kings of the East Angles.

MENETHORPE, a township in the parish of WESTOW, wapentake of BUCKROSE, East riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from New Malton, containing 131 inhabitants.

MENHENIOT, a parish in the middle division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 2½ miles (E. S. E.) from Liskeard, containing 1170 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £21. 15. 5., and in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, Oxford, on the nomination of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. Neot. A school for the instruction of poor children was endowed with the interest of £42, by the Rev. Augustus Question, about 1753; with the interest of £25 by Mr. Snell; to which the Rev. William Holwell Carr, the present vicar, adds £20 per annum for the master's salary. Fairs for cattle and sheep are held April 23rd, June 11th, and July 28th. Within the parish, and near the town of Liskeard, was anciently an hospital for lepers, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. The scenery of this district is beautifully diversified with rock and wood. William of Wykham was vicar of this parish.

MENSTONE, a township in that part of the parish of OTLEY which is in the upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, West riding of the county of YORK, 2¾ miles (S. W. by W.) from Otley, containing 257 inhabitants.

MENTHORP, a joint township with Bowthorp, in the parish of HEMINGBROUGH, wapentake of OUZE and DERWENT, East riding of the county of YORK, 7½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Howden, containing, with Bowthorp, 49 inhabitants.

MENTMORE, a parish in the hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, comprising the township of Mentmore, and the hamlet of Ledburn, and containing 302 inhabitants, of which number, 137 are in the township of Mentmore, 4 miles (N.W.) from Ivinghoe. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 17. 1., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Charles Harcourt, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MENWITH, a joint township with Darley, in the parish of HAMPSTHWAITE, lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 11½ miles (W. by N.) from Knaresborough, containing, with Darley, 648 inhabitants. This township is within the peculiar ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the court for the Forest division of the honour of Knaresborough. In 1748 William Day gave land for the education of six poor children; the income is £47 per annum, and twelve are taught gratuitously.

MEOLS (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 9½ miles (N. N. W.) from Ormskirk, containing 2763 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., and in the patronage of Peter Hesketh, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. There is a place of worship for Independents. An ancient grammar school, endowed with £370, by means of various benefactions, is now consolidated with a National school, erected by subscription in 1827, on the site of the old school-room; sixty boys and eighty girls are educated gratuitously.

MEOLSE (GREAT), a township in the parish of WEST KIRBY, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 10¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Great Neston, containing 159 inhabitants.

MEOLSE (LITTLE), a township in the parish of WEST KIRBY, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 10 miles (N. W. by N.) from Great Neston, containing 131 inhabitants. This has lately risen into repute as a bathing-place. In 1690, the Duke of Schomberg encamped with his army at a place called the Mells, near Hyle lake, in this township, previously to his embarkation for Ireland.

MEON (EAST), a parish comprising the hamlet of Westbury with Peak, in the hundred of MEON-STOKE, Portsdown division, and the tythings of Bordean, Coombe, East Meon, Langrish, and Riplington, in the hundred of EAST MEON, Alton (South) division, of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4½ miles (W. by S.) from Petersfield, and containing 1336 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Froxfield and Steep, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £35. 1. 8. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a cruciform structure, with a Norman tower and western doorway, and containing a very ancient font, precisely similar to that in Winchester cathedral. There is a school with a small endowment. A fair for horses is held on the 19th of September. This parish is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

MEON (WEST), a parish in the hundred of FAWLEY, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 7½ miles (N. E.) from Bishop's Waltham, containing 747 inhabitants.

ants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Privett, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £30. 17. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church is a curious specimen of Norman architecture. There is a place of worship for Independents.

MEON-STOKE, a parish in the hundred of MEON-STOKE, Portsdown division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Bishop's Waltham, containing 368 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Soberton, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the incumbent, rated in the king's books at £46. 2. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MEOPHAM, a parish in the hundred of TOLTINGTROUGH, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 7½ miles (W. by S.) from Rochester, containing 833 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £16. 3. 4. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is in the decorated style of English architecture: it was built, in 1396, by Archbishop Courtenay, who likewise founded four almshouses near it for the poor.

MEPAL, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of WITCHFORD, Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 8 miles (W. by N.) from Ely, containing 406 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to the vicarage of Sutton, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Ely, rated in the king's books at £3. 6. 8. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MEPPERSHALL, a parish in the hundred of CLIFTON, county of BEDFORD, 1¾ mile (S.) from Shefford, containing 397 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £22, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. From thirty to forty children are educated by a schoolmistress for £15 per annum, arising from Emery's charity, at Ampthill. A small part of this parish is locally in a detached portion of the county of Hertford.

MERCASTON, a township in the parish of MUGGINTON, hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, 7½ miles (N. W.) from Derby, containing 166 inhabitants. At the Norman survey here was a church: many ancient coins have been found in the village.

MERE, a township in that part of the parish of ROSTERN which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 2½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Nether Knutsford, containing 566 inhabitants. Here is a small sum for the instruction of children.

MERE, a parish in the hundred of MERE, county of WILTS, comprising the market town of Mere, and the tythings of Woodlands with Chaddenwicke, and Zeals, and containing 2422 inhabitants, of which number, 1220 are in the town of Mere, 21½ miles (W. by N.) from Salisbury, and 102 (W. S. W.) from London. The name of this place is derived from the Saxon word Mæra, signifying bounds, or limits, and indicates its situation on the borders of the counties of Wilts, Somerset, and Dorset. In 1253, permission was granted by Henry III. to Richard, Earl of Cornwall, to build and fortify a castle on his manor of Mere, which manor has ever since been attached to the duchy of Cornwall.

In the 9th of Henry IV., a grant was made to Henry, Prince of Wales, as Duke of Cornwall, of a market and two annual fairs at this place. The town, situated on the high road from Salisbury to Wincanton, is small, and the buildings are irregular: the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The principal branch of manufacture is that of English dowlas and bed-ticking; there is likewise a silk-throwing mill. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held for corn and cattle on May 17th and October 10th. This town formerly sent members to parliament, but was disfranchised on the plea of poverty. Courts leet and baron are held, annually in October, for the duchy of Cornwall, and by the Dean of Salisbury, at which constables and tything-men are chosen for the town and hundred. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £28. 4. 2. The church, which is dedicated to St. Michael, is spacious and handsome, consisting of a nave, choir, and chancel, with a tower at the west end, surmounted by spires at the angles: on each side of the nave are five pointed arches, springing from light pillars, with clustered shafts; the cornice is enriched with sculpture in wood; a screen of open work separates the nave from the choir: on each side of the chancel is a sepulchral chapel, and in the belfry is a beautiful carved oak ceiling. There is a place of worship for Independents. A bequest of £10 per annum was made, about 1755, by Thomas Tatam, for the instruction of poor children. To the north-west of the town are vestiges of a Danish encampment, called "White-street camp," from the hill on which it was situated: the circumference of the outer ditch is four furlongs and one hundred and fifty-two yards. Francis, Lord Cottington, a celebrated statesman in the reign of Charles I.; and the Rev. Francis Potter, an ingenious mechanist, born about 1594, were natives of this place.

MEREVALE, a parish partly in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, and partly in the Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by S.) from Atherstone, containing 208 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the manorial court of Merevale, and in the patronage of D. S. Dugdale, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There are coal mines in the parish, which is bounded by the river Anker: the Coventry canal passes on the north-east side of it. An abbey for Cistercian monks, founded by Robert, Earl of Ferrars and Nottingham, about 1148, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, was valued at the dissolution at £303. 10.

MEREWORTH, a parish in the hundred of LITTFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 5 miles (S. E.) from Wrotham, containing 711 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £14. 2. 6., and in the patronage of Lord le Despencer. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, was rebuilt by John, Earl of Westmorland: it is a very handsome structure, with a fine Corinthian portico, and surmounted by a lofty spire: the whole edifice is constructed of different sorts of stone, and the eastern window is of painted glass, collected for the purpose by that nobleman. The grazing land in this parish is supposed to breed the largest oxen in England, some of them having exceeded three hundred stone. This parish is bounded on the north by the Hurst woods.

MERIDEN, a parish in the Solibull division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Coventry, containing 927 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. The Earl of Aylesford was patron in 1816. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, has recently received an addition of two hundred and twenty-five sittings, of which one hundred and eighty-two are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £150 towards defraying the expense.

MERING, an extra-parochial liberty, in the northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, though locally in the parish of Girton, northern division of the wapentake of Newark, county of NOTTINGHAM, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Newark, containing 7 inhabitants.

MERKSHALL, or MATTISHALL-HEATH, a parish in the hundred of HUMBLEYARD, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Norwich, containing 23 inhabitants. The living is a sinecure rectory, united with that of Caistor St. Edmund's, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich. The church, which was dedicated to St. Edmund, is in ruins.

MERRINGTON, a parish in the south-eastern division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, comprising the townships of Chilton, Ferry-Hill, Hett, and Merrington, and containing 1279 inhabitants, of which number, 290 are in the township of Merrington, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Bishop Auckland. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £14. 4. 9½., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham. The church, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, is principally in the Norman style, the south door being of an enriched character, and the interior contains a wooden screen; the basement of the tower is Norman, and the upper part of later date: it stands on elevated ground, and serves as a land-mark. On the usurpation of the see of Durham by Comyn, about 1143, this church was seized by his nephew, who partly encompassed it with a ditch and vallum, and occupied it with armed men. There is a coal mine in the parish.

MERRINGTON, a township in the parish of PRESTON-GUBBALS, liberties of SHREWSBURY, county of SALOP, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Shrewsbury, containing 203 inhabitants.

MERRIOTT, a parish in the hundred of CREWKERNE, county of SOMERSET, 2 miles (N.) from Crewkerne, containing 1212 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £11. 11. 5½., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MERROW, a parish in the second division of the hundred of WOKING, county of SURREY, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Guildford, containing 240 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £9. 0. 2½. The Earl of Onslow was patron in 1812. The church is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist.

MERRYIN (ST.), a parish in the hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Padstow, containing 537 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 6. 8. A small quay was constructed under Catacleuse cliffs, about 1794, by Mr. Peter, of Harlyn, for the reception of coasting vessels and steam-boats belonging to the pilchard fishery in Portlease bay. In the vicinity was anciently a village, with a chapel or church dedicated to St. Constantine, the ruins of which still remain. The Bristol channel bounds this parish on the west and north.

MERSEA (EAST), a parish in the hundred of WINSTREE, county of ESSEX, 9 miles (S. S. E.) from Colchester, containing 282 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £21, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to St. Edmund, has a square stone tower, which formerly served as a land-mark, and supported a beacon. This parish is bounded on the north by Pyefleet channel, and on the east and south by the Colne, near its confluence with the Blackwater.

MERSEA (WEST), a parish in the hundred of WINSTREE, county of ESSEX, 9 miles (S.) from Colchester, containing 772 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £22. Mrs. Simpson was patroness in 1797. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. There is a place of worship for Baptists. This parish is bounded on the north and west by the Mersea channel, and on the south by the mouth of the Blackwater river; at low-water, every eight hours, there is a passage from the main land into the parish, over the causeway of the Strode, which is kept in order by the rental of an estate of about thirty acres, called the Strode lands. In 1730, when some alterations were made at West Mersea hall, a very fine tessellated pavement was discovered, twenty-one feet and a half long, and eighteen and a half broad. From these and other antique remains, it is probable that the island of Mersea was the residence of the Count of the Saxon shore, or of some other Roman officer. Here was anciently a Benedictine convent, dedicated to St. Peter, which was a cell to the abbey of St. Audoen, at Rouen, in Normandy.

MERSHAM, a parish in the hundred of CHART and LONGBRIDGE, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Ashford, containing 776 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £26. 16. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. Over the west door of the tower, which stands on the south side of the nave, is a very curious window, in the later style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In 1698, a rent-charge of £10 was devised by Dame Jane Knatchbull, for the education of poor children; eight boys are instructed for this sum. A fair for pedlary and toys is held on the Friday in Whitsun-week.

MERSTHAM, a parish in the second division of the hundred of REIGATE, county of SURREY, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. E.) from Gatton, containing 796 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £22. 1. 8. The church, dedicated to St. Catherine, was erected about the time of Henry VI., and is principally in the later style of English architecture; the tower is in the early English style, and is surmounted by a wooden spire. Merstham is now the only place where the Reigate stone, called also fire-stone, is dug for use. It was formerly obtained from Reigate and other places, and a considerable quantity of it was used in the erection of old Windsor castle, and of Henry the Seventh's chapel: in an ancient record in the tower it is stated, that "the labourers, artificers, carriages, and horses, were pressed from this parish and that of Chaldon adjoining, to convey stone from the King's quarry here to Windsor castle." It is found under beds of chalk and chalk marl: it is not, however, adapted to the general purposes of architecture, being subject to decay from exposure to the atmosphere; but it will bear being heated without injury, whence the name of fire-stone. The Surrey and Croydon railway commences in this parish.

MERSTON, a joint parish with Shorne, in the hundred of SHAMWELL, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Gravesend. The population is returned with Shorne. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £2. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which was dedicated to St. Giles, is in ruins, and its site is included in a plantation of about five acres, called Chapel wood: there are some traces of ancient fortifications. This place is parochial only in its ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in other respects it is part of the parish of Shorne.

MERSTON, a parish in the hundred of Box and STOCKBRIDGE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 3 miles (S. E.) from Chichester, containing 107 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £7. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is partly in the early, and partly in the decorated, style of English architecture. The Arundel and Portsmouth canal passes through this parish.

MERTHER, a parish in the western division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (W.) from Tregony, containing 370 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of St. Probus, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £600 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Merther. Here is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. At Tresilian bridge, in this parish, the treaty between Sir Ralph Hopton and Sir Thomas Fairfax was concluded, in March 1646, by which this county was surrendered to the parliament. There are fairs at Tresilian bridge, on the second Monday in February, and on the Monday before Whitsunray, for cattle. St. Clement's creek, an inlet of the river Mopus, between Falmouth and Truro, is navigable here. Mr. William Hals, author of the Parochial History of Cornwall, resided at Tresawson in this parish.

MERTON, a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Hatherleigh, containing 697 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £20. 15. 7½. Lord Clinton was patron in 1794. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Potheridge house, once the residence of the celebrated General Monk, who rebuilt it, was a noble structure, with a chapel attached, and some magnificent stables, which yet remain; the mansion is now occupied as a farm-house. Pipe and potters' clay exists in this parish.

MERTON, a parish in the hundred of WAYLAND, county of NORFOLK, 2¼ miles (S.S.W.) from Watton, containing 162 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 0. 5. Lord Walsingham was patron in 1803. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has a round tower; in the south window are effigies of St. Edmund and of Robert Clifton, in stained glass.

MERTON, a parish in the hundred of BULLINGTON, county of OXFORD, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Bicester, containing 163 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Swithin.

MERTON, a parish in the western division of the hundred of BRIXTON, county of SURREY, 9 miles (S.W. by S.) from London, containing 1177 inhabitants. The name of this place in Domesday-book is Mereton and Meretune, a Saxon compound of mere, a lake, or marsh, and tun, a town, or vill, being exactly descriptive of its situation. According to some writers, this place was the scene of the murder of Cynewulf, King of Wessex, in 784, and of a battle between the Danes and the Saxons, in 871, but there exists some doubt as to its identity with the Merton referred to by ancient historians. In 1117, a convent of canons regular of the order of St. Augustine was founded here by Gilbert Norman, sheriff of Surrey; and Henry I., in 1121, granted to this community the manor of Merton, towards the erection of a church in honour of the Virgin Mary: the priory was liberally endowed by subsequent benefactions, and, at the dissolution, the revenue was valued at £1039. 5. 3. In the reign of Henry III., Walter de Merton, Lord High Chancellor of England, and afterwards Bishop of Rochester, founded here a seminary of learning, which he afterwards removed to Oxford, on the foundation of Merton College. A parliament was held at the priory, in 1236, in which those statutes were enacted which take their name from this place: on that occasion the prelates attempted to introduce the imperial and canon law, but were met by that memorable reply of the barons, "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari." Here was concluded the peace between Henry III. and the Dauphin of France, through the mediation of Gualo, the pope's legate; and here also Hubert de Bourg, Chief Justice of England, found a temporary asylum from the displeasure of the same monarch. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., a considerable part of the conventual buildings was standing: and it appears that a garrison had been established here; for, in July 1648, orders were issued by the government for putting the place in such a condition, that no use might be made of it endangering the peace of the kingdom. In 1680, Merton priory was advertised to be let, when it was described as containing several large rooms and a very fine chapel. The only vestiges now remaining are the east window of the chapel, apparently built in the fifteenth century, and the outer walls, constructed of flint and rubble, which are nearly entire, and enclose a space of about sixty acres. The village, which is situated on the small river Wandle, consists chiefly of one street, which is paved and lighted: the houses are modern, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from several springs and from the river, over which a bridge was built, in 1633, uniting this parish with those of Wimbledon and Mitcham. Manufactories for calico-printing have been established on the site of the priory, and formerly more than one thousand persons were employed in them, but at present there are not more than three hundred; at the north-east corner of the premises is a copper-mill. Hats are also manufactured here, and there is a silk-throwing establishment.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of E. H. Bond, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the Norman style of architecture, with later insertions; it was erected by the founder of the abbey, in the twelfth century: the arms of England and those of the priory, painted on glass, decorate the chancel window. There is a place of worship for Independents. An almshouse for six poor women was founded, in 1656, by Rowland Wilson, merchant of London, and endowed with £24 per annum, but it has become private property, and the endowment is lost. In 1687, William Rutlish bequeathed an estate, directing the proceeds to be applied in apprenticing poor children of either sex; the present income of this charity is about £96 per annum. Merton place, having been attached to the rectorial estate for more than two centuries, was separated from it some years ago, and became the residence and property of Admiral Lord Nelson. Thomas à Becket was educated here under the first prior; and Walter de Merton a native of this place, also and received his education in the priory. Merton confers the title of viscount on the family of Nelson.

MESHAW, a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, 5¼ miles (S. E. by S.) from South Molton, containing 163 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £7. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. G. H. Wollaston, Esq. was patron in 1777. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

MESSING, a parish in the Witham division of the hundred of LEXDEN, county of ESSEX, 5½ miles (S. E.) from Great Coggeshall, containing 705 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Earl of Verulam. The church is dedicated to All Saints: the east window is decorated with paintings of the six Christian graces, supposed to have been the gift of the Chibbornes, in the reign of James I. Sir William de Messing, the founder, is represented in the north wall by a recumbent wooden figure of a Knight Templar. A school for the education of poor children has a small endowment.

MESSINGHAM, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Glandford Bridge, containing, with the township of East Butterwick, 1103 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the vicarage of Bottesford, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the alternate patronage of the Bishop, and Dean and Chapter, of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

METFIELD, a parish in the hundred of HOXNE, county of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Harleston, containing 682 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, and in the patronage of the Parishioners. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

METHAM, a township in the parish of HOWDEN, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, East riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from Howden, containing 45 inhabitants. A Roman pottery, including fragments of urns and other vessels, has been discovered here; about a mile from which the ancient Roman military way passes.

METHERINGHAM, a parish in the second division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Sleaford, containing 626 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 0. 10., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bristol. The church is dedicated to St. Wilfrid. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

METHLEY, a parish in the lower division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Wakefield, containing 1499 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £25. 8. $6\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church, dedicated to St. Oswald, is principally in the later English and decorated styles, and contains several ancient and splendid monuments; the most curious is a mutilated statue of the patron saint, over the south door, now, from its great antiquity, in a state of rapid decay. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A small sum has been given for the instruction of children; and there are eight almshouses for widows. The river Calder bounds this parish on the south, and unites with the Aire on the east.

METHOP, a joint township with Ulpha, in the parish of BEETHAM, KENDAL ward, county of WEST-MORLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Cartmel, containing, with Ulpha, 82 inhabitants. There is a small sum for the instruction of children. The mouth of the Kent bounds this parish on the south-east.

METHWOLD, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSHOE, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Stoke-Ferry, containing 1164 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Cranwick, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 1. 3. The church, dedicated to St. George, is a handsome structure with an embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Here was formerly a market, and a fair is still held on the 23rd of April. In the neighbourhood is a celebrated warren, which formerly contained a great number of rabbits, the fur of which was in considerable repute.

METTINGHAM, a parish in the hundred of WANGFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (E.) from Bungay, containing 349 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$. Mrs. Safford was patroness in 1824. The church is dedicated to All Saints. In the reign of Richard II., a master and chaplains were translated, by royal license, from the college of Ravensingham, in Norfolk, to Mettingham castle; in 1535, their revenue amounted to £202. 7. 5. The navigable river Waveney runs on the north of this parish.

METTON, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Cromer, containing 101 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Felbrigg, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

MEUX, a township in the parish of WAGHEN, or WAWN, middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESSE, East riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Beverley, containing 74 inhabitants. A Cistercian abbey was founded here, in 1150, by William le Gros, Earl of Albemarle, and dedicated to the Virgin; the establishment consisted of fifty monks, whose revenue, at the dissolution, amounted to £445. 10. 5.

MEVAGISSEY, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Grampound, containing 2450 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. 4. 2., and in the patronage of the Earl of Mount-Edgcombe. The church is dedicated to St. Mevan and St. Issi, whence the name of the parish. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. This parish borders on a bay of the same name in the English channel.

MEWAN (ST.), a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, 1 mile (W. by S.) from St. Austell, containing 1174 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. The Rev. William Hocker was patron in 1801. The church is dedicated to St. Mewan. At Polgooth, which is partly in this parish, is a celebrated tin mine.

MEXBOROUGH, a parish partly in the liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, but chiefly in the southern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Dannaby and Mexborough, and containing 1006 inhabitants, of which number, 865 are in the township of Mexborough, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Rotherham. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archdeacon of York, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1500 parliamentary grant. A celebrated battle was anciently fought at this place, then called Maizebel, between Aurelius Ambrosius and the Saxons, in which the latter were defeated.

MICHAEL (ST.), or MIDSHALL, a borough (formerly a market town) partly in the parish of ST. ENO-DER, and partly in that of NEWLYN, hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, 36 miles (S. W. by W.) from Launceston, and 249 (W. S. W.) from London. The population is returned with the parishes. The ancient name of this place was Modeshole, under which appellation John de Arundell, in 1301, certified his right to a market and fair here, which had been previously granted to Walter de Raleigh. The town is very inconsiderable, consisting only of a few houses, several of which are uninhabited; the market has been long disused: fairs are held July 28th and October 15th, the latter chiefly for sheep, of which from three thousand to four thousand are generally offered for sale. A portreeve is presented annually by the jury at the court leet of the high lord, who must be one of the five chief tenants, or mesne-lords. The borough first sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward VI.: the right of election is in the portreeve and mesne, or deputy, lords of the manor (who are capable of being portreeves), and the inhabitants of the borough paying scot and lot: the number of voters is eight; the portreeve is the returning officer. The influence of Viscount Falmouth, and of the representative of Sir Christopher Hawkins, Bart., is predominant.

MICHAEL (ST.), a parish partly in the borough of ST. ALBAN'S, but chiefly in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (W. by N.) from St. Alban's, containing 1370 inhabitants, of which number, 453 are in the borough of St. Alban's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Earl of Verulam. The church, though situated in the town of St. Alban's, and within the walls of the ancient city of Verulam, is without the limits of the borough: it was erected by Ulsinus, the sixth abbot, and has a square embattled tower; the chancel is built principally of Roman tiles, from the ruins of Verulam, and attached to the south side of the nave is a chapel. An almshouse for two poor widows was founded, in 1624, by Roger Pemberton, who endowed it with about £10 per annum.

MICHAEL (ST.), a parish in the hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Garstang, comprising the chapelry of Wood-Plumpton, and the townships of Great Eccleston, Elswick, Inskip with Sowerby, Out Rawcliffe and Upper Rawcliffe with Tarnicar, and containing 4553 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £10. 17. 6. Joseph Hornby, Esq. was patron in 1825. The church, which was superseded by the present small structure, built in the time of Henry VIII., was one of three erected in this district soon after Christianity was introduced into the north of England. The parish is situated upon the navigable river Wyre, the mouth of which forms a fine harbour, noted for its security. Here, in 1651, the Earl of Derby disembarked from the Isle of Man, with three hundred other adherents to the House of Stuart. Joseph Fielding, in 1808, conveyed £60, and Elizabeth Cromleholme, in 1813, £200, towards a school, in which about fifty children are educated.

MICHAEL (ST.), a parish adjacent to the city, and within the liberty of the soke, of WINCHESTER, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, containing 499 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of St. Swithin, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £5. 17. 11., endowed with £500 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty.

MICHAEL (ST.) BEDWARDINE, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, forming part of the city of Worcester, and containing, with the extra-parochial district of the College Precincts, 793 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 1., and endowed with £1000 royal bounty. The King, by lapse, presented in 1799.

MICHAEL (ST.) CARHAISE, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Tregoney, containing 174 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacies of St. Denis and St. Stephen, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £27. 10. 7½., and in the patronage of Lord and Lady Grenville. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There are also the ruins of an ancient chapel. The parish is bounded on the south by the English channel, where is Port Luny bay.

MICHAEL'S (ST.) MOUNT, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S.) from Marazion, containing 223 inhabitants. This mount, believed in the remote ages of antiquity to have been situated in a wood, consists of a pyramidal mass of granite rocks rising out of the sea, opposite to the town of Marazion, and is connected with the main land by a narrow bank of pebbles, which is overflowed by the tide. Its original name, in the Cornish dialect, signified "the grey or hoary rock in the wood," which was subsequently changed to its present appellation; this, according to monkish legends, being deduced from the appearance of St. Michael, its patron saint, to some hermits who resided here, which event led to the foundation of a monastery. It has been supposed that this is the island called Ixtis, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, whither the tin, when refined and cast into cubic ingots by the Britons who dwelt near the promontory of Belerium, was carried in carts over an isthmus dry only at low water. The time of its consecration to religious purposes is unknown; but a priory of Benedictine monks, afterwards changed to Gilbertines, was founded here previously to the year 1044, at which period Edward the Confessor gave the mount, with all its buildings and appendages, to that community: by this charter it is evident that there was a castle, as well as a convent, on the mount. In 1070, indulgences were granted by Pope Gregory VII. to all persons who should visit the church of St. Michael at the Mount with alms and oblations; hence it became a great resort for pilgrims. In the reign of Richard I., Henry de Pomeroy, an adherent of John, Earl of Cornwall, afterwards king of England, took possession of the mount by stratagem, during the king's imprisonment in Austria, fortified it, and continued to hold it even after the return of that monarch; but on the approach of the army of Archbishop Hubert Walter, aided by the sheriff and a civil force, he surrendered at discretion: the king then restored the convent to the Gilbertines, and placed a small garrison in the castle. After the battle of Barnet, in 1471, John, Earl of Oxford, having fled into Wales, assembled a party of soldiers, and crossed over with them to the Cornish coast: under the assumed disguise of pilgrims, they gained admission into the castle, and soon overpowered the small garrison which defended it. Sir John Arundel, the sheriff, was first sent against the earl, but was repulsed and slain in a vigorous assault upon the castle: others were then commissioned to conduct the siege, which, having continued from September till February, terminated in the surrender of the fortress, on condition that the lives of the earl and his adherents should be spared. In 1498, Perkin Warbeck landed at Whit-sand bay, and having been admitted into the castle by the monks, who favoured his cause, put it into a state of defence, and during his march to Bodmin, left his wife, the Lady Catherine Gordon, at the mount, as a secure asylum.

The priory of St. Michael, being a cell to the abbey of Mont St. Michel, in Normandy, was seized as an Alien priory by Henry V., during the war with France: it was first given to King's College, Cambridge, and afterwards to the nunnery of Sion in Middlesex, to which it continued to be attached till the dissolution, when the revenue was valued at £110. 12. In 1533, it was given, with all its revenue, to Humphrey Arundel, Esq., of Lanherne, but he having headed a rebellion in Cornwall about 1549, it was seized for the king, and subsequently granted on lease to the sheriff of the county. In 1642, it was fortified for the king, and the Duke of Hamilton was subsequently imprisoned within its walls: it was at last surrendered to the parliament in 1646; and after the Restoration it became the property of the family of the present proprietor, Sir John St. Aubyn. The mount consists of granite, nearly bare of soil, and is extremely steep and craggy. The occasional residence of Sir John St. Aubyn is on the summit of the rock, and partakes of the character both of a fortress and a monastery, being castellated and embattled: the dining-room was the refectory of the convent; and the chapel has been recently fitted up in the ancient English style, for the performance of divine service in one of the angles, at the summit of the chapel tower, which crowns the whole mass of building. On this craggy height are the remains of a moor-stone lantern, formerly used as a beacon for mariners, and vulgarly called St. Michael's chair: the ascent is dangerous, but a superstitious notion connected with having sat therein induces occasional visitors to attempt the adventurous path. The entire height of the mount, from the level of the sea to the platform of the chapel tower, is two hundred and thirty-one feet; the circumference of the island, which comprises about seven acres of land, is about three quarters of a mile: at the foot of the rock is a wharf, and near it a considerable village inhabited chiefly by fishermen. There is likewise a small harbour with a pier, which was rebuilt by Sir John St. Aubyn in 1727, where about forty vessels may find shelter. The principal imports consist of timber from Norway, coal, &c.; the exports are copper-ore, china-clay, and pilchards.

MICHAEL (ST.) PENKEVIL, a parish in the western division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Tregoney, containing 167 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 14. 2., and in the patronage of the Earl of Falmouth. The church, an ancient edifice adjoining the park, contains a handsome monument, by Rysbrach, to the memory of Admiral Boscawen, a distinguished naval commander, who died in 1761.

MICHAEL-CHURCH, a chapelry in the parish of TRETIRE, lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Ross. The population is returned with the parish.

MICHAEL-CHURCH (ST.), a parish in the northern division of the hundred of PETHERTON, county of SOMERSET, 5¼ miles (S.) from Bridg-water, containing 50 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir J. P. Acland, Bart.

MICHAEL-CHURCH-ESKLEY, a parish in the hundred of EWYASLACY, county of HEREFORD, 10 miles (S. E.) from Hay, containing 424 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecon, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The river Eskley runs through the parish. A few of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of woollen goods. A free school has been endowed, by Mrs. Thomas, with lands now producing an annual income of £30, for teaching four poor children of this parish, four of Crasswall, four of Llanveyhoe, and four of Peterchurch.

MICHAELSTONE-VEDOW, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 5¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Newport, containing 197 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 3½., and in the patronage of Charles Kemys Tynte, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

MICHAELSTOW, a parish in the hundred of LESNEWTH, county of CORNWALL, 3¼ miles (S. W. by S.) from Camelford, containing 216 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Cornwall. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Camel. At Helsbury are the mount and other earth-works of an ancient castle, called the Beacon.

MICKFIELD, a parish in the hundred of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, county of SUFFOLK, 2¾ miles (W. S. W.) from Debenham, containing 246 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. 0½., and in the patronage of the Rev. Maltward Simpson. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

MICKLEFIELD, a township in the parish of SHERBURN, upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, 6½ miles (N. N. W.) from Ferry-Bridge, containing 196 inhabitants.

MICKLEHAM, a parish in the second division of the hundred of COPTHORNE, county of SURREY, 2 miles

(S. by E.) from Leatherhead, containing 505 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £13. Henry Burmester, Esq. was patron in 1813. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is principally in the early style of English architecture, and has lately received an addition of two hundred sittings, of which, one hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £150 towards defraying the expense.

MICKLEOVER, a parish in the hundred of MORELESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Derby, containing, with the chapelries of Findern and Littleover, 1373 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. $5\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Lord Scarsdale. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Unitarians. John Alsop, in 1715, founded a free school, and endowed it with lands now let for about £60 per annum. There are also two smaller sums appropriated to the education of the poor, viz., the interest of £200 bequeathed by Robert Newton, in 1784, and £1 a year by John Erpe.

MICKLETHWAITE, a joint township with Bingley, in the parish of BINGLEY, upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Keighley. The population is returned with Bingley.

MICKLETON, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Chipping-Campden, containing, with the hamlets of Lower and Upper Clapton, and Hitcoat-Batrim, 574 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, consolidated with that of Ebrington, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £9. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Laurence, is partly Norman and partly of later date: attached to it is a school-room, of similar architecture, founded and endowed, in 1513, by Richard Porter, Esq., for teaching poor children. Sunday schools for both sexes have been also established. Richard Graves, a divine, and miscellaneous writer, was born here; he died in 1804.

MICKLETON, a township in the parish of ROMALD-KIRK, western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 8 miles (N. W.) from Barnard-Castle, containing 356 inhabitants.

MICKLEWAITE-GRANGE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (S. by W.) from Wetherby, containing 83 inhabitants.

MICKLEY, a chapelry in the parish of Ovingham, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTH-UMBERLAND, 11 miles (E. by S.) from Hexham, containing 178 inhabitants. A chapel of ease was erected in 1824, at Hall-yards, near the village, by W. B. Wrightson, Esq., who had three years previously built a school-room and a house for the master.

MIDDLE, a parish partly in the liberties of SHREWSBURY, but chiefly in the hundred of PIMHILL, county of SALOP, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Shrewsbury, containing, with the chapelry of Hadnall-Ease, 1190 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £12. 7. $3\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late Earl of Bridgewater. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Here are remains of Middle castle, which was built by Lord L'Estrange. Marton Pool, a lake in this parish, covers about ten acres.

MIDDLE-QUARTER, a township in the parish of KIRK-LINTON, or KIRK-LEVINGTON, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, containing 532 inhabitants.

MIDDLE-QUARTER, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-IRELETH, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, 6 miles (N. W.) from Ulverstone, containing 504 inhabitants.

MIDDLEHAM, a parish (formerly a market town) in the western division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, 44 miles (N. W. by W.) from York, and 234 (N. N. W.) from London, containing 880 inhabitants. The name of this town is said to be derived from its situation in the centre of a number of hamlets. About the year 1190, a splendid castle was built here by Robert Fitz-Ranulph, wherein, according to Stow, Falconbridge, a partisan of Henry VI., was beheaded, in 1471; though Speed says he was executed at Southampton. Edward IV. was confined in this fortress by the Earl of Warwick, but having escaped, he levied an army, and obtained a decisive victory over his opponent, who lost his life at the battle of Barnet. King Edward subsequently gave the castle to his brother Richard, Duke of Gloucester, whose only son Edward, afterwards Prince of Wales, was born here. The remains of this fabric stand upon a rocky eminence near the town; the ancient Norman keep is surrounded by a quadrangular building, measuring two hundred and ten feet by one hundred and seventy-five, and flanked by a square tower at each angle. The constablenesship, now merely a nominal office, is vested in the Duke of Leeds. The town is situated on a gentle eminence rising from the river Ure: the houses are indifferently built, and the streets are neither lighted nor paved, but the inhabitants are well supplied with water from springs. About half a mile from it is Middleham moor, a noted place for training horses, either for the field or the race-course. Wool-combing affords employment to a few persons, but the majority are employed in agriculture. The market, now disused, was on Monday. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday and Whit-Monday, and November 5th and 6th, for live stock, &c. Two constables are appointed at the court leet, which is held annually. The petty sessions for the western division of the wapentake of Hang are held here. The living forms a deanery of itself, and is a royal peculiar, rated in the king's books at £15. 9. $4\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Alkeld, is a neat edifice, in the ancient style of English architecture. It was made collegiate by Richard III., when Duke of Gloucester, for a dean, six chaplains, four clerks, and six choristers: the incumbent retains the title of dean, and is installed with the usual ceremonies; he possesses the power of proving wills, and some other rights of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, within his parish, together with a court, an official, and a seal of office: but, owing to the peculiarity of his situation, as being exempt from the jurisdiction of both ordinary and metropolitan, he is unable to give a title for holy orders. There are places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. A small sum was given by William Tennant, in 1792, for the instruction of poor children; and it is now in contemplation to erect a National school.

MIDDLEHAM (BISHOP'S), a parish in the north-eastern division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, comprising the townships of Bishop's Middleham, Cornforth, Garmondsway-Moor, Mainsforth, and Thrislington, and containing 827 inhabitants, of which number, 404 are in the township of Bishop's Middleham, 9 miles (S. S. E.) from Durham. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £4. 19. 2., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The village is built on the sides of two hills ascending from a deep vale, through which the road runs, and abounding in limestone. At Cornforth are paper-mills and tile-kilns. A halmote court for the manor is held once in six months, at Middleham, Cornforth, and Sedgfield, alternately, for the recovery of debts under 40s. There is a school-room, built by subscription in 1770, but it is not endowed. The castle was one of the principal residences of the Bishops of Durham, from the Conquest till the end of the fourteenth century: it stood on a lofty eminence, where its site may still be traced by the foundations and some fragments of masonry; an old barn, on the opposite side of the road, is supposed to have been part of the out-offices.

MIDDLEHOPE, a township in the parish of DIDDLEBURY, hundred of MUNSLOW, county of SALOP, containing 180 inhabitants.

MIDDLE-MEAD, a hamlet in the parish of LITTLE BADDOW, hundred of CHELMSFORD, though locally in the hundred of Dengie, county of ESSEX, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Chelmsford, containing 202 inhabitants.

MIDDLENEY, a tything in the parish of DRAYTON, hundred of ABDICK and BULSTONE, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Langport, containing 25 inhabitants.

MIDDLESBOROUGH, a parish partly within the liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, but chiefly in the western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Linthorp and Middlesborough, and containing 236 inhabitants, of which number, 40 are in the township of Middlesborough, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Stockton upon Tees. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Thomas Hustler, Esq. An ancient chapel, dedicated to St. Hilda, with certain lands adjacent, were, in the reign of Henry I., given by Robert de Bruse to Whitby abbey, on condition that a cell of Benedictine monks to that house should be founded here, which was valued, in the 26th of Henry VIII., at £21. 3. 8. per annum: of the chapel no vestiges remain, but the cemetery is still used as a burial-ground.

MIDDLESCOUGH, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ST. MARY'S, CARLISLE, which is in LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Hesket-Newmarket, containing, with the hamlet of Braithwaite, 221 inhabitants.

MIDDLESEX, an inland county, bounded on the south by SURREY and a very small part of Kent, from both which it is separated by the river Thames; on the east by ESSEX, from which it is separated by the river Lea; on the north by HERTFORDSHIRE; and on the west by Buckinghamshire, from which it is separated by the river Coln. It extends from $51^{\circ} 22'$ to $51^{\circ} 42'$ (N. Lat.), and from $2'$ (E. Lon.) to $31'$ (W. Lon.), and contains about one hundred and eighty thousand four hundred and eighty acres, or two hundred and eighty-two square miles. The population, in 1821, was, including London, 1,144,531. At the time of Cæsar's invasion, this part of the British territory, together with that now forming the county of Essex, was inhabited by the Trinobantes, the first British tribe that submitted to the Romans; and on the final reduction of Britain to the condition of a Roman province, it was included in the division called Flavia Cæsariensis. The name is slightly corrupted from the Anglo-Saxon Middel-Seaxe, signifying the country of the Middle Saxons; this portion of the English territory having lain in the centre of the early Saxon sovereignties established in South Britain. It did not, however, form a distinct kingdom, but was included in that of the East Saxons, established in Essex about the year 530 and shortly after extended over this county. The history of Middlesex is little else than the history of the metropolis itself, a summary of which will be found under its proper head. It is only necessary to specify here a few of the most remarkable movements and occurrences which have taken place in it without the limits of the capital. In 879, the Danish army wintered at Fulham; and in 1016, Canute was defeated at Brentford, by Edmund Ironside. In 1217, at Hounslow, a conference was held between four peers and twenty knights, on the part of Louis the Dauphin, and the same number of nobles and knights on the part of the young king Henry III. In 1264, at Isleworth, the palace of Richard, King of the Romans, and Earl of Cornwall, brother to Henry III., was destroyed by the inhabitants of London, under Sir Hugh Spencer. In 1386, the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and Derby, with other nobles, assembled at Hornsey, to compel Richard II. to dismiss his favourite, Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland. During the insurrection under Jack Cade, in 1450, the Essex insurgents encamped at Mile-End; and, in 1461, the Kentish insurgents beheaded, at Highgate, Thomas Thorpe, Baron of the Exchequer. May 4th, 1483, the young king, Edward V., accompanied by the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, who had obtained possession of his person, was met at Hornsey by the lord mayor and citizens, and conducted to the episcopal palace in the city. It was at Sion-house, in 1553, that Lady Jane Grey reluctantly accepted the crown, and was thence conducted with great pomp to the tower. In 1586, at Uxendon, near Harrow, Anthony Babington and his fellow conspirators against Queen Elizabeth were arrested. In 1603, on the accession of James I., that sovereign was met, on his way to London, at Stamford-hill by the lord mayor and citizens, and conducted with great pomp to the Charter-house. November 12th, 1642, at the commencement of the great civil war, the parliamentarians were defeated at Brentford, by Charles I., and the eccentric John Lilburne, with four hundred men, was made prisoner. At Uxbridge, in January 1645, the fruitless negotiation between the king's and the parliamentary commissioners was set on foot, and carried on for eighteen days. August 4th, 1647, General Fairfax had his head-quarters at Isleworth, and there received the parliamentary commissioners; and in the same year, the king was kept in confinement at Hampton-Court, from the 24th of August until his escape on the 11th of November. In 1651, on the 21st of September, Oliver Cromwell, returning from the battle of Worcester, was met at Acton with a congratulatory address, and accompanied to London, by the Lord President and Council of State, many members of both houses of parliament, and the Lord Mayor and aldermen of London, forming, altogether, a train of more than three hundred coaches. Lastly, on the 20th of April, 1814, Louis XVIII., accompanied by the Duchess d'Angoulême, from their asylum at Hartwell in Buckinghamshire, was met at Stanmore by the Prince Regent, and conducted in triumph to London, on his restoration to the French throne.

This county is included in the diocese of London, and province of Canterbury, and forms a deanery and arch-deaconry, comprising, with the exception of those parishes in the cities of London and Westminster, and their liberties, which are given in a tabular form under the head of London, seventy parishes, of which twenty-five are rectories, thirty-one vicarages, and fourteen perpetual curacies. The civil division is into the hundreds of Edmonton, Elthorne, Gore, Isleworth, Ossulstone (including the divisions of Finsbury, Holborn, and the Tower), and Spelthorne; and the liberties of the cities of London and Westminster. Within the county are, the city of London (locally), the borough (commonly called the city) of Westminster, and the market towns of Brentford, Staines, and Uxbridge. Two knights are returned to parliament for the shire, four citizens for the city of London, and two burgesses for the borough of Westminster. The shrievalty of Middlesex, being united with that of the city of London, is described under the latter head. The assizes are held eight times a year at the Old Bailey, in London; and the quarter sessions, four times originally, and four times by adjournment, at the sessions-house, on Clerkenwell-green. There are two hundred acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £666,418. 5.; the expenditure to £711,874. 16., of which £612,147. 14. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The gently undulating surface of the greater part of this small county is peculiarly suited to the general purposes of agriculture; and although it contains little scenery that can properly be termed picturesque, yet these inequalities contribute greatly to its healthfulness and beauty. Middlesex is also diversified with plantations and meandering streams, besides innumerable villas with ornamented grounds and lawns. The northern border of the county is high ground, which, by the shelter it affords, adds considerably to the fertility of the other parts. The principal elevations are, Harrow hill, the hills of Highwood, Hendon, and Barnet, one between Barnet and Elstree, Brockley hill, and the Highgate and Hampstead hills: the summits of these are of nearly equal height, being about four hundred feet above the level of high water mark in the Thames. The most extensive prospects are, that from Harrow hill over the valley of the Thames, those from Hampstead and Highgate hills, including distinct views of the northern side of the metropolis, and those from Muswell hill, over the north-eastern side of London, into Surrey and Kent, and over the valley of the Lea into Essex. One of the most striking nearer views of London is that from Primrose hill over the Regent's Park, with the splendid new ranges of building that skirt its base, and the rest of the north-western side of the metropolis. All the land to the south of the road passing from Brentford, through Hounslow, to Longford, is very nearly an entire flat, the greater part of which is less than ten feet above the level of the Thames, which runs along the whole southern side of it. From Staines, by Ashford and Hanworth commons, to Twickenham, a distance of seven miles and a half, is another flat, lying from ten to twenty feet above the surface of the Thames. From Brentford, along the borders of the Thames, to London, is also an extensive level, chiefly employed in the production of vegetables for the London market; as is also another tract on the north-east side of the town. Round the first milestone on the Kingsland road is an extent of upwards of one thousand acres, the surface of which has been lowered from four to ten feet, by the clay having been dug and made into bricks: a great portion of this is now covered with houses. In the western part of the county, stretching chiefly to the north of Hounslow heath, is a considerable tract of arable land, and another in the north-eastern part of it; but by far the greater portion of the land is meadow or pasture. Upon several of the hills, where the soil is naturally barren, particularly those of Hampstead and Highgate, and at Hadley, the ground is, nevertheless, of great value, on account of the fine situations for building.

The climate in general is healthy, owing to the greater part of the soil being naturally dry, and the less elevated tracts well drained, and consequently free from noxious vapours. The fires of London, from their immense number, have a sensible effect upon the surrounding atmosphere, which they heat and rarefy. In London the air, when dry, is always loaded with, and the atmosphere often obscured by, smoke, containing soot arising from the pit coal commonly consumed. With cultivation and the manure procured from London, the soil has every where been ameliorated, so that, in most places, it assumes the appearance of loam, though varying in quality. The summits of most of the highest hills consist of sand and gravel, frequently intermixed with loam. Hampstead hill is composed of eight or ten feet of yellow iron-stained sand, with some loam and round flints, under which is a pure white sand of considerable depth. The soil of all that portion of the county lying between the road from Hounslow to Colnbrook, on the north, and the river Thames on the south, is sandy, or dry turnip and barley land, generally from eighteen inches to two feet deep, resting on a bed of gravel, or small flints, of six, eight, or ten feet in thickness, under which is a leaden-coloured tenacious earth, of great depth, used by tile-makers. On the eastern side of the county also, the soil is of the same light nature, from six inches to two feet deep, the gravel of small flints, underneath which, being used for the repairing of the roads, can only be dug to the depth of from two to five feet, as it then assumes the appearance of a quicksand, so watery as to prevent all deeper digging. All the land between the Colnbrook and Uxbridge roads, from London to the west of Hanwell and Hounslow, and the level tract on the north side of the Thames, from Twickenham down to Westminster, have a good sandy loam, which, in different parts, has been highly enriched by cultivation; the substrata of this are the same as those of the sandy tract first mentioned. The soil around Chiswick varies from a strong to a light sandy loam, and from a rich and fertile to a white and sharp sand and gravel: the district around Fulham consists of a light black and fertile soil. All the land from Ruislip and Ickenham, on the west, to Greenford, Apperton, and Harrow, on the east; and between Pinner, on the north, and Northcote, on the south, together with that about South Mimms, is composed of strong loam. The level between Islington, Hampstead, and Hornsey, is also of the same kind, and very productive. Loamy clay, commonly called clay, is to be found in this county generally on the tops of the lower hills, and on the sides of all, but hardly in any other situation.

The greater part of the arable land is in the common fields; the rest consists of such parts of the said fields as have, at no distant time, been enclosed under various acts of parliament, as at Stanwell, and on Enfield Chase. The total amount is about fourteen thousand acres, or one-thirteenth of the whole county, which does not produce wheat sufficient to supply one-sixtieth of the inhabitants. The corn cultivated is almost wholly wheat and barley; rye and oats being grown only in very small quantities. Beans, peas, turnips, and cabbages, are also commonly cultivated. About ten thousand acres of land are employed in the growth of wheat, the produce varying from ten to upwards of forty bushels per acre; and about four thousand acres are annually sown with barley, the average produce of which is about thirty-two bushels. About three thousand acres are commonly cropped with beans, which are here cultivated with great advantage: the produce, on an average, is about thirty bushels per acre; some of the better sorts are podded when green, and sent to the London market. Peas annually occupy about three thousand acres, being also well cultivated; the average produce of seed per acre is about thirty bushels: About seven-eighths of the county, or seventy thousand acres, consist of upland meadows and pastures, which, from previous cultivation, and the constant and abundant supply of manure obtained from London, have been rendered of the first quality: cattle are turned into these meadows immediately after mowing, but to prevent the ground from being trodden, they are removed on the approach of continued wet weather, the rest of the after-grass being eaten by sheep, which remain upon it until the beginning of February. In different parts of this large tract of grass land, and more especially in the more immediate vicinity of the metropolis, it is mown constantly every year, and sometimes twice, or even thrice a year. Very little enclosed land of this kind is pastured. Besides the above, there are, on the borders of the river Lea, some excellent grass lands, comprising altogether about two thousand acres; of which one thousand two hundred, lying in the parishes of Enfield and Edmonton, are enclosed, the rest being divided by land-marks among a great number of proprietors. The common meadows are opened for the reception of the cattle of every inhabitant of their respective parishes, from the 12th of August until the 5th of April in the following year, when the cattle are taken off, and the ground is soon after prepared for a crop of hay, which it yields in July. This tract is frequently flooded in winter, and sometimes in summer, the water, in consequence of the interruptions which it meets with in the lower part of its course towards the Thames, remaining long on the ground, and doing much damage to the herbage. The Isle of Dogs, now containing, since the formation of the West India docks, only five hundred acres, lies at the south-eastern corner of the county, and would be overflowed by every tide, were it not for the security of its banks: this is considered to be the richest grass land in the county, and is divided and drained by ditches, which communicate with the Thames, at low water, by means of sluices. On the borders of the Thames above London are also different small tracts of meadow land, which are occasionally laid under water, by means of floods in the river, in all amounting to about one hundred acres. And lastly, on the borders of the river Coln, are extensive meadows and pastures, extending from Staines to Harefield, the soil of which is black, peaty, and tender, and but little elevated above the level of the river, in consequence of which it is much subject to floods, which frequently do considerable damage to the crops, and, when they happen during the hay harvest, sometimes carry the whole away. This tract contains about two thousand five hundred acres, and is partly enclosed, but by far the greater portion consists of what are called Lamm-fields, in which the occupiers have the entire produce during only four months in the year. The lands of this county have the peculiar advantage of a ready supply of immense quantities of manure from London; whence are also brought large quantities of soot: chalk is brought from the vicinity of Ware, in Hertfordshire, by the Lea navigation, and delivered at Enfield: good marl is found on the borders of the Thames at Shepperton and on Enfield Chase.

Middlesex is not distinguished by any particular breed of cattle, most of the calves that are bred in it being suckled until they are ten weeks old, and then sold to the butcher. The cows kept for the purpose of supplying the metropolis with milk are of a large size, with short horns, known by the name of "Holderness cattle;" they are bred not only in Yorkshire, in which county is the district whence they take their name, but also in nearly all the adjoining counties, where they are bought by dealers, and brought by them to the fairs and markets in this county, more especially to the market in the Liverpool road, Islington. Many are also purchased in the counties where they are bred, by commission, and forwarded to the cow-keepers in and near London, by whom they are preferred, as giving a greater quantity of milk than any other breed, without reference to the quality of it. The number kept for the supply of London, in the county of Middlesex alone, is between seven and eight thousand. There is not, perhaps, a county in England, in which less butter is made: the greater part of the butter consumed in London is brought from Ireland, Yorkshire, Buckinghamshire, and Dorsetshire, the remainder from Cambridge, Norfolk, Essex, and other neighbouring counties. The farmers buy their sheep at the fairs in Wiltshire, Berkshire, and Hampshire, and from dealers in the west country sheep at different fairs and markets: the sheep kept on Hounslow heath, and the adjoining common of Sunbury, were originally from the stock of the above-mentioned counties, but they have much degenerated: the practice of folding them is common. Many early house lambs are fed in the county, the stock from which they are bred being sought with great diligence from all parts of Dorsetshire, and the fairs where such stock is usually sold; and a great number of grass lambs is reared for the Smithfield market. A very large market for the sale of pigs is held on Hadley common, near Barnet, where great numbers are purchased fat by the pork butchers of London, and to which are brought vast quantities of lean stores, from Shropshire and other distant counties, to be fed by the malt-distillers. Very few good horses are bred in the county; the farmers obtaining cart-horses at the different fairs in the neighbouring counties, and at the stables of dealers in the metropolis. Many of the horses used in husbandry, as well as those employed by the carmen in London, are bred in Leicestershire and the adjoining counties, whence they are taken by dealers and sold to the farmers of Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, who, having kept them until they are about five years old, and of a proper age for constant work, dispose of them at high prices. The draught horses in the possession of the brewers and distillers, part of which are of Flemish breed, are almost unequalled in strength and beauty.

Passing from Kensington, through Hammersmith, Chiswick, Brentford, Isleworth, and Twickenham, the land on each side of the road, for the distance of seven miles, is in a great measure occupied by fruit gardens, for the supply of London, which produce, in the first place, apples, pears, cherries, plums, walnuts, &c.; and amongst the trees of these larger kinds of fruit are planted raspberries, gooseberries, currants, strawberries, and all such smaller fruit trees, shrubs, and herbs, as are known to thrive in such situations. The quantity of the richest ground near London employed in the raising of vegetables for its supply is very great; and at Chelsea, Brompton, Kensington, Hackney, Dalston, Bow, and Mile-End, much land is occupied by nurserymen, who spare no expense in collecting the choicest sorts and greatest variety of fruit-trees, ornamental shrubs, and flowers, from every quarter of the globe, which they cultivate to a high degree of perfection. These grounds occupy about one thousand five hundred acres; and from them many plants are annually exported to Ireland, Spain, Portugal, Italy, France, and Russia. On the northern slopes of Hampstead and Highgate hills are still a few acres of old woodland, besides one hundred acres on the east side of Finchley common, and two thousand acres to the north-west of Ryslip, in all about three thousand acres, about half of which is wood, tolerably well planted with thriving young oaks, the rest being copse. Many of the hedge-rows abound with pollard trees, for the most part elms. In the river Thames are some islands, most of which are planted with osiers for the use of basket-makers, as are also different slips of wet land on the Middlesex border of that river. The common lands of the county which yet remain unenclosed are but of small extent; viz., Ashford, Littleton, and Laleham commons, Staines and Cowley moors, Hillingdon heath, Uxbridge and Harefield commons, Clapton marshes, and Hadley, an allotment from Enfield Chase. Besides these are various smaller, containing less than one hundred acres each, such as Hampstead heath, Ealing common, Uxbridge moor, Memsey moor, Gould's green, Peil's heath, Hanwell common, Wormwood-Scrubs, and some others, which altogether contain about five hundred acres. Three-fourths of these commons are covered with heath and furze, while the whole affords but a scanty pasture for the cattle and sheep that are turned upon them. Finchley common, comprising upwards of a thousand acres, has been recently enclosed.

The manufactures of this county are far too numerous and extensive to be here detailed, but they will be found under the names of the places in which they are respectively carried on: the two most important are, that of silk, in the parishes of Spitalfields, Shoreditch, and Bethnal-green, and that of watches in the parish of Clerkenwell. The coach-builders and harness-makers are also very numerous in London and its vicinity, and in their respective labours far excel those of any other city in the world. With regard to the consumption of agricultural produce, the distilleries are of immense importance, and yield a revenue equal to that of all the other distilleries in Great Britain: the breweries, too, are of vast extent. Besides the prodigious amount of the imports and exports of the port of London, innumerable small cargoes of coal and merchandise of various descriptions, including grain, malt, and flour, are conveyed away or received by means of the inland barges on the Thames and the Lea. Tackling, apparel, provisions, and stores, are also supplied for about fourteen thousand vessels which load and unload in the course of the year in the port of London, the commerce of which amounts to three-fifths of that carried on throughout the whole of England. Besides the markets at the country towns, there are in London, Smithfield market, famous for the sale of bullocks, sheep, calves, lambs, and hogs, on every Monday, and again, though to a less extent, on every Thursday, on which latter day is also a market for ordinary horses; Leadenhall market, the greatest in London for the sale of country-killed meat and poultry, and fresh butter and eggs, and the only skin and leather market within the bills of mortality; and Newgate market, for the sale of provisions of the same kind as at the last-mentioned, being, like it, held daily. These markets almost entirely supply the butchers round London, to the distance of twelve miles, and, in a less degree, to the distance of twenty miles. The principal market at the Corn-Exchange in Mark-lane, the business of which is almost incalculable, is on Monday, besides which are two of minor importance, on Wednesday and Friday: about one-fourth of the supply is imported coastwise, a great quantity being also foreign corn. At Billingsgate is the great London fish-market every morning; while the two principal vegetable markets are those of Covent-Garden and Farringdon, at the latter of which other provisions are also sold. There are three public markets for hay and straw in this county, namely, at Whitechapel, in Smithfield, and the Haymarket in St. James' (now about to be removed to "a newly formed area, called Cumberland market, in the parish of St. Pancras"), each of which is held every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. The common fuel of Middlesex is coal, which is brought by vessels from the counties of Northumberland and Durham to the port of London, whence it is forwarded, by land or water carriage, to all parts of the county, and into Buckinghamshire, Berkshire, Surrey, Kent, and Essex. Wood is employed as fuel only in the cottages and small farm-houses on the northern side of the county, the expense of carrying coal to which is considerable.

The principal rivers of Middlesex are the Thames, the Lea, and the Coln, besides which are the smaller streams of the Brent and the Cran. The Thames, so celebrated throughout the world, as connected with the great port of London, constitutes the southern boundary of the county for a distance of forty-three miles, first touching it at Staines, whence it proceeds in a very devious course eastward, by Laleham, Sunbury, Hampton, Teddington, Twickenham, Isleworth, Brentford, Chiswick, Hammersmith, Fulham, and Chelsea, and part of the cities of Westminster and London, to Blackwall, where it quits the county, and continues its progress to the ocean. The largest ships in the service of the East India Company come up this river with safety to the corner of the county at Blackwall; and it is navigable for West India ships to London bridge, and for large barges in the whole of its course on the border of Middlesex, along which the tide flows up it, for the distance of about twenty-three miles, to Richmond bridge. The fish that are occasionally taken in this part of the Thames are sturgeon, salmon, tench, barbel, roach, dace, chub, bream, gudgeon, ruffe, bleak, eels, smelts, and flounders, the three last of which are of particularly good quality. The Lea forms the entire eastern boundary of the county, and is divided, in the greater part of its course, into several natural channels, uniting into one shortly before its influx into the Thames, which takes place near Blackwall. From its mouth upwards the Lea has been made navigable to the distance of about eight miles, where a canal navigation branches from it on the western side, and runs nearly parallel with it through the meadows of Tottenham, Edmonton, and Enfield, whence it is continued to Hertford. The Coln first touches the county at its north-western extremity, being there divided into two or three natural channels, in which manner it flows gently southward, along the western side of the county, to the neighbourhood of Longford and Colnbrook, where it is subdivided into six branches, the three principal of which continue their courses, in the same southerly direction, until they join the Thames at a short distance west of Staines: a fourth branch winds its way from near Longford, by the eastern end of Staines, and through Littleton, to the Thames between Shepperton and Sunbury; a fifth, from the same vicinity, runs south-easterly until it joins the river Cran, near the gunpowder-mills on Hounslow heath; while the sixth, also from the neighbourhood of Longford, passes near Stanwell, over Hounslow heath, and through Hanworth, Bushey, and Hampton-Court parks, to the Thames. The Brent, rising in Hertfordshire, enters this county near Finchley, and making a circuitous course through the middle of it, falls into the Thames at Brentford. The Cran takes its rise between Pinner and Harrow, in this county, and passing under Cranford-bridge, and across Hounslow heath, joins the Thames at Isleworth. The lake called the Serpentine river, in Hyde Park, was formed about the year 1730, and is fed by a small stream which rises near West-end, Hampstead, and passing by Kilburn, enters, just below Bayswater, into that part of the lake which is included in Kensington Gardens, and, quitting the Serpentine again just above Knightsbridge, runs into the Thames at Ranelagh. The Grand Junction canal, which is constructed on a very large and expensive scale, and opens a direct communication by water between London and the great manufacturing towns in Warwickshire, Staffordshire, and Lancashire, commences at the Thames at Brentford, and takes a north-westerly direction, passing near Hanwell, Norwood, Harlington, and West Drayton, to the valley of the Coln, up which it is continued near Cowley, Uxbridge, and Harefield, finally quitting Middlesex for Hertfordshire, near Rickmansworth in the latter county, after a rise from the Thames of a hundred and fourteen feet: the barges that navigate this canal are commonly of sixty tons' burden, and drawn by two horses. From this canal, at Bull bridge, near the place where it crosses the river Cran, commences the important branch of it called the Paddington canal, which passes on one level, through the central part of the county, to Paddington, whence it has been continued, by the Regent's canal, round the whole northern side of London, to the Thames at Limehouse. The basin at Paddington, which formed the termination of this line before the construction of the Regent's canal, is upwards of four hundred yards long, and thirty wide. The Regent's canal, which branches off at a short distance above it, almost immediately enters a tunnel under Maida hill, emerging from which it passes along the northern side of the Regent's Park, to Islington, under which suburb and the bed of the New River it is carried, by means of another tunnel three-quarters of a mile long, and continues its course by Kingsland and Hackney to Limehouse, where it terminates in an extensive basin communicating with the Thames: its length is nearly nine miles, and along its course are twelve locks, of excellent construction, and thirty-seven bridges. Besides the artificial part of the Lea navigation already mentioned, there is an important side cut from that river at Bromley, to a basin at Limehouse communicating with the Thames. A creek from the Thames to Kensington has also been widened within the last few years, and made navigable. Sir Hugh Middleton's canal, for supplying London with water, called the New River, after running a distance of nearly twelve miles from its commencement in Hertfordshire, enters Middlesex at Bull-Cross, and winds in a beautiful and extremely circuitous course of twenty-four miles through the eastern side of the county to Islington, where it is received into a large basin, called the New River Head, from which, by means of engines and pipes, it is conveyed to most parts of London and its northern suburbs. The principal turnpike-roads in Middlesex bear conspicuous marks of their vicinity to a great city: scattered villas and genteel houses, frequently in handsome rows and terraces, are erected on one or both sides of them to the distance of five or six miles out of London; the foot-ways are thronged with passengers, and the carriage-ways with horses, carts, wagons, private carriages, stage coaches, and vehicles of every description. The great roads from London to the north and west of England have the first part of their course in this county. The road to Cambridge and King's Lynn is a continuation of the line of Bishops-gate-street, through Tottenham and Edmonton, entering Hertfordshire, near Waltham-Cross. The great north road to York, Edinburgh, &c., runs through Highgate, and after passing through a corner of Hertfordshire, at Chipping-Barnet, re-enters Middlesex, which it finally quits just beyond Potter's Bar. The road to Leicester, Leeds, &c., branches from the last-mentioned road at the northern extremity of Chipping-Barnet, about three miles beyond which it enters Hertfordshire in its course to St. Alban's. The road to Oxford is a continuation of the line of Oxford-street, passing through Bayswater, Acton, Hanwell, Southall, &c., to Uxbridge, just beyond which it quits the county for Buckinghamshire. The great western road to Bath, Bristol, Exeter, &c., passes along Piccadilly, through Knightsbridge, Kensington, Hammersmith, Turnham-Green, Brentford, Hounslow, &c., to Staines, where it enters Surrey at the bridge across the Thames.

The only Roman station within the limits of this county, besides Londinium, which was the seat of the Roman government of Britain, appears to have been Sulloniaca, the supposed site of which was on Brockley hill, near Elstree, bordering on Hertfordshire, on which spot various Roman remains have been discovered. The ancient Watling-street is supposed to have run from Dowgate, on the northern bank of the Thames, in the city of London, along the line of the modern street called Watling-street, to Aldersgate, where it quitted the city: it is difficult to trace its course through the remainder of London, but it is believed to have been continued north-westerly, and to have fallen into the line of the present road to St. Alban's by Paddington, and Edgware. The Ermin-street led northwards through Islington and Highgate, by Stoke-Newington and Hornsey Wood, to Enfield, nearly in the line of the present high road; but turning off near the latter place, it passes Clay Hill, and enters Hertfordshire. A third Roman road led from the metropolis westward into Surrey and Berkshire, in the line of the present great western road, through Brentford, Hounslow, and Staines. A fourth is believed to have led eastward, along Old-street, and over Bethnal-Green, to Old Ford, where it crossed the Lea into Essex; and it is probable that another left the city at Aldgate, and pursued the course of the present high road, through Whitechapel and Stratford le Bow, into Essex. Roman antiquities have been found in different parts of the county, but the account of the more important of them is given in the article on London. Middlesex possesses little that is remarkable in ecclesiastical architecture beyond the limits of the metropolis. The number of religious houses in the county before the Reformation, exclusively of those in the metropolis and its suburbs, was few, and the principal remains are to be found in London and Westminster. Among the most perfect specimens of ancient domestic architecture are, Holland House, Harefield Place, and Wyer Hall at Tottenham: this class of antiquities also includes various fine old mansions within the ancient limits of the city of London, and the considerable portion still remaining of the royal palace of St. James'. Among the mansions most distinguished for grandeur or elegance may be enumerated, in addition to the great number of magnificent residences which are noticed in the article on London, the royal palaces of Hampton-Court and Kensington; Sion House, the seat of the Duke of Northumberland; Chiswick House, that of the Duke of Devonshire; Osterley Park, that of the Earl of Jersey; Bentley Priory, that of the Marquis of Abercorn; Caenwood, that of the Earl of Mansfield; Fulham Palace, that of the Bishop of London; Strawberry Hill, formerly that of Horace Walpole, Earl of Orford; and Wrotham Park, the residence of George Byng, Esq. In various parts of the county are springs of mineral water, some of which have been in great repute for their medicinal virtues; but none of them are now much frequented, except Bagnigge Wells, St. Chad's Wells, Islington spa, or New Tonbridge Wells, all which are on the northern side of London.

MIDDLES Moor, a chapelry in the parish of KIRKBY-MALZEARD, lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 15 miles (W. by N.) from Ripon. The population is returned with Fountains-Earth. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Masham, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of York, though claimed to be in the special jurisdiction of the church, late the prebend of Masham, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £1200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant. John Lazenby, in 1743, devised lands, now producing about £18 a year, for the establishment and maintenance of a free school for ten boys; also Simon Horner, in 1809, gave a rent-charge of £20, for the education of poor children.

MIDDLESTONE, a township in that part of the parish of ST. ANDREW, AUCKLAND, which is in the south-eastern division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 3½ miles (E. by N.) from Bishop-Auckland, containing 117 inhabitants.

MIDDLETHORPE, a township in that part of the parish of ST. MARY, BISHOPSHILL, SENIOR, which is in the ainsty of the city, and East riding of the county, of YORK, 2¼ miles (S. by W.) from York, containing 44 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON, a joint chapelry with Smerrill, in that part of the parish of YOULGRAVE which is in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, county of DERBY, 3¾ miles (S. S. W.) from Bakewell, containing, with Smerrill, 280 inhabitants. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. Extensive lead mines are now in operation near the village, which is situated on a hill abounding in limestone. Middleton is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MIDDLETON, a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, 1 mile (S. by W.) from Sudbury, containing 109 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Rev. Oliver Raymond. The church has some remains of Norman architecture. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Stour.

MIDDLETON, a township in that part of the parish of LANCASTER which is in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, 5¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Lancaster, containing 185 inhabitants. It is situated upon the coast of Morecambe bay.

MIDDLETON, a parish in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the market town of Middleton, the chapelry of Ashworth, and the townships of Ainsworth, Birtle cum Bamford, Hopwood, Great Lever, Pilsworth, and Thornham, and containing 12,793 inhabitants, of which number, 5809 are in the town of Middleton, 55 miles (S. E. by S.) from Lancaster, and $191\frac{1}{2}$ (N. N. W.) from London. The name of this place is supposed to have originated from its central situation with regard to some neighbouring towns, whence it was called Middle town. The manor was long held by the family of Assheton, to which belonged Sir Richard Assheton, who signalized himself against the Scots, in 1513, at the battle of Flodden, whither he was accompanied by a band of archers from Middleton. In modern times this town has chiefly been distinguished as one of the principal seats of the cotton manufacture, and the weaving of silk is carried on to some extent; in 1812, when a spirit of discontent and insubordination prevailed among the workmen, Middleton was, for a short time, the scene of riot and bloodshed. It is pleasantly situated on the road from Manchester to Rochdale, and is a considerable thoroughfare. The inhabitants are abundantly supplied with water from springs. Subscription concerts have been established, and are well supported, it being in contemplation to erect a handsome concert-room. The cotton trade, in its various departments of spinning, weaving, bleaching, and printing, is extensively carried on, also the manufacture of nankeens, gingham, and check-handkerchiefs: there are also a silk-manufactory and extensive dye-works, together with coal mines in the immediate vicinity; in one of the cotton manufactories are two steam-engines, of forty and twenty-four horse power respectively, by which eleven thousand spindles and five hundred power-looms are put in motion. The Rochdale canal from Manchester passes about one mile and a half from the town, and communicates with other canals, affording a navigable conveyance to Hull. To the introduction of the different branches of manufacture Middleton is indebted for its rapid increase of population, and its present prosperity. A royal grant for holding a weekly market was obtained in 1791, since which period a market-house, shambles, and a range of warehouses for general merchandise, have been erected, at the expense of Lord Suffield, to whom the manor belongs. The market was appointed to be held on Friday; and the fairs on the first Tuesday after the 11th of March, the first Tuesday after the 15th of April, and the second Thursday after the 29th of September, all which, however, are merely nominal, no business being transacted. Manorial courts leet and baron are held in April and October; at the former of these, the several constables, appointed at a vestry-meeting of the ley-payers, are sworn in for the township.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £36. 3. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Lord Suffield. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, is ancient, and appears to be the work of different periods; the southern side, which is the more modern, was built in 1524, by Sir Richard Assheton and his wife Anne: the tower is low and supports a superstructure of wood, the sandy foundation not being deemed sufficiently firm to sustain an entire erection of stone: the choir is separated from the nave by a screen divided into seven compartments, on which are carved the shields and armorial bearings of several families connected by marriage with the Asshetons; in both the north and south compartments are several ancient and curious monuments and inscriptions: the windows also are decorated with armorial bearings especially that of the north aisle, on which is depicted a group consisting of a priest and sixteen archers, in a kneeling posture, intended as a representation of the bowmen who accompanied Sir Richard Assheton to Flodden field: the chancel window is decorated with portions of stained glass, removed hither from an ancient apartment in the rectory house, called "the Hall." There are places of worship for the late Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Swedenborgians. The grammar school was founded pursuant to royal charter, dated August 11th, 1572, by Alexander Nowell, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's, London: the incorporated governors are the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, in which the dean, then Principal, likewise founded and endowed thirteen scholarships for the benefit of this and other schools in the county. It is also entitled to share with others in two scholarships founded in the same college, by Samuel Radcliffe, D.D., in 1648, and endowed with an estate in Bedfordshire. The governors elect the master, whose salary is only £20 per annum, and the usher, who has £10; each of the boys pays for instruction. There is a charity school in the township of Ainsworth, endowed with a cottage for the master, and land producing about £12 per annum, for which from six to eight poor children receive instruction. In 1758, Catherine Hopwood bequeathed £100, directing the interest to be applied to the instruction of poor children, and the school-house was erected at the expense of the inhabitants of the township of Hopwood. Sunday schools belonging to the various religious communities afford instruction to about two thousand children.

MIDDLETON, a joint township with Houghton and Arbury, in the parish of WINWICK, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Newton in Mackerfield. The population is returned with Houghton.

MIDDLETON, a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Lynn-Regis, containing 665 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Rev. P. S. Wood, L.L.D. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Here are quarries of a rough stone well adapted for buildings of an inferior description. In the village is a high mount, probably the site of an ancient castle; and in the neighbourhood are the remains of a mansion of the Lords Scales, built in the reign of Henry VI.

MIDDLETON, a township in the parish of COTTINGHAM, hundred of CORBY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Rockingham, containing 377 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON, a township in that part of the parish of BELFORD which is in the northern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. N. W.) from Belford, containing 79 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON, a parish in the hundred of BLYTHING, county of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Yoxford, containing, with Fordley, 564 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of — Harrison, Esq. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MIDDLETON, a parish in the hundred of AVISFORD, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 8 miles (S.W. by S.) from Arundel, containing 44 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £5. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown.

MIDDLETON, a parish in the Tamworth division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.W.) from Tamworth, containing 623 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of Lord Middleton. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has portions in the Norman and early English styles, and a tower of later architecture. The Birmingham and Fazeley canal passes through the parish. The several sums arising from bequests by Robert Gorton, in 1640; Francis Willoughby, in 1672; and the Dowager Lady Middleton, in 1782, are applied in teaching poor children, and providing them with bibles. Middleton gives the title of baron to the family of Willoughby.

MIDDLETON, a chapelry in the parish of KIRKBY-LONSDALE, LONSDALE ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale, containing 252 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Kirkby-Lonsdale, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. The chapel, dedicated to the Holy Ghost, was built at the expense of the inhabitants, in 1634, on ground given by Dr. Christopher Bainbridge, a native of this place. A school has been erected by subscription, and is endowed with about £10 per annum for teaching poor children. A battle is stated to have been fought here between the English and the Scots: many human bones have been discovered near the old bridge.

MIDDLETON, a parish in the Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from Beverley, containing 441 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £15. 3. 4. The Rev. J. Blanchard was patron in 1827. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MIDDLETON, a parish in PICKERING lythe, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Cowthorn, Cropton, Hartoft, Lockton, Middleton, Rosedale (East side), Wretton, and part of Aislaby, and containing 1727 inhabitants, of which number, 247 are in the township of Middleton, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W.N.W.) from Pickering. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 11. 8., endowed with £6 per annum private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Devises of the Rev. J. Robinson.

MIDDLETON, a township in the parish of ROTHWELL, lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.N.W.) from Wakefield, containing 1096 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON, a joint township with Stockhill, in that part of the parish of ILKLEY which is in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Otley, containing, with Stockhill, 205 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON (ST. GEORGE), a parish in the south-western division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.S.E.) from Darlington, containing 209 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £4, and in the patronage of the Heirs of the late W. Pemberton, Esq. The foundations of Pountney's bridge, thought to have been the first bridge built across the Tees, are still visible: on or near it stood an ancient chapel; within a short distance of it there was a hermitage, and on the brow of the hill immediately above it is an artificial mound, encompassed by a fosse.

MIDDLETON on the HILL, a parish in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, 6 miles (N.E.) from Leominster, containing 369 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MIDDLETON upon LEVEN, a chapelry in the parish of RUDBY in CLEVELAND, western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Yarm, containing 111 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, endowed with £1000 royal bounty. Lady Amherst was patroness in 1820. The chapel is dedicated to St. Cuthbert.

MIDDLETON (NORTH), a township in that part of the parish of HARTBURN which is in the western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Morpeth, containing 75 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON (SOUTH), a township in the parish of ILBERTON, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Wooler, containing 69 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON (SOUTH), a township in that part of the parish of HARTBURN which is in the western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Morpeth, containing 31 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON (STONE), a chapelry in the parish of HATHERSAGE, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Bakewell, containing 635 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Hathersage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant. The chapel, dedicated to St. Martin, was rebuilt in 1759, in the form of an octagon. There is a place of worship for Unitarians. A considerable quantity of limestone is burned here, and used for manure. This parish is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Chapel en le Frith every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MIDDLETON (STONE), a parish in the hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Bicester, containing 340 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £12. 16. 0½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MIDDLETON in TEASDALE, a parish in the southwestern division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, comprising the market town of Middleton, the chapelry of Egglestone, and the townships of Forest with Frith, and Newbiggin, and containing 2866 inhabitants, of which number, 1263 are in the town of Middleton, 10 miles (N.W.) from Barnard-Castle, and 253 (N.N.W.) from London. The town is irregularly built, and scattered along the sides of hills which surround, in a somewhat oval form, an extensive green: the environs abound with all the varied scenery of rocks, waterfalls, and chasms of immense depth, with fertile valleys and sloping hills, enriched by the gentle flow of the Tees, in its course through this county to the German Ocean. About two miles above the town is Wynch bridge, seventy feet in length and two in width, thrown from rock to rock across a tremendous chasm sixty feet in depth, and guarded on each side by a hand-rail; and higher up the river are the stupendous cataracts of High Force and Caldron Snout. Several of the inhabitants are occupied in raising and manufacturing the lead-ore produced in the northern part of the parish in immense quantities. The market is held on Saturday, and every alternate market is numerously attended by the miners, who are paid once a fortnight: there are fairs on the third Thursday in April, July 7th, and on the second Thursday in September. The town hall, a neat edifice with a marketplace beneath it, was erected at the expense of the Earl of Darlington. Courts leet and baron are held annually for the manor. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £25. 17. 1., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient but small edifice; the tower is several yards distant from the rest of the building. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Methodists. Christopher Stephenson and others bequeathed a small estate, now producing £22 per annum, for which eight boys are instructed. A National school, erected and partly supported by the London Lead Company, especially for the children of their own labourers, from six until twelve years of age, who pay 1s. each per quarter, affords instruction to one hundred and thirty children, exclusively of one hundred Sunday scholars; the other children pay two shillings and sixpence quarterage: a small library is attached to the school, for the use of the Company's workmen, to whom the books are lent.

MIDDLETON by WIRKSWORTH, a hamlet in that part of the parish of WIRKSWORTH which is in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, county of DERBY, 1½ mile (N.N.W.) from Wirksworth, containing 904 inhabitants. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MIDDLETON-CHENEY, a parish in the hundred of KING'S SUTTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Banbury, containing 1398 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £31. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has a fine tower and spire, and a rich porch. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The tenure prevailing in this lordship is that, when estates descend in the female line, the eldest sister inherits. In the great civil war a battle was fought here, in which the army of the parliament was defeated.

MIDDLETON-HALL, a township in the parish of ILDETON, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 1¼ mile (S.) from Wooler, containing 61 inhabitants.
